

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Governor-General.

By His Excellency the Right Honorable HALLAM, BARON TENNYSON, Knight Commander of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief of the Commonwealth of Australia.

WHEREAS by the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act it was amongst other things enacted that the Governor-General might appoint such times for holding the Sessions of the Parliament as he thinks fit, and also from time to time by Proclamation or otherwise prorogue the Parliament: And whereas on the thirty-first day of March, One thousand nine hundred and three, the Parliament was further prorogued until Twelve o'clock noon on Tuesday, the twenty-sixth day of May, One thousand nine hundred and three, then to meet for the despatch of business: Now therefore I, the said HALLAM, BARON TENNYSON, do hereby further announce and proclaim that the place for the meeting of the said Parliament for the despatch of business as aforesaid shall be the buildings known as the Houses of Parliament, situated in Spring-street, in the City of Melbourne, and the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives respectively are hereby required to give their attendance at the said time and place accordingly.

GOD SAVE THE KING!

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

Second Session of the First Parliament.

THE Parliament was prorogued on 10th October, 1902, until 14th November, 1902: It was further prorogued to 19th December, 1902, thence to 23rd January, 1903, thence to 24th February, thence to 31st March, and finally to 26th May, when it met for the despatch of business.

Senate.

Tuesday, 26 May, 1903.

PROCLAMATION.

The Senate met at noon pursuant to the proclamation of His Excellency the Governor-General.

The CLERK of the Parliaments read the proclamation.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH.

His Excellency the Governor-General entered the chamber, and took the chair. A message was forwarded to the House of Representatives intimating that His Excellency awaited the attendance of honorable members in the Senate chamber, who, being come with their Speaker,

HIS EXCELLENCY was pleased to deliver the following speech:—

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I have called you together to continue the work begun in the first session of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. It was found impossible, by reason of the exhaustive discussion of the Federal Tariff, to deal with any but the most urgent of the proposals then brought before you, and renewed demands must now be made on your industry and patriotism before the Commonwealth machinery can be deemed complete.

Experience has emphasized the necessity for the establishment of the High Court of Judicature contemplated by the Constitution. You will be asked to give your immediate attention to a Bill dealing with this subject.

Another measure will be introduced to regulate legal procedure in this connexion so as to avoid unnecessary delay or expense in the course of litigation.

An early opportunity will be afforded you of considering the report of the experts who were intrusted with the duty of examining the conditions of several areas within which it has been proposed that the seat of government of the Commonwealth should be placed. My Advisers expect that the information which has been collected on this subject will enable you to come to a satisfactory conclusion.

Ministers regard with satisfaction the growth of public feeling in favour of the establishment of Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration as a means of avoiding strikes and lock-outs, and of amicably settling industrial disputes. They will, therefore, ask you to consider a proposal to establish courts for the prevention and settlement of disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State.

You will be asked to ratify an agreement between the Admiralty and the Government of the Commonwealth which modifies the existing agreement, and secures for the naval defence of Australia the protection of a powerful and continuously efficient squadron of warships at a moderate cost.

In pursuance of resolutions passed during last session, a Bill will be introduced to accept British New Guinea as a territory of the Commonwealth by the completion of its transfer from the Imperial Government. Due provision will be made for the future administration of the new territory.

You will be asked to establish by Statute a uniform defence system for Australia.

The direct representation of the Commonwealth in London by a High Commissioner is deemed necessary, and a measure for that purpose will engage your attention.

A Bill will be laid before you to establish a uniform patent law, enabling inventors, in future, to obtain protection throughout the Commonwealth by a single registration.

My Advisers feel that the distinct demand expressed by the people of Australia for the substitution of white for coloured labour in the sugar industry implies a readiness to share the financial burden imposed by this substitution. They, therefore, propose to replace the system of rebates, charged against the excise duties payable to the States concerned, by an equivalent bonus chargeable to the whole population. This step, while it will not lessen the encouragement given to the employment of white labour, will effect a more equitable distribution of the cost of the national policy.

In order to execute and maintain the provisions of the Constitution intended to assure freedom of trade between the States, a Bill will be introduced to provide for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission with the powers necessary to give effect to that essential purpose.

You will also be asked to consider short measures relating to naturalization, rings and trusts, and elections to the Senate in certain events.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES :

Estimates of expenditure will be submitted to you in due course, framed with a careful regard to economy, but, at the same time, maintaining the efficiency of the public service of the Commonwealth.

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES :

A number of other important measures are in preparation. Among these is a Bill to provide a uniform navigation and shipping law. This measure, however, is necessarily long and complicated. Consideration has been given by my Advisers to the question of taking over the State debts and to the establishment of a banking law for the Commonwealth. My Advisers will gladly take advantage of any opportunity which may offer of bringing these subjects before you, but they are not sanguine of being able to do so in the course of this session.

Although legislative consent to the project has not yet been received from South Australia and Western Australia, a commission of railway engineers has been appointed to inquire into the question of railway connexion between the East and the West of Australia, and their report will shortly be complete. In instituting this important examination Ministers have felt that members should be in possession of the fullest information possible before any steps are taken in this important work. They are, however, of opinion that the isolation of Western Australia retards the development of the federal spirit. It is admittedly desirable to remove so serious a bar to the complete political and commercial union of the Commonwealth, and my Advisers trust that it will be found that the project rests on a basis of sound finance. When the legislative authority is complete, provision for a survey of the line will be sought, should the report of the Commission justify that course.

During the past year the cable communications of the Commonwealth have been affected for the better by important events. The Pacific cable, now successfully completed, cannot be expected to yield an immediate monetary profit. But the project and its accomplishment have already cheapened and facilitated intercourse with the mother country and Europe, as well as Canada, New Zealand, and the United States. Subject to your approval, a contract has been entered into between my Government and the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which, while conserving substantial reductions on the rates prevailing until recently, substitutes an arrangement terminable in a reasonable time for the virtually perpetual obligation which was originally entered into by four contracting States, and which was a burden on the Commonwealth until the conclusion of the new agreement.

The inquiries of the Select Committee on the Bonus Bill have, since the close of last session, been continued by a Royal Commission, and the report, when received, will be laid before you.

The Imperial Conference held during the past year in London may be expected to be far-reaching in its results. I have already referred to the naval agreement, which formed one of the subjects for discussion. Other matters of grave importance to the Commonwealth were discussed, and the conclusions of the conference will be laid before you. The urgency, however, of questions of domestic importance prevents Ministers from asking you to give immediate consideration to the question of preferential trade and to other subjects dealt with in the resolutions.

My Advisers observe with gratification recent utterances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies advocating the encouragement of trade relations between various parts of the Empire.

The approaching termination of the existing contract for the carriage of mails between England and Australia, via Suez, will render it necessary to make new arrangements, giving effect to the provision in the Post and Telegraph Act, which forbids the making of contracts for the carriage of mails by vessels on which other than white labour is employed. The matter is under careful consideration, and tenders will shortly be invited.

Arrangements are in progress, and will shortly be concluded, for a more frequent and efficient mail service between Tasmania and the mainland in consideration of an increased subsidy.

The passage of the Commonwealth Electoral Act has rendered necessary the division of the various States into new electorates. This work is proceeding with all possible speed, and the plan of division will be submitted to you when completed.

Notwithstanding the drought, which proved so disastrous in many parts of Australia, the Federal finances are in a very satisfactory condition. The return of good seasons, which is now so widely expected, will give new impetus to the development of our resources and the expansion of our industries.

I now leave you to your deliberations, in the earnest hope that you may be prospered by Divine guidance in your great and arduous labours.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL having retired,

The PRESIDENT took the chair, and read prayers.

VACANT SEATS.

The PRESIDENT acquainted the Senate that vacancies had occurred during the recess by the death, on 2nd January, 1903, of Sir Frederick Thomas Sargood, K.C.M.G., a Senator for the State of Victoria, and by the resignation, on 17th April, of Norman Kirkwood Ewing, a Senator for the State of Western Australia, and that, in pursuance of the directions of the Constitution Act, in the absence of the President from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General had notified the vacancy in the representation of the State of Victoria to the Governor of that State, and that he (the President) had notified the vacancy in the representation of the State of Western Australia to the Governor of that State, and that he had received from the Governor-General the original certificate under the hand of the Governor of Victoria to the effect that the Honorable Robert Reid, a member of the Legislative Council of Victoria, had been chosen to fill the vacancy in the representation of that State.

Certificate read by the Clerk.

DEATH OF SENATOR SIR F. T. SARGOOD.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—The lamented death of Sir Frederick Sargood, on the 2nd January last, occurred at a time when honorable senators were nearly all at their homes throughout Australia, and this is the first opportunity that has occurred of giving expression to the profound grief with which that sad news was received. It is probable that most of the members of the Senate, like myself, only had the pleasure and the privilege of the acquaintance of Senator Sir Frederick Sargood since it commenced its sittings. There are some here, and probably more outside, whose acquaintance with the deceased gentleman dated very much further back. Before the federation of the States, Senator Sir Frederick Sargood had a distinguished career as a legislator and as a member of several administrations in Victoria. To this Parliament he brought a fund of ripe experience of men and affairs gathered in an active life passed in politics and in commercial pursuits, and his clear judgment and diligent criticism of the measures brought before this Parliament were of the greatest value to the Commonwealth. Our admiration of him will not be lessened when we remember that his influence and his example were always exercised in the direction of maintaining the dignity of the Chamber. By his death the Commonwealth has lost a worthy citizen, and the Senate has lost a member whose memory will be esteemed by all who knew him. I beg leave to move—

1. That this House records its sense of the loss the Commonwealth has suffered in the death of Lieut.-Colonel Sir Frederick Sargood, K.C.M.G., and expresses its sincere condolence with his widow and family in their bereavement.

2. That Mr. President be requested to convey the foregoing resolution to Lady Sargood.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I rise to second the motion, which, couched in terms of the most expressive character, will, I am sure, command the assent, although in the circumstances a painful assent, of every member of this Chamber. My acquaintance with the late Sir Frederick Sargood was most intimate during the time that he was a member of this Senate, and I can say that no word, no syllable of exaggeration has passed the lips of my honorable and learned friend at the table in his estimate of the character of our lamented friend. Upon all questions he was animated, as I think, by a most lofty and abiding sense of public duty. In that he never failed, and from the line of conduct which that led him into he never shrank. He was, I think, in all things a pattern of conscientious industry. He sought, in season and out of season, to serve the State, to serve the Commonwealth, without at the same time doing any disservice to any individual. I know no man who was more absolutely free from personal feeling of any kind or description, who was more absolutely patriotic in all that he did, in all that he undertook to do: his counsel and his ready help were available, I think, alike to all, no matter on what side of the Senate they sat. To me his lamented death was a cause of deep personal grief. He never brought himself prominently forward if the cause of the country would be best served by his remaining in the background. He served loyally in this Senate, and my honorable and learned friend said no word more than was necessary when he declared a minute ago that his memory will ever be fresh in this Chamber. It will be ever kept green in the minds of the citizens of the Commonwealth, and it will be an example and a guide to us all.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—It is always our duty in circumstances of this kind to sympathize with those who have been bereaved, and in the case of a gentleman of the character of him who has left us, it is our duty, not only to sympathize with his relatives, but also to express our own sorrow at losing one who had always been of assistance in carrying out legislation for the benefit of the people. The members of the labour party always found in the late Senator Sargood a gentleman. It did not matter how much he might differ with others on questions of legislation or of opinion: he never allowed any of those differences to affect his gentlemanly conduct towards others, and I could point to numerous instances of little kindnesses bestowed upon those who sought his assistance in the capacity of a legislator and in the capacity of a friend. We all hope that those who may have the privilege of making the laws of the Commonwealth will be gentlemen of the upright character and the straightforward conduct of our late friend, Senator Sir Frederick Sargood.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I join in the regrets which have been expressed in connexion with the death of Senator Sargood. As a representative of this State, and for very many years before I entered a House of Legislature, I had an acquaintance with Sir Frederick, and in an official capacity I assisted him in some matters concerning the industrial population of this State. Perhaps the greatest tribute I can pay to his memory is to say that he was a good and a just man. As an employer of labour he set an example that might have been followed by many others throughout Australia. We feel to-day that in him we have lost a dear friend. I concur in what has been said of him. I trust that we shall keep his memory green, and strive to emulate him in that which he set before him to do—namely, his duty.

The PRESIDENT.—Before putting the question, I may, perhaps, be permitted to say how cordially I agree with everything that has been said in praise of the lamented senator. He was every man's friend, a most generous opponent, and whenever any differences of opinion arose between himself and any one else he was most cordial and gentlemanly. I feel sure that every honorable senator here deeply regrets his loss, and expresses his sympathy with the widow.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

of section 3, and of section 11, of the Immigration Restriction Act 1901.

Petitions received and read.

GENERAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. POYNTON.—I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a notice in reference to the next elections for the House of Representatives, which stood on the business-paper in my name last session, and to ask him if the Government have determined that those elections shall be held on the same day as the elections to the Senate.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to that question must depend, to some extent, upon, amongst other things, certain action being taken or not taken in the States; but I should like my honorable friend to give notice of the question, so that I may prepare a more satisfactory answer.

PRICE OF "HANSARD."

Mr. McDONALD.—Last year we were told that the price of Hansard to subscribers would be 4s. a session, but I understand, from what I have read in the press, that in future 10s. 6d. is to be charged. I want to know why, and on whose authority, this alteration has been made? A number of would-be subscribers have sent to me—and no doubt other honorable members are in the same position—the sum of 4s., in order that I may procure copies of Hansard for them, but I do not know whether to incur the extra expense on their behalf. In view of the unreliability of the newspaper reports from time to time, I think that we should encourage the distribution of Hansard, and even provide for a daily Hansard.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I understand that what is to be done is to charge for Hansard the price which was charged last session, together with the postage required by the provisions of the Post and Telegraph Rates Act. The matter is one which comes within the jurisdiction of the President and Mr. Speaker, who have acted within the powers conferred upon them. If the honorable member desires further information upon the subject, no doubt Mr. Speaker will be willing to afford it.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it within the powers of the President and Mr. Speaker to fix the price of Hansard?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I think so.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that the opinion of the House should be taken upon such a matter.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is proposed that the rate of subscription charged last session—4s. per annum—shall be charged this session, together with the necessary postage fixed by Parliament. There is to be no alteration in the price of Hansard.

ADMIRALTY AGREEMENT.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Will the Prime Minister cause to be printed and circulated as soon as possible a copy of the agreement between the Admiralty and the Government of the Commonwealth?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That agreement is attached to a Bill which is in draft, and which will shortly be laid upon the table. It will also be found among the papers relating to the proceedings of the Imperial Conference, which I shall shortly lay upon the table.

COLONIAL AMMUNITION COMPANY.

Mr. WATSON.—Can the Minister of Defence lay upon the table, before the discussion of the Address in Reply, any agreement which has been entered into, or which it is proposed to enter into, with the Colonial Ammunition Company of Victoria for the supply of ammunition to the Commonwealth?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that the matter is sufficiently far advanced for me to do that, but I shall look into the question. I do not think that an agreement has yet been arrived at. It was always intended that before any agreement was entered into its terms should be submitted to the House.

COMMONWEALTH AMMUNITION FACTORY.

Mr. WATSON.—Have any steps been taken by the Minister or Government to carry into effect an intention indicated on their behalf some considerable time ago to establish a Commonwealth Ammunition Factory?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No steps in that direction have yet been taken.

FEDERAL CAPITAL SITES COMMISSION.

Mr. FULLER.—When does the Minister for Home Affairs expect to receive the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the proposed federal capital sites?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — I am informed that the report will probably be ready about the middle of next month.

EASTERN EXTENSION CABLE COMPANY.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — When will the Prime Minister lay a copy of the agreement between the Eastern Extension Cable Company and the Government upon the table?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Almost immediately. It is my intention to invite the sanction of the two Houses to that agreement.

Mr. FISHER. — Copies of all these agreements should be laid upon the table as quickly as possible. It is the business of the Government to see that honorable members are provided with the fullest information in regard to these matters.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Conference between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Prime Ministers of the self-governing colonies, June—August, 1902.

British New Guinea, annual report, 1st July, 1901—30th June, 1902.

Regulations under Customs Act, dated 30th October, 27th November, and 9th, 13th, and 15th December, 1902.

New sugar regulations under Excise Act and Excise Tariff Act, dated 8th January, 1903.

Return of (a) persons refused admission to the Commonwealth under Immigration Restriction Act 1901 during the year 1902; (b) persons who passed the prescribed test during the year 1902; (c) persons admitted without being asked to pass the education test during the year 1902.

Papers relating to the arrival within the Commonwealth of six hatters under contract to Mr. Charles Anderson.

Regulations under Commonwealth Public Service Act 1902.

Mr. SPEAKER laid upon the table—

Annual reports of the Commissioner for Audit for the years ending 30th June, 1901, and 30th June, 1902.

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McDONALD. — Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to repeal that section of the Elections Act which prohibits members of State Parliaments from contesting seats without resigning?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — The matter will be considered.

Mr. Speaker left the chair at 12.35 p.m.; sitting resumed at 3.30 p.m.

ADMISSION OF MAORIES INTO THE COMMONWEALTH.

Mr. REID. — May I ask the Prime Minister if he would be good enough to supplement the papers with reference to the admission of six hatters into the Commonwealth, which he has just laid upon the Table, by the further papers relating to the admission of three Maories into New South Wales?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I shall procure the papers referred to as soon as possible, if they are of any interest to my right honorable friend.

INTER-STATE COMMISSION BILL.

Mr. SPEAKER reported the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor-General recommending that an appropriation be made from the consolidated revenue for the purposes of this Bill.

QUEENSLAND RAILWAY PASSES.

Mr. McDONALD. — I desire to know if the Minister for Home Affairs can explain the exact position in which Queensland representatives in the Commonwealth Parliament stand with regard to the passes which they now hold over Queensland railway lines; also, what action is being taken by the Government?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — Some time ago the railway commissioners of the States affected met and agreed to a certain division of the sum voted to meet the expense of conveying members of the Commonwealth Parliament over the railways. The Governments of all the States, excepting Queensland, indorsed the agreement then arrived at. The Queensland Government refused to ratify the action of their officer, and the amount to which they would be entitled under the arrangement made has been placed to a suspense account. In the meantime, I have issued orders to honorable members which will enable them to travel upon the Queensland railways. The Government of that State say that they are willing as an act of grace to convey members of the Commonwealth Parliament over their railways free of cost, but I object to having honorable members placed in that position. I think that they should travel free upon the railways as a matter of right, and not as the result of a concession on the part of the State Government. I have given orders to honorable members which they may use if they desire.

Mr. McDONALD. — But what is our position in regard to the passes?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — They are of no value if the Queensland Government refuse to accept them.

Mr. POYNTON. — What do the Queensland Government ask for?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — An amount somewhat larger than that agreed upon at the conference of railway commissioners.

Mr. POYNTON. — Why not give it to them?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — The Government left the whole matter in the hands of the railway commissioners, but the Queensland Government refused to acknowledge the agreement arrived at, although they were represented by one of their officers. The course I have adopted in giving honorable members orders is intended to protect them against being placed in what I regard as a false position.

REMISSION OF CUSTOMS FINES.

Mr. THOMSON. — I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether the promise made by him in Sydney with regard to the remission of 80 per cent. of the fine imposed upon a young sailor named Tingey has been carried out?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I was represented in the press as having stated at the meeting which I addressed in the Sydney Town Hall that I had decided that the goods taken from the man referred to should be returned, and that 80 per cent. of the fine should be remitted. That, however, was a slight inaccuracy on the part of the press. What I did say was that I intended to take measures to insure that result, and what has happened since has been this: I had not the Customs papers before me, and had not put any direction upon them, and, in the absence of such direction, the fine has not been remitted. I shall, however, make representations upon the subject to my colleague, the Minister for Trade and Customs. I think that the Comptroller of Customs, when he intimated that the fine could not be remitted, rather overlooked the powers possessed by the Minister for Trade and Customs. I am informed that whilst my colleague, the Attorney-General, was for a time administering the Customs department, he gave directions in accordance with the promise I made, and I have no doubt that the fine will be remitted.

SUGAR EXCISE DUTY.

Mr. CONROY. — I wish to ask the Minister for Trade and Customs why he allowed five sugar companies in Queensland to escape the payment of excise duty amounting to £27,000; also, what has become of the money?

Mr. KINGSTON. — I can assure the honorable and learned member that I have not to my knowledge allowed any person or company to escape the payment of duty. If any persons are attempting to escape I shall be only too glad to be supplied with particulars which will enable me to enforce payment.

ADMISSION OF BOILERMAKERS INTO THE COMMONWEALTH.

Mr. FULLER. — I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that six boilermakers recently entered Western Australia under a special contract with the Western Australian Government, and whether he will kindly explain to the House the circumstances under which they were admitted?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — The papers dealing with the subject mentioned by the honorable and learned member fully explain the matter, and I shall lay them on the table.

GOVERNOR - GENERAL'S SPEECH: ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Address in Reply was read by the Clerk as follows:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia, in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the Speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs). — It is with some considerable emotion that I rise to move—

That the Address in Reply to His Excellency's Speech, as read by the Clerk, be now adopted.

It affords me much pleasure to submit this motion and to emphasize the continuance of a great deal of that federal legislation which I believe has done much to cement the union of these States into one splendid Commonwealth. At the beginning of the federation much was said of a hostility towards the union. Hints were made, and suggestions were repeated, that the people as a whole were not in sympathy with the federal compact which had been adopted. After having moved about considerably amongst the citizens of my own and other States, my own impression is that the federal feeling throughout the Commonwealth is stronger now than at any period of our national life. The legislation which has been enacted by this Parliament—and I do not say that the Ministry can claim the whole of the credit attaching to it—has done much to accentuate that feeling. Even persons who formerly were opposed to federation have, by reason of the work accomplished, now become ardent federalists. Further, I believe that the spirit of the Constitution itself is becoming deeply implanted in the very lives of our citizens, in the laws of the community, and in the trade and commerce of the Commonwealth as a whole. I think it is a happy augury that we can start the legislation of this second session of the Commonwealth Parliament with the consciousness that we have the good will of the people at our backs. Fortunately, too, the general outlook is considerably better now than it was some little time ago, inasmuch as the serious drought which worked such terrible devastation has passed away. My experience is that it is very difficult to dissociate the results which are said to have flowed from federation, from those which arose from the drought alone. Most of the evils under which Australia laboured are alleged to have been caused by federation, whereas a majority of them, I believe, are entirely due to the drought itself. However, good rains have now fallen throughout the Commonwealth, and in Queensland and the other States there is greater promise of prosperity than there has been for many years. I believe that this Parliament by its legislation will promote the peace, welfare and good government of the people as a whole. In the Governor-General's speech the Ministry have foreshadowed certain measures of vast importance to us. Foremost amongst them I place the Bill dealing with the establishment of the High Court of Australia. Until that tribunal is established we have not fulfilled the whole of the federal plan. The idea underlying the scheme of federation as devised by the Federal Convention was that there should be three distinct branches of government—that legislative, executive, and judicial functions should each be discharged in their proper sphere. But all that we have done is to establish our Legislature and Executive. Until the High Court is established we have not fulfilled the design of those who drafted the Constitution. It is an absolute necessity that that tribunal should be set up. It is not for this Parliament to say whether or not it shall be established. The Constitution which provides for its creation was submitted to the people, and it was part of the scheme which they adopted. Therefore, we have an absolute mandate from the people of the Commonwealth to establish the High Court. The experience of the last few months has emphasized the need which exists for its creation. During that time a feeling of uncertainty as to our laws has been operating throughout the various States. Various decisions have been given by various State Supreme Courts, and consequently those responsible for administering the law do not know whether they are bound by those decisions. The question of whether the Commonwealth has power to tax State goods has been decided, so far as New South Wales is concerned, by the Supreme Court of that State, whilst as to whether or not the federal agencies can be taxed has been decided by the Supreme Court of Victoria. These are questions which strike at the very foundation of our Government, and upon such important and vital matters, involving the interpretation of the Constitution, serious doubts and perplexity exist in the minds of those administering the law. It is our duty to put an end to that condition of uncertainty at the earliest possible moment. I would further point out that as the result of the recent conference of the Premiers of the various States claims have been set up by them in respect of State rights. We are told that this Parliament is invading State rights, and I hold that it is highly unsatisfactory that under existing conditions the Legislature has to decide for itself upon matters involving the interpretation of the Constitution. The States Attorneys-General are putting forward other claims. They have raised the question of whether or not the section in the Commonwealth

Electoral Act which deals with the time and place for holding elections for the Senate is valid. We think that we have legislated properly upon that subject, although, personally, I do not express any opinion upon the matter. There may be considerable room for doubt upon it. But what is the position? We have antagonism existing between the States and the Commonwealth, where, instead of recrimination, we ought to have co-operation. Therefore, it is absolutely incumbent upon us to establish the High Court in order that these matters may be determined. The very idea underlying its creation is that we should have a body which is absolutely impartial, which cannot be controlled either by this or any other Legislature so long as it interprets the spirit of the Constitution, and the Constitution itself, in accordance with the oaths of its members, "without fear, favour, or affection." The idea underlying its establishment was that it should be a body set apart—that it should keep each Parliament within its own distinct sphere, and that it should decide as to the jurisdiction of each of the respective sovereign bodies. The position of the States which Chief Justice Chase laid down, in his judgment in the case of Texas v. White, was that under the Constitution of the United States there was an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States. That probably is the correct interpretation of our Constitution at the present time. But we are in the position that we do not know how the Constitution will be interpreted. Is the interpretation to be left in the hands of our own Parliament, a body which, I submit with all deference, is not constituted for the purpose of deciding delicate constitutional questions? And it should not be left in the hands of the States Parliaments, which are also unfit for the performance of such a duty: nor should it be left to the Executive Ministers of either Commonwealth or States. The idea of the Constitution was that we should have a judicial body to decide such questions, thus allaying friction, and putting an end to all antagonism by a fair and impartial construction of the Constitution. Further, I believe that, constituted as we are at the present time, it is highly unsatisfactory not to have an Australian Court of Appeal. It was urged that there should be an Australian Court of Appeal composed of men trained under Australian law, versed in Australian history, and appointed by an

M. L. E. Groom.

Australian Parliament. Our position now is that if we want a question of our own Constitution interpreted, so that it may be binding on the whole of the Commonwealth, we have practically to first get a decision by a State Court, and then take that decision across the seas in order to have it interpreted by the Privy Council. The idea above all others was that when we were constituted an Australian Federation, with an Australian Parliament, we should have an Australian Court of Appeal. If we are to have a High Court constituted, that court must be composed of the very best men the Commonwealth can produce.

Mr. CONROY.—Then there must be no politicians in the court.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is a matter which the honorable and learned member may discuss presently. It often happens, however, that eminent politicians have made excellent Judges, and in the old country the Attorney-General is frequently appointed to the Bench. I believe that the legal profession has the advantage of making its members conscientious by reason of the etiquette which binds them, and that they can throw off the political garb and assume the rôle of Judge with benefit to the community.

Mr. CONROY.—If they be honest politicians.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The average lawyer is, I am glad to say, an honest man.

Mr. McDONALD.—What of the Queensland Chief Justice? How did he get to the position?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The Queensland people have reason to be proud of their Chief Justice. If we are to have a High Court, it must be composed of men who have the respect of the public and the confidence of the profession. If there is to be a Court of Appeal to which Australians may go from the State Courts, it must be a Court of which members of the Australian legal profession will advise their clients to take advantage; and if we appoint men of the proper stamp, the court will be a success from the very jump. We are asked—What is the use of creating this costly Court of Appeal in view of a probability that we shall have only a few cases for decision? It is possible that there may be only a few cases, but I do not believe that will be found to be so. The fact that there were only a few cases for decision did not deter the United States from starting their Court of Appeal. When that court was constituted there was not a single case on the docket, and from 1790 to 1800 there were heard only six cases involving important questions of constitutional interpretation. When Chief Justice Marshall was appointed in 1800, he found only ten cases listed for trial. The position I put is, that if there is only one case of constitutional importance to be decided, and that one case strikes at the very foundation of the principles of the Constitution, it is our duty to appoint a court of the highest authorities in order to have a correct interpretation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—A number of the decisions given by Justice Marshall in the first years of the United States Court have been cited.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is so; and Justice Marshall had a peculiar advantage in that he retained his seat in the court for, I think, 34 years. In my opinion the High Court should be composed, not of fluctuating Judges, but of permanent Judges, because only in that way can be obtained that continuity of interpretation which is essential to the safe and proper administration of the law. One of the great advantages of the position on the Privy Council of Lord Watson was that, by sitting there year after year, he got such a thorough grasp of the underlying principles of the Constitution of Canada that he was able to give interpretations which harmonized with the sentiments of the Canadian people. For these and many other reasons which could be adduced, it affords me considerable gratification to see that a Bill for the creation of a High Court of Appeal has been put practically in the front rank of the measures submitted by the Government. Another part of the federal scheme was that there should be constituted an Inter State Commission; that was part of the scheme adopted by the citizens when the referendum was taken. But I hope that when the Inter-State Commission is constituted its duties will not be confined merely to the regulation of railway matters, but that powers will be given to regulate the rates for shipping. Queensland has felt the inequalities in the matter of shipping rates. A rate has in times past been charged from Sydney to ports north of Brisbane different from the rate charged from Brisbane to the same ports. As a matter of fact, in the evidence given the other day before the commission sitting at Brisbane, an illustration was afforded in the fact that coal is carried from Newcastle past Ipswich and other collieries at a much lower rate than that at which coal is carried from Brisbane, owing to certain peculiar conditions.

Mr. THOMSON.—Natural conditions, I suppose?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Possibly natural conditions; but my point is that we ought not to have those natural conditions affected by artificial combination. The idea is that Inter-State trade should be all on fair terms. Now that we are a united community no one portion of the Commonwealth should in matters of trade be preferred to any other portion. I hope that when the Inter-State Commission is constituted, full powers will be given, in order to regulate such abuses as those to which I have referred. I have alluded to the High Court, which will settle matters between individuals, between States, and between the Commonwealth and States, and I have mentioned the Inter-State Commission, which is intended to regulate commerce and trade, and to enforce those sections of the Constitution which deal with such matters. I am pleased to notice that the Government have gone further, and said that there is another class of disputes which seriously affects trade and commerce, and that it is proposed to constitute a court of arbitration and conciliation to deal with them. I notice with pleasure that that is part of the Government scheme for this session. After all, what does this question come to? To me a strike, like a war, is a break-down of our civilization. When we consider the discoveries which have been made in science, and when we see the advances in industries and in production, it seems to me an admission of weakness on the part of those who administer the affairs of government if they cannot devise some means of settling an ordinary labour trouble or dispute. I hail with pleasure the announcement that the Government are going to do their best to remedy grievances in this direction. What is the principle underlying the whole question? What right has the State to interfere? The State has the right to interfere for the reason that a strike is a matter of public concern. A strike does not affect only the particular parties interested, but it disorganizes trade, causes pain and suffering, and, what is worst of all, it leaves for years a feeling of class hatred in the community. If the Government provide a scheme which will prevent this class feeling, they will have done good service to the Commonwealth. The first principle is that it is in the interests of the public that the State should step in and say—"This dislocation of trade and commerce and business shall absolutely cease." If strikes and lockouts are to be made illegal, as they should be, the workmen and employers must be given some other method of solving disputes. We know that the right of combination has grown up in years past. The right of combination and the formation of unions has steadily advanced year after year, and also the building up of funds by workmen. England may have gone further than have some of these States, but the right of combination is recognised throughout, and further recognition is given to the enforcement of combination by that industrial warfare, which is practically the legalized method of settling disputes. But I repeat that if we take away from the men this right of industrial warfare we must of necessity substitute some other means of settling disputes. I act on the principle that the persons who are concerned in a strike or lockout are not always the best judge of their case. In ordinary affairs if two persons cannot come to an agreement as to the meaning of a contract, they go before a court of law, and the Judge decides as to the true purport of their contract or agreement. Let us adopt a similar method in industrial warfare. Let us conciliate, by all means, if we can; but if we cannot obtain conciliation, let our Courts of Arbitration come in and say to the parties—"Stop! This warfare shall not go on! You are causing untold misery in this community. State your case, take it to the proper tribunal and let the matter be impartially decided." That court, of necessity, must be a court that can command the confidence of the whole community. I believe that if one of the Judges of the High Court were appointed chairman of that tribunal, and were assisted by arbitrators, we should obtain happy and excellent results. There is one matter to which I regret the Governor-General's speech makes no reference. I am sorry that it does not allude to the desirableness of establishing a department of Agriculture. I think honorable members remember with pleasure the very able speeches upon this question which were delivered last session by the honorable and learned member for

Bendigo, and the honorable and learned member for Indi. They put very strongly before the Government reasons why the Commonwealth should set up a department of Agriculture. I do not for one moment contend that the Government is in a position to establish a department of Agriculture, as fully equipped and as fully manned as is the department of Agriculture in the United States of America; but I do believe that a great deal of good could be done if they were to create at an early stage some central federalizing agency. In the past, splendid work has been done by the various departments of the several States. We know that excellent agricultural colleges have been established at Dookie in Victoria, at Hawkesbury in New South Wales, at Gatton in Queensland, and in other parts of the Commonwealth. We know also that the State departments have disseminated excellent bulletins, by which means useful instruction has been given. But we ought to go a step further. It is absolutely necessary that we should have some central federalizing agency, by which the experiences of any one State could be brought to bear upon the experiences of another. In Queensland we have at the present time an absolute shortage in the supply of seed wheat, and we have been compelled to draw our supplies from South Australia. If there had been a central agency to afford us some practical information as to the various kinds of seed wheat which we were drawing from that State, that knowledge would have been worth many thousands of pounds to Queensland. But we have not, at the present time, that centralizing agency. I submit, further, that we ought to have a central department of the description I have named, for the reason that a great many of the powers which the States formerly possessed, and which could have been used to encourage agriculture have now passed over to the Commonwealth. Take, for instance, the Telegraph department. One of the features of the department of Agriculture in the United States of America, is the Weather Bureau. We have weather bureaux working on common lines in the various States, and my hope is that we shall have, at no distant date, a Federal weather bureau in Australia. If that bureau were established it would be able to supply to all parts of the Commonwealth information in regard to approaching storms and tempests, many of which have caused so much loss to agriculturists. It would also be able to supply information with respect to the likelihood of frosts in different localities, so that agriculturists would be in a position to take precautionary measures. Such precautions have been taken from time to time in Queensland. But the whole matter must be placed upon a sound basis. It is essential that we should have centres throughout the Commonwealth taking simultaneous observations, acting simultaneously, and sending their reports to the one centre. The Telegraph department has passed over to the Commonwealth, and honorable members know that without the telegraph a weather bureau is impossible. Another point to be remembered is that we have methods of encouraging agriculture by means of protective duties, or by granting bonuses, and it is well that we should have a department to advise us with respect to productions which might be assisted by bonuses. Laws regulating trade and commerce have also passed into the hands of the Commonwealth, as well as laws relating to external affairs—powers probably carrying with them the appointment of agents abroad to supply us with information with regard to produce grown in other lands, and also as to produce imported into the Commonwealth, but which could be grown here. Even the power to make mail contracts has passed over to the Federation, and honorable members must realize to what an extent the pastoralists and the agriculturists can be assisted by us if in making oversea mail contracts we see that ships are selected that can be made available for the conveyance of our produce across the sea. I have mentioned only a few of the powers which have been taken over by the Commonwealth; I dare say there are many others which will occur to honorable members. If we take all these functions, gathered together, and also add to them such an important matter as the collection of statistical information, we shall see that there have passed over to the Commonwealth large powers that could be exercised for the benefit of the agriculturists, if a department such as I have suggested were created to assist them. I was pleased also to observe in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech a reference to the fact that the Government do not intend to allow the burden of a white Australia to fall upon Queensland and New South Wales alone.

I think that when the question of a white Australia was before this House, honorable members were practically unanimous in the opinion that the citizenship of Australia should be preserved for European races. It was felt that Queensland, owing to her peculiar position, had thrown in her midst black races, which honorable members representing the southern States considered were practically a menace to the citizenship of Australia. Honorable members from the south said that such a state of affairs should no longer be tolerated; and those who represented the north discussed the question with them, and appreciated their action. We contend, however, that as Queensland has come into the federal union, and is joining with the south in its demand that the country should be rid of black labour, she can turn round with justice and say to the south—"If you are going to have an equality of benefit, there should also be an equality of burden." I propose to quote some figures bearing on the subject from a letter which was written by Sir John See, on 3rd February last. As to the accuracy of the figures, I must ask the House not to rely upon me for the authority. Sir John See said that the burden of a white Australia fell on the States as follows:—In South Australia it was practically equal to 6d. per ton of sugar consumed; in Victoria it amounted to 1s. 9d. per ton; in Western Australia, 3s. 9d. per ton; in Tasmania, 8s. 5d. per ton; in Queensland, 14s. 3d. per ton; and in New South Wales, 16s. 2d. per ton of sugar consumed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Sir John See was referring to something that was going to be done.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I hope that what is going to be done by the Government will rectify that state of affairs.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The letter quoted by the honorable and learned member referred to something that was going to be done at that time.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Although the proposal may not have been on exactly the same lines as this, it involved somewhat the same principle. It was on somewhat the same lines. That is to say, the bulk of the burden fell upon New South Wales and Queensland, although, as a matter of fact, the benefit of a white Australia is one in which all Australia is interested. There are many other measures named in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech to which I should like to refer, but I have simply taken a few matters which I think are of urgent importance. Judging from the general tenor of His Excellency the Governor-General's speech, and the list of Bills which are proposed, I believe that if we act as we acted during the last session of Parliament we shall do a great deal to cement the Australian union.

Mr. CLARKE (Cowper).—I have very much pleasure indeed in seconding the adoption of the address in reply to His Excellency's speech. My task is rendered somewhat easy, owing to the very patriotic and learned speech which has been delivered by the proposer of the address. I do not intend to enter into the details of the various measures which are forecasted in His Excellency's speech; but, as this marks the second stage in the work of the Federal Parliament, I should like briefly to refer to what has taken place in the past session. In their cooler moments honorable members can now look back upon it, possibly, with varying degrees of feeling. We have passed through what may be regarded as a very stormy session, but the contentious matters which were bound to occupy the attention of any Federal Parliament during its first session have been disposed of, and I take it that, whatever feelings of irritation or soreness may have been created as a consequence of the legislation passed during that session—feelings which were bound to have been created where our system of party government prevails—have happily passed away, and that we may now join together in keeping up a record which I believe this Parliament is fairly entitled to claim. I was very much pleased the other day on reading a summary of the work of the first session of the Federal Parliament, published by a newspaper in the old country. After briefly enumerating the measures we had passed, the verdict given by that particular journal was that the work of the first session of the Federal Parliament was a world's record of democratic legislation. Coming as it does from quite an independent source, I think that declaration is very gratifying. The speech before us contains references to measures which are of a distinctly non-party character, and I can only reiterate what the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has suggested in his speech, that it is our duty to comply in every respect with the terms of the Constitution. It is our duty to establish a High Court, and the other measures which are strictly laid down in the Federal Constitution, because federation will not, indeed, be complete until those matters have been fully dealt with, and any postponement or dallying with them would be a violation of the Constitution itself. I desire to say a word or two upon the question of the selection of a site for the federal capital. That is a matter which particularly affects the State from which I come, but it is not on that account so much that I wish to refer to it now. I am pleased to see that it occupies a prominent position in the Governor-General's speech. I am anxious to see the site of the federal capital selected as early as possible, so that the terms of the Constitution may be complied with, and so that at least one serious cause of provincial jealousy may be removed. The matter is one which no doubt requires a good deal of consideration and care, as the site chosen is to be the site of the capital of the Commonwealth for all time. It is, therefore, not advisable to rush hastily into the matter; but, at the same time, I cannot agree with those who suggest that the selection of the site should be indefinitely postponed. With regard to the naval defence subsidy which we shall be asked to consider, whilst I am quite prepared to support the proposal for an increased naval subsidy, in our present financial condition, I can only regard that proposal as a temporary expedient. I hope that the day will come, and that it will not be very long in coming, when we shall be able to equip and maintain an Australian navy of our own. We should, I think, be placing ourselves in a false position, and in a position which no self-respecting people could submit to for any length of time, if we allowed ourselves to be regarded by some prominent public men in the old country as occupying the position of mendicants, by paying what is thought by them to be an insufficient sum for our naval protection. Whilst I admit that the sum is very small, it is not so much a question of the amount paid as of the principle and sentiment underlying its payment. We cannot expect to go on in this way, paying a subsidy from year to year, and making no attempt whatever to encourage and foster the desire for the self-protection of our own country. I hope that encouragement will be given to the growth of volunteer naval reserves. The principle has been laid down, and I think rightly laid down, with regard to our military forces that we should rely to a very great extent upon our citizen soldiers. If that principle is good as applied to one branch of our defence, I think it should be equally good as applied to the other. I am pleased to see that the Government have been able to announce in His Excellency's speech that they will shortly introduce a uniform patents law. We know the troubles which have existed in the past, and which exist at the present time in connexion with patents. We know that if any of our mechanics of an inventive turn of mind, wish to secure a patent for their inventions, they have to make application in the six different States of the Commonwealth. That is the cause of a great deal of trouble, irritation, and delay, to say nothing of the expense involved. I hope therefore, that this Bill will shortly be introduced, and will be such as will give satisfaction to the people of Australia. Like the honorable and learned member who preceded me, I may regret that the time at our disposal is so short. If the life of the Parliament were to last five years, I think we should still have some matters of urgency that we would like to have considered. But there is one matter which I should like to see the Government take in hand at the earliest possible moment. I do not think it is a matter which requires legal enactment, but it is one which may properly be dealt with by regulation. I refer to the adoption of a uniform system of postage throughout the Commonwealth. By that I mean the adoption of a uniform Commonwealth stamp which may be legally used in any part of Australia. With regard to the banking laws also, to which some slight reference is made in the speech, I hope that in time to come it will be considered the function and the duty of the Commonwealth to take over the bank-note issue. It does seem to me an anomalous thing that the bank notes of one State are not negotiable in another State unless an exchange is paid. That is a handicap and a cause of irritation which should not exist within a Commonwealth, and could be avoided by the Government taking over the issue of bank notes. We have sufficient work outlined in His Excellency's speech to occupy our close attention during the time which remains before the dissolution of this Parliament. I hope I shall not be thought guilty of insincerity when I say that I feel quite sure that it is the earnest desire of every member, no matter upon which side of the House he sits, to expedite legislation as much as possible, and to make this Parliament one which can be looked up to by the other Parliaments of Australia, and one also which might be considered a credit to any part of the world. I have very much pleasure in seconding the adoption of the address in reply to His Excellency's opening speech.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I should like to begin my remarks by making an observation which I think will meet, not only with the concurrence of the honorable members of this Chamber, but also with the approval of the people of Australia—that is to express the sense of satisfaction I feel that in selecting a successor to the first Governor-General of Australia, our most distinguished and highly-esteemed friend, Lord Hopetoun—His Majesty has exercised a most agreeable choice in selecting the present holder of that distinguished office, Lord Tennyson. With reference to the speech delivered by my honorable and learned friend the member for Darling Downs, I think that, in one sense, he may be said to have set a parliamentary record by it. During my experience of public life—extending over 23 years—I think I never yet heard a speech in which the subject of the motion was more cleverly eluded. I had some vague idea that we were discussing the Governor-General's speech, but I did not discover that until my honorable friend the member for Cowper began his observations. My honorable friend the member for Cowper sets us all such an honorable example by the rarity of his speeches that, even in listening to him, I had a painful anxiety lest it should happen to be the last address which he would make to us in the present Parliament. But it is an honorable record which I am sure we might all endeavour to imitate as far as possible. The House will, however, I am convinced, feel, that in what I consider it my duty to say, I cannot altogether escape from the responsibilities which attach to the position which I hold. I think that honorable members of this House, and the public too, will expect that, upon an occasion of this sort, I should review the political situation, I am afraid at some length. My hope is, however, that the remarks which I make will be taken as representative of the party which I have the honour to lead, and that in that sense they may help after all to shorten the general discussion. I trust that the conditions under which the members of this House listened to the Governor-General's speech to-day will not be repeated upon another occasion. I do not know what the rule may have been in the Parliament of Victoria, but I do know that so far as my own State is concerned the arrangements are very different. I think we all found ourselves in a very novel position—as if we were suppliants at the doors of another chamber. I understand that the procedure which was followed to-day imitated the procedure of one State, but, with every admiration for the procedure of that State, I do not think that it should be repeated on another occasion in connexion with the opening of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish also to say that I unfortunately am afflicted with a pretty good political memory, and when I listened to the Governor-General's speech to-day I could not help remembering that very notable occasion when the Prime Minister and my honorable and learned friend, the Minister for Trade and Customs, and the Attorney-General, and the Minister for Home Affairs assembled in a country town in New South Wales upon the occasion—the memorable and historical occasion—upon which the first Prime Minister of Australia delivered a manifesto speech to the people of these States. It was a very great occasion, and the speech was one—although I might differ from some of its contentions—that was fully worthy of the position which my right honorable friend the Prime Minister holds. But if on that occasion there had been present some flashlight photographer gifted with the power of prophecy, who could have thrown upon the wall of that chamber that night the remarkable results of two and a half years of practical experience, the effect would certainly have been startling. Because there were two measures which the Prime Minister and his colleagues that night, in that considered address, put before the people of Australia as of supreme urgency. There were two other matters which the Prime Minister put before the people of Australia as matters which should not be hastened—as matters concerning which there should be great care and deliberation. The first matters I allude to were the High Court and the Inter-State Commission Bill. The Prime Minister described the High Court as the bulwark of the rights of individuals in this Commonwealth, of the rights of the States, and of the rights of the Commonwealth also. He described the measure for its establishment as a Bill which should be passed through Parliament with the least possible delay. In making that statement I think that the Prime Minister was absolutely correct, and appreciated, thoroughly and faithfully, the duty of his Ministry. But we are told in this House to-day that the Judiciary Bill was pushed aside by measures of greater urgency. I consider that without the High Court we have no Constitution at all, and that the rights of the people of this country are absolutely in a position which is a disgrace to the Government and to this House.

Mr. RONALD.—Question.

Mr. REID.—Of course I am only expressing my opinion in saying that, and I am fortified by the remarks made by the Prime Minister in that speech. But there is another authority equally high. I look toward my honorable and learned friend the Attorney-General—I feel almost inclined to say my right honorable friend, so great is my personal esteem for him. The Attorney-General in that brilliant and masterly address which he made in moving the second reading of the Judiciary Bill in March, 1902, laid down in words which would suffer if I endeavoured to condense them, the position of affairs in this Commonwealth in reference to that subject. He said that there are “three fundamental conditions” of any federation.

First, the establishment of a Supreme Constitution.

That is our Federal Constitution, which we have.

The next is a distribution of powers under that Constitution.

And then he added this remark—

The third is an authority reposed in a judiciary to interpret that Supreme Constitution, and to decide as to the precise distribution of powers.

The first and second absolutely depend for their effect upon the third.

Now, that is a statement of the Attorney-General in moving the second reading of that Bill in March last year. The Attorney-General stated upon that occasion that the Bill had been drafted for twelve months. That is, it was drafted in March, 1901, and the fact that the Ministry did not make that the first measure of their last session was a singular departure from their duty, and their declarations to the people. I do not wish to impute any motives, but, if any member of the Ministry is to occupy a seat on that Bench—and I am proud that there are Ministers absolutely fit for any such position, who would reflect honor upon it—

Mr. CONROY.—No.

Mr. REID.—At any rate that is my opinion, and I do not wish to conceal it. It is a measure which should never have been allowed to fall into the list of remnants, as it was. At the rate at which it was dealt with, it would have been passed last session no doubt before we prorogued; but I think there was such a strong feeling in the House that, since so great a delay had occurred, it would be a wrong thing that it should go into law under those conditions. The greatest of the duties of a first Federal Ministry is the selection of the occupants of that High Court tribunal, and I suppose there is not a man in this Chamber who will not admit that if ever there is an occasion upon which the ability and patriotism of Ministers will be tested, it will be in the selection of the High Court Bench. There was a strong feeling in the House that such a selection should be made in the presence of the Parliament, and not during a recess, and that feeling I think was honorable to the House.

Mr. CONROY.—The House would not trust them.

Mr. REID.—I hope that my honorable and learned friend will allow me to speak. I wish it to be distinctly understood that the remark would equally well apply to any Ministry that happened to hold office. I am not making any personal reference to present Ministers. I am speaking of the matter entirely apart from them. However, the House felt that it should not be done in that way.

Mr. CROUCH.—Was not the Bill withdrawn to keep Senator O'Connor in the Senate? I understood that that statement was made in Tasmania.

Mr. REID.—I do not wish to say or to impute anything of the sort.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member did in one of his speeches in Tasmania, if the press is correct.

Mr. REID.—If I said so, it is all right; it was the source of the quotation that inspired me with want of confidence. My observation, if I made any, with reference to that distinguished man, was one of the most friendly character. There is no man in Australia of whom I have a higher opinion than that distinguished man, and, without being personal, I think he is the only Minister who has shown a capacity for navigating the vessel of State. I can understand even a Ministry led by myself yielding to the temptation of retaining the services of such a man as long as possible. But if we succumbed to temptation, as the honorable and learned member for Corio once did, when he flew at an advancing brigade, I hope we should be pardoned. There was another matter of supreme urgency, which the Prime Minister put before the people of Australia as a second bulwark, which was to guarantee equality of trade throughout the Commonwealth—it was to be the other great measure which must be passed without delay. We know the melancholy history of that Bill: it got into the hands of the Minister for Home Affairs, and we know what happened after that. There were but two things which the Prime Minister insisted should not be expedited, should hang fire. He pointed out that it would be a very difficult thing to incorporate the post and telegraph systems of six States, and to bring the military forces of six States together, and that time must be taken, the utmost care and deliberation must be exercised before those two departments were taken over, so that when they were taken over the Commonwealth could manage them efficiently. Now, five weeks after he made that statement to the people of Australia those two departments were taken over, and the result has been nothing but chaos ever since. I do not wish to reflect for one moment upon the Ministers in charge of the two departments. If they were the best administrators in the world—I do not say they are—the same result might easily have followed. If, instead of doing what the Ministry did, they had done the wise thing which the Prime Minister said they would do, and had given these two Ministers a chance of working out a scheme for those great services before they were taken over, there would have been a vast difference in the experience of the people of the Commonwealth. There was no necessity to delay appointing the Ministers, because they could be very fully employed long before the departments were taken over. So that the two great things which were to be done at once have not been done, and the two great things which were to be done slowly, were done at once. Passing away from that, I have to express my regret that the Ministry have dropped one of those measures which were paraded before the people of Australia two and a half years ago in the forefront of the Ministerial programme. The old men of Australia were told that the Government intended to establish a Commonwealth old-age pension system. It was a deliberate bid for the support of those people all through Australia. Any man who had the slightest knowledge of the Braddon clause knew that it was impossible to establish a national system under a provision which compelled the nation to pay away 15s. of every £1 it raised through the Custom house. If a million a year were required, as it well might be, for a national system, under our Constitution it meant raising £4,000,000 in order to get £1,000,000.

Mr. WATSON.—Not by direct taxation, surely!

Mr. REID.—I am not speaking of the Ministry that is to be. I am speaking of this Ministry, whose platform is indirect taxation—only taxation through the Custom-house. My honorable friend will see that it is on that basis I am criticising the conduct of the Ministry in putting out that bait to the people of Australia before the general election. A measure was mentioned in the first Governor-General's speech; it is not mentioned to-day, and it cannot be mentioned for the next seven or eight years, as long as the Braddon clause remains in the Constitution. That is a bait still, and it will not come up again until the general election after next.

Mr. RONALD.—It is dead!

Mr. REID.—I hope it is not dead, because the idea is a good one if it can be carried out; but it is of no use to deceive the people with promises about Bills which it is impossible to carry. I do not consider that sort of electioneering creditable to any Ministry. I want now to refer briefly to one or two events of the recess. Honorable members will admit that I am entitled on this occasion to make some reference to the actions of Ministers whilst parliamentary observation has been withheld. I intend to exercise that right now, and I hope only upon this one occasion during the session. This is the time in which to do it, and, having done it, I think we can get on with business. During the recess we have had a number of Ministerial addresses. I cherish no sort of vindictiveness against the Ministry for their choice of the Minister of Home Affairs as my political follower. It seemed that he was thought by the Ministry to be the proper man to follow me wherever I went. But he labours under some honourable disqualifications. He is so profoundly sensitive as to the accuracy of every statement he makes that he invariably becomes exceedingly dull, so that when he finishes an address his auditors go away with the feeling that after all there is little to be said in favour of the first Federal Ministry. That being so, I look upon my honorable friend as a very agreeable personage to meet in political encounters. But as for the Prime Minister, the eminence of his position, and the gravity of his manner in dealing with public affairs, gives a weight to his utterances which cannot always be disregarded. Many of his statements, of course, are not worthy of attention in this House, because in all political addresses there is a great deal of attack and criticism which should not be referred to here. But the statements to which I am about to refer were of a serious character, and set me absolutely in the wrong light before the people of Australia. In the first place, the Prime Minister, in the course of his addresses to the people of Tasmania, made a number of statements which were unfair, not only to myself, but to the party whom I lead. He charged the Opposition with having caused the loss of the proposed duty on tea. It is said that the tea duty is a strong line in Tasmania. The Prime Minister had not much to say about it when he at last ventured to speak in the Town Hall, Sydney. He is, I know, the last man in the world to make in cold blood a statement which he does not believe to be absolutely correct; and in dealing with his remarks I wish it to be understood that I do not question his desire to be accurate—I only lament his inability to be so. It was only because a number of his own followers voted against the proposed duty on tea that the duty was not agreed to by the House. A large number of Ministerialists voted against the duty, while a large number of members of the Opposition voted with the Government.

Mr. THOMSON. — Proportionately, the members of the Opposition voting with the Government were more than the followers of the Government who voted against the proposal.

Mr. REID. — Yes, yet the Prime Minister put the Opposition in the position of having defeated the proposed duty. Personally, I do not mind it, because I am proud of the vote, though I think that, under proper circumstances, a duty on tea is one of the fairest revenue taxes in the world, since all the money collected goes into the Treasury. That is a great recommendation for a tax intended to obtain revenue. But why did the Prime Minister forget facts to such an extent as he did? May I remind him how tenacious the Ministry were in regard to the duty on salt. There is a salt mine in the State which the Minister for Customs represents, and honorable members surely do not forget the terrific conflict which occurred here between those who wished for a heavy duty upon salt and those who did not. There was quite a balancing of forces, so that several gentlemen whose amiability exceeded their sense of straightness more than once, I believe, voted on both sides of the question.

Mr. WATSON. — Some of the members of the Opposition voted for the duty upon salt.

Mr. REID. — Some of them did, though, as a whole, the Opposition tried to reduce it. Whilst the Ministry fought to the death for a heavy duty upon salt—and not for the amount of revenue they expected to receive from it—when the Treasurer proposed to recommit the proposed duty on tea, from which £400,000 or £500,000 per annum could have been obtained, the honorable member for Bland told him that if the tea duty were included in the items to be recommitted he would divide the House upon the question, and the tea duty was not recommitted. Why had not the Ministry the pluck to do for £500,000 of revenue one tenth of what they did for the salt-pan men of South Australia? In the second place, the Prime Minister, knowing that Tasmania had just gone through a fever of income tax, and was in a condition of ferocity in reference to all proposals for direct taxation, forgot that it is as much a plank in the platform of the Opposition as of the Government that the Federal Parliament shall not be used for the introduction of measures of direct taxation. I have made the announcement half-a-dozen times.

Mr. RONALD. — Oh!

Mr. REID. — I have, and I cannot help it if the honorable member has not heard it. I have made the statement time after time in a most public manner. I have said that it was much better to leave each State to manage its own affairs in that respect. That being so, and there having been a fever regarding the income tax in Tasmania, the Prime Minister did not hesitate to associate the policy of direct taxation with the Opposition. Now, it is bad to have a forgetful memory, but it is good to forget when it happens to be useful at a particular time. Following upon this, the members of the Opposition and myself were accused of trying to draw the colour line in Australia, and the Prime Minister spoke of some of his own followers in tones of regret. He said that he regretted that some of his own followers had supported me in this respect. I regret to say that another remark was made by the Prime Minister at the meeting which was held in the Town Hall, Sydney. This did not come under my notice till yesterday. I was in Tasmania when the Prime Minister spoke in Sydney, and as I am not so keen as I used to be about reading reports of speeches, it was only when I was looking over some papers yesterday that I came across the statement to which I wish to call the serious attention of the House and of the Prime Minister. The right honorable gentleman is reported as having spoken of the action of the Opposition in reference to the Immigration Restriction Act in this way—

The Opposition tried to defeat the Act because they were leagued with those who want cheap labour throughout the Commonwealth. That was the game which I detected, and which I thank God I defeated. The leader of the Opposition, who could enter into that unholy combination, is the man who talks to you about thimble rigging. That is a statement which, if it came from an honorable member below the gangway, would not demand any great attention, but coming as it does from the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth it calls for serious notice, and I desire now in the warmest manner and in the strongest terms to repudiate it. It was an infamous statement to make, and if the right honorable gentleman has any authority for it I hope he will produce it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—From what newspaper is the right honorable gentleman quoting?

Mr. REID.—From the Sydney Morning Herald. If the right honorable gentleman denies the accuracy of the report, I shall be glad to accept his denial. The statement, however, is made at considerable length and repeated more than once. I wish to point out—and it is only right that I should do so—the kind of company in which I found myself at the time when, according to the Prime Minister, I was in league with the capitalists of Australasia in order to bring cheap labour into the Commonwealth. Every member of the labour party voted upon the same side as I did.

Mr. McDONALD.—Hear, hear; and they will do so again.

Mr. REID.—This remark of the Prime Minister's is a kind of boomerang. If I am in league with those who wish to bring cheap labour into the Commonwealth, and the labour party voted as I did, they must also be in league with the capitalists of Australia, or they cannot have sufficient intelligence to know what they are doing. Either the labour members were allowing themselves to be made use of by those who were in league with the capitalists, or they were not. The remark was unworthy of the Prime Minister. No man in Australia has pursued a more independent course than I have done in reference to the capitalists. When I had the powers of State in my hands in New South Wales, I took a course in reference to the capitalists' interests—I say this without egotism, because it is simply an historical truth—which no public man had had the courage to adopt before. I opposed that interest with a land tax and an income tax, and I never refer to such matters without feeling that the last reproach that should be cast upon me is that I am an ally of those who wish to bring cheap labour into the Commonwealth. The object of making such a statement does not redeem it. The object is not a good one. It is intended to injure my public character, and I say that charges injurious to a man's public character should not be made unless there is proof behind them. To attempt to say that I have had any sort of an alliance with the capitalists of Australia in relation to the introduction of cheap labour is to utter an absurdity. In my public career I have been singularly free—perhaps owing to my poverty—from any kind of political or business connexion with the capitalists' interests, and it is one of the consolations of poverty that a man's independence seems to be greater the poorer he is.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REID.—It is remarkable that the Prime Minister also took this ground in Sydney. He claimed great credit for the Government for facing the prospect of defeat in connexion with the Immigration Restriction Act. He could not face actual defeat with equanimity; that would be too trying to the nerves, but he said, "We faced almost defeat in our determination to carry that Bill." But I pointed out that there was a reason why the Government had a backbone for once. It was because Mr. Chamberlain had put it there. The Ministry had rendered it impossible for them to listen to the suggestions of honorable members, because they had previously announced to the Secretary of State for the Colonies that his views were theirs. I objected to that statement at the time, and the answer given by the Prime Minister was that the Government were not influenced by Mr. Chamberlain's views, because they had the Bill in type before his despatch was sent. That, however, was not the point. My point was that a Ministry, coming face to face with this Parliament in connexion with a matter of great national importance, should not have given themselves away to a British Minister before the discussion began. And it is rather singular to read the statements made by the Prime Minister in view of the declaration of one of his colleagues who—with the exception, perhaps, of the Minister of Defence—weighs his words more carefully than any other member of the Government. I shall show the House that the policy for which the Opposition voted in reference to the colour line, as it is called, was outlined in the Senate by the Vice-President of the Executive Council soon after the meeting of Parliament. My honorable and learned friend Senator O'Connor is not given to rash statements, and it is very extraordinary that we should find in the report of the debate upon the Governor-General's speech, at page 127 of Hansard, the following remarks:—

Senator CHARLESTON. — Will the honorable gentleman explain to what extent the Government intend to restrict the immigration of Asiatics, Hindoos, and Japanese?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The principle that is intended to be followed is that all alien coloured labour is to be shut out.

There is no talk about dodging these unfortunates with the language test, which actually enables them to secure admission to the Commonwealth if they can pass it. Senator O'Connor tells us that—

The principle that is intended to be followed is that all alien coloured labour is to be shut out.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Aliens only?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—How about British subjects?

Senator O'CONNOR.—British subjects are dealt with in many places as coloured labour. It is impossible to deal with British subjects on the same footing as you deal with other coloured people—but there is a way of dealing with them by the education test, which is known to operate very successfully in some countries.

That is to say that the alien coloured labour would be shut out absolutely, and that the educational dodge would shut out coloured British subjects. Here we have a statement made by the Vice-President of the Executive Council at the opening of last session. He goes on to say—

It is only a question of the assent by the King to legislation dealing with British subjects. However, that is a matter which does not affect the question put to me by Senator Charleston. His question is in regard to Asiatics.

Thus, at the beginning of last session, a statement of the policy for which we voted and fought was given by the Vice-President of the Executive Council; so that it really seems to me that a line of criticism has been followed that is scarcely fair to the Opposition. The Prime Minister also spoke of an intention on the part of the Opposition to rip up the whole of the Tariff which has just been passed, and expose the House and the country to another twelve months of fiscal wrangling. Now, with reference to a statement of that sort, I do not make any complaint, because it is quite open to the Prime Minister to form that view of what our course would be in the absence of any explicit statement on the point. But I wish to take advantage of this opportunity—which I suppose is a very good and fair one—to put in the most deliberate way the true position of the Opposition upon this question of the Tariff. It is more satisfactory to both sides to have the position cleared up as much as possible. Of course, it is impossible to clear it up absolutely, but I wish to purify the atmosphere as far as I can, and I desire it to be understood that, so far as the Opposition are concerned, we have no policy of that sort. We do propose, however, to deal with items in that Tariff which were intended to destroy revenue—not to produce revenue—and to reduce the duties upon them to a more reasonable limit.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Could that be done without opening up the whole question?

Mr. REID.—I think so, because there are a large number of items in the Tariff which are revenue producing items. With reference to other items, the duties upon which range beyond that point and become in our estimation destructive of revenue, our principles compel us to endeavour to put the Tariff upon what we conceive to be a sound basis.

Mr. McCAY.—The only duties which were not opposed by the Opposition were those imposing 10 per cent.; consequently 90 per cent. of the Tariff would be opened up.

Mr. REID.—I do not know that every vote which is given in committee upon a Tariff is an infallible index to the policy of the Prime Minister, or of the man who aspires to occupy the position in the due course of nature. The remark of the honorable and learned member, however, scarcely deals with the matter to which I was referring. So far from having any desire to waste the time of the people in wrangling about the Tariff, I wish to minimize that wrangling as much as I can. But I want to answer the statements made by the Ministry to the effect that I should take another course. Of course the Ministry would be content if I got up and said—"I will not interfere with the Tariff for a few years;" but honorable members will see at once the absolute unfairness of the adoption of such a course, on my part, to the manufacturing industries of Australia. How can I as a man who possesses at least the rudiments of a desire to be fair, even to those who are not with me—how can I as a public man, in view of an impending election, postpone an attempt to interfere with that Tariff until industries have been affected by its operation? It would put me in an absolutely unfair position. I want to interfere as little as possible with flesh and blood. Undoubtedly, one of the hardest tasks of financial reform is when it takes the aspect of unfairness of that sort. I do not want to multiply these difficulties by standing by and holding my hand. If either the original or the amended Tariff had been before the people at the last election I should have felt absolutely bound by their decision. But our position is that the Prime Minister conveyed—I do not say intentionally—a wrong impression to the people of the character of the Tariff which he intended to introduce. I make that statement and I appeal to the electors either to justify me or to justify him. If they justify him, then I can fairly and honourably leave this question alone. Then the tribunal which I acknowledge, and to which I have appealed, will have pronounced against me, and I shall feel it a matter of honour to respect its decision. When people build upon the faith of such a decision, I should be very slow, indeed, to raise the question again. That is the position occupied by the representatives of Victoria, but it is not my position. I feel that I have no right to twist the policy of Australia merely for the purpose of assisting those who have been parties to a protective policy in any one State. But other men who have been parties to that policy are in a very different position, and I make full allowance for them. I wish it to be distinctly understood that that is the policy of the Opposition. I suppose I shall meet with the general assent of honorable members upon both sides of the House when I say that I have no desire to hold back and keep my opinions upon important subjects until the Government have, perhaps, made a mistake, although in the matter to which I intend to refer, I do not say they would have done so. But it is only candid on my part, before the Government have announced their intentions upon the subject, to express my view with reference to the appeal to the people, which cannot be very long delayed. I do not think there are many honorable members who would allow any personal feeling or private interest to interfere with the public convenience. I feel absolutely sure they would not. Knowing that, I strongly put it as a matter for consideration on the part of the Government, that it would not conduce to the public convenience to have two great political contests within a comparatively short space of time—that it would be a glaring breach of every sound principle of economy to spend £50,000 twice in three months when one expenditure of that amount would suffice. There is no necessity to dissolve this House until the proper time. But I do say that since the Senatorial elections must take place in December—and I am now merely expressing my own opinion—it would be well if members of this Chamber went to the country at such a time as would enable the two elections to be held simultaneously. I do hope that that is the decision at which the Government will arrive. I wish to add as a corollary of that statement that if there is to be an election in December it would be grossly unfair to honorable members who are compelled to remain here attending to their parliamentary duties to keep the House sitting at a time when they have a right to be appearing before their constituents for the purpose of explaining their conduct and justifying their actions. It would be the reverse of just to allow other candidates unlimited opportunities for opposing them at a time when they were tied to attendances in this Chamber. From what I have said it follows as a matter of fairness to their constituents as well as to honorable members themselves—because if there is one right which constituents have more than another, it is to demand at the hands of their representatives a proper account of their stewardship when they seek re-election, and that cannot be forthcoming in some electorates in any brief space of time—that the prorogation should take place early in October. I have absolutely no desire to display any sort of factious opposition during the interval which must elapse before the close of this session. So far as the last prolonged session is concerned, I may fairly say that except as to matters of vital principle about which we were very seriously concerned, the Opposition did not show any venomous or factious spirit. Honorable members on the Government side will make great allowance for the Opposition when we are fighting principles in which we keenly believe, and which we think are closely and vitally associated with the interests of the country; and if occasionally, under the circumstances of last session, the Opposition got to a pitch which might seem undue, I feel sure that will not be remembered against us by any fair-minded man. I wish most earnestly to co-operate with the Government in passing some of the measures which have been mentioned. It is only fair, however, that I should venture to ask the Government to be instructed by the experience of last session. The Government must admit that it is a failure of the grasp of parliamentary business not to make up a proper programme at the start, and to adhere to and carry that programme. There are circumstances in which, I admit, unexpected events may cause some alteration in a Ministerial plan; but there is absolutely no excuse for a Ministry taking up a large measure such as an Inter-State Bill, a Judiciary Bill, or a Defence Bill, and, after wasting several nights in its consideration, dropping it for the rest of the session. That is sheer waste of time—of effort. It is effort which may be useful in the sense that honorable members become advisory clerks to the Ministry as to how a Bill should be drawn up on another occasion; but that is not a use to which Parliament should be put. The Ministry should frame a policy clearly and sensibly, and put the most important measures in the forefront of their programme, keep them there, and pass them. If the House shirks the measures, the Government should compel the House to deal with them; and I hope the Government will not repeat the mistakes of last session, but will definitely make up their minds—and adhere to their plan—as to the Bills to be passed in the limited time at our disposal. In reference to the Judiciary Bill I heartily approve of the course which the Government are taking—late in the day as it is—of placing the Bill in the forefront for the session; and I ask the Government to act fairly by the House. It is of no use putting this Bill in the forefront of the speech of the Governor-General, and after beginning its consideration at the commencement of our labours, allowing it to drift away until the end of the session. This is a Bill which Australia in every direction is demanding.

MR. A. McLEAN.—I have not heard any demand for it.

MR. REID.—That is because the honorable member has no grievance. If the honorable member felt that the Government had been wronging him he would desire such a tribunal to be established; nobody seems to want a High Court except those who are wronged. But this Court was intended as a vital part of the Constitution—as vital a part as the existence of the Ministry; and I do not think any one could take up any other position. I have to refer to one or two questions of administration which have arisen during the recess. In the first place, I want to deal with an important matter in which, again, I think both sides of the House are equally interested—that is, the necessity for careful, prompt, and efficient work in connexion with the Electoral Act. And in this connexion I have a serious charge to make with reference to the conduct of the Government. Honorable members will admit that it is very necessary the head of the Electoral department for all Australia—on the creation of such a department for the first time—should be a thoroughly competent man. I am sorry to say that the appointment which the Government has made has excited in my mind a feeling of astonishment; and for this I shall give my reason. I do not wish to repeat newspaper gossip, but it is stated that some other gentleman was recommended for the office by the Minister of Home Affairs, and that a minute went to the Executive Council, but was sent back.

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not correct.

MR. REID.—I did not wish to make a statement of the kind until I was in a place where it could be answered at once; it is of no use making a statement, and then allowing a day to elapse before it can be answered. I am very pleased to hear that the statement is wrong, and I now come to the officer who has been appointed. I wish it to be clearly understood that I speak with every feeling of respect for the individual—for the personal character and standing of the gentleman concerned, my observations being based entirely on official experience. This gentleman, Mr. Lewis, was retired on a pension in New South Wales about twenty years ago.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I do not think that is so.

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not half that length of time.

MR. REID.—My authority is better than that of either the Prime Minister or the Minister for Home Affairs; it is so absolutely sufficient for me that I cannot at this moment accept a correction. Of course, I may be willing to accept it afterwards, but my authority is such that it justifies me—

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member is making some very wild statements.

MR. REID.—I take the responsibility for my statements, and I took pains to get the information before I spoke. The pension of the officer I speak of was decided, and he was to have retired from the Lands office during the Premiership of Sir Alexander Stewart, who held office twenty years ago. After the pension was fixed, Mr. Lewis was employed in some other capacity; and during the long period since—and perhaps this is where the Minister for Home Affairs may be mistaken—his pension has been held in abeyance subject to certain work he was doing in the public service of New South Wales. Mr. Lewis was for many years a draughtsman. He had been in the Lands department, and it happened in some way that he was made an officer in connexion with the administration of the Local Government Act. When Premier, I was repeatedly brought into official contact with Mr. Lewis in connexion with a Local Government Bill which I tried to pass through Parliament; so that it will be seen I am not speaking lightly, but from absolute personal experience, and, I may say, without any feeling of unkindness to the officer. But I must say that I regard him as absolutely unfit for the position to which he has been appointed under the Commonwealth Electoral Act.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Mr. Lewis has done his work very well.

Mr. REID.—I do not think my honorable friend is a judge in some matters.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am a better judge than is the right honorable member.

Mr. REID.—The attitude of the Minister for Home Affairs is that which he usually assumes in regard to the individuals whom he appoints or tries to appoint. Mr. Lewis was Chief Electoral Officer in New South Wales, and was absolutely retired several years ago by the Public Service Board—the members of which may, I suppose, be considered to have some knowledge of the officers of the service—and a subordinate promoted to his place. Yet we find Mr. Lewis appointed as Chief Electoral Officer for the Australian Commonwealth. It is the most singularly bad appointment the Federal Government have made, and I express that opinion without the slightest feeling of unkindness to Mr. Lewis. The mere fact that this gentleman was finally retired by the Public Service Board from a similar position, is surely pretty good proof that he is not the person to solve the great electoral problems which now face him. Of course, I admit that the Minister is equal to working anything, and perhaps, with his assistance, Mr. Lewis may do remarkably well. But the man I should like to see associated with a vital matter like this is one with the requisite vigour and strength of purpose—one who could talk even to his Minister when it was necessary to do so. Mr. Lewis, however, has passed the prime of life, or, at all events, if he has not done so, he has passed that phase of energy and vigour which are absolutely required in such a department. He would not have been retired from the office which he held in New South Wales if he had been efficient. Surely, if he was not considered to be efficient enough to be kept in office in New South Wales—and the New South Wales Government paid him a pension in order to get him out of the service—this is not the way in which the Commonwealth should begin in such a matter as the appointment of its chief electoral officer. It is a bad beginning for us. I come now to a matter which the Prime Minister has anticipated would be interesting by laying on the table of the House to-night the papers referring to it. It brings up once more the Immigration Restriction Act. I take all the blame which can be fairly attachable to me if I happened to be away from the House when the Bill was being discussed. I ought to have been here, and Ministers can say that if I had been here I could have pointed out these things. But Ministers will admit that they often become wiser after the event. I do not know whether I shall express the opinion of the House in reference to paragraph (g) of section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act, under which the trouble arose with the six hatters; but I am not bringing the question forward as a matter of political capital against the Government in office. I do not desire any political controversy. I am prepared to leave it to the electors to deal with by-and-by. I wish, for the time we have left at our disposal during this session, to deal with the matters that are before us. Honorable members will recognise, however, that I am entitled to refer to these questions on this occasion. To do so clears the atmosphere in every way, and this is the only proper occasion on which to deal with them. I desire to say, with reference to the paragraph in the Act to which I have referred, that I do not believe there was any considerable number of honorable members in this House—certainly not a majority—who intended the section to work as it was supposed to work in the case of the hatters.

Mr. WATSON.—Question?

Mr. REID.—We shall see. It is a matter of opinion. I desire to define my position, and it is much better that I should do so now, and publicly. This is the first opportunity we have had to consider the matter in Parliament, and I wish to say in the strongest terms that if that Act was intended to prevent such men in such circumstances from landing in Australia, it should no longer stand on the statute-book of the Commonwealth.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not?

Mr. REID.—I am going to give my reasons, and I desire to be perfectly plain and clear in stating my position. Even those who differ from me will thank me for doing so. I absolutely believe in a provision of this kind which will prevent deceptive, fraudulent representations being made to people in other countries. I am not at all averse to a provision which would prevent the introduction of any sort of undesirable labour under any circumstances.

Mr. HIGGINS.—How would the right honorable gentleman draw the line?

Mr. REID.—I shall tell the honorable and learned member. Under this Act, if an agreement of the kind contemplated is entered into, it ceases to have any force the moment the man who comes here under it lands in Australia. Honorable members should not forget that fact. I do not speak of the man who is specially exempted. He is all right. I mean that, taking the case of the man who lands here, and who has not been specially exempted by the special proviso, by operation of law his agreement goes. The only question is one of deception—of a man going round the world and endeavouring to obtain cheap labour by false pretences. To keep any honest English, Irish, or Scottish artisan out of Australia in the way the hatters were treated is a disgrace to our national character. Let me tell my honorable friends, whose main principle is one which I am just as keen about as they are—I have been associated with it as long as they have been—that when you have great principles that you fight for, it is often as well not to expose those great principles to unmerited abuse and prejudice by going to a fanatical extreme in matters of detail. I assert that it shocked the conscience of the British Empire that a man who came out under perfectly honorable conditions, with his trade union introduction in his pocket—

Mr. THOMSON.—Accepted by the Sydney unions.

Mr. REID.—Yes. The papers which the Prime Minister has laid on the table of the House show that the hatters each brought a certificate for admission to the Australian union.

Mr. TUDOR.—They did not do so.

Mr. WATSON.—They were simply asked to show their bona fides; that was all.

Mr. REID.—One moment. I have the papers here. I know that the honorable member for Yarra, as a gentleman who is a hatter, takes a keen interest in this matter, and probably took a keen interest in it when the trouble arose, although his name does not appear.

Mr. McDONALD.—It is an extraordinary thing that six men were discharged from the factory in question.

Mr. REID.—That is a branch of the question with which I am not now dealing.

Mr. WATSON.—But the right honorable gentleman will not inquire into that point.

Mr. REID.—How can the honorable member say that I will not inquire into a matter of which I never heard before?

Mr. WATSON.—Because the right honorable gentleman objects to inquiry being made by the Government. I understand that is all the Government did.

Mr. REID.—I think the honorable member had better wait a moment.

Mr. WATSON.—I read the right honorable gentleman's Maitland speech.

Mr. REID.—I am glad that the honorable member did so.

Mr. WATSON.—I had to do so in view of what the right honorable gentleman said.

Mr. CONROY.—If those men had been coming to a Melbourne factory, would they have been stopped?

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes; the unions would have stopped them.

Mr. REID.—A copy of the introduction to the unions to which I referred is to be found in the papers just laid upon the table of the House by the Prime Minister. The certificate is headed—Amalgamated Society of Journeymen Felt Hatters.

Then follows the motto, and the words—

Established at Denton—

That is in the old country—

March, 1872. Amalgamated June 14, 1879.
Re-organized at Denton, February 1884.

Then follow these words—

This is to certify that the bearer, William Gee, is a member of the above society, and entitled to be asked for.

I do not know what the words "asked for" mean. The certificate is signed by "John Bennett, Secretary," and the following words are attached :—

This ticket must be presented to the National Secretary on arrival abroad, without delay.

Surely that is a quittance from one trades union to another trades union in Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At what stage was that certificate shown?

Mr. TUDOR.—After they were found out.

Mr. REID.—I do not want the honorable member to misunderstand me. I have no desire to deal with two things at the same time. I am not considering that aspect of the question at the present moment, but I shall do so later on. I am dealing with a statement which I made, and which was contradicted, that the men were trades unionists, who came out with an introduction from one trades union to another. The papers which the Prime Minister has laid upon the table show that to be the case. They include a copy of the certificate which was given to them in England. The wage at which they were engaged was £3 per week, and I suppose that even in Australia £3 a week does not represent a fraudulent offer. I shall deal now with the matter to which an honorable member opposite has referred. Before doing so, however, I repeat that I am responsible for this provision, because I am a member of the Parliament that passed it. If I was not here when the Bill was before the House, and did not think of it as I ought to have done, I must take my share of the blame. But I wish to say that I refuse to be a party, now that I see how the provision operates, to the policy of that paragraph in the Act. That is all. That is a clear declaration.

Mr. TUDOR.—The right honorable gentleman was present when the Bill was read a third time.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member knows what third readings are. We do not generally touch Bills at that stage. Moreover, this was a minor matter. We were not considering the sub-sections so much as the broad question involved in the main provisions in the Bill. That overshadowed everything, but if I had had a technical trade knowledge, I might have thought more about these matters. I desire to say, in the most open way, that I will not be a party to the continuance of this provision, in its present shape, on the statute-book of Australia. I come now to another point, and it is a very proper one to consider. Men who are familiar with these official documents will be able to read between the lines. If honorable members, when they have these papers placed in their hands, will look at the documents dated 3rd, 4th, and a number of other documents of about the same date, they will see this. It is no credit to an Australian trades union—and I do not believe the unions are responsible for it—but it is not a credit to Australian unionists that when these Englishmen were landed here, they should be driven round about and treated in a hospitable way, that a copy of their agreement should have been got from one of the men, and that it should have been sent to the Prime Minister, in order to secure the exclusion of these men from Australia. I say that no labour man believes in a sneaking course of that sort. Not one member of the labour party would do that. If he wished to keep a man out of Australia, he would not take him by the hand and get a copy of his agreement from him in order to do it. It is a contemptible thing, even for a hatter to do.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Who did it?

Mr. REID.—I do not know; no one can tell. I do not believe the hatters' union is to blame for it, because it was the act of an individual man; but it is a contemptible thing, and that it was done is shown by these documents. Listen to this: The secretary of the union writes to the right man, the Right Honorable C. C. Kingston. I suppose he thought that this English subject was a species of goods and chattels imported into Australia. Here is a letter addressed to the Right Honorable C. C. Kingston, and dated, Trades Hall, Melbourne, 4th December :—

Dear Sir,—Re my memo. of yesterday's date, I have the honour now of forwarding to you a copy of agreement supplied by one of the men who has come out to work at the Sydney Hat Mills.

That is from the secretary of the union. That agreement forwarded to the union in Melbourne was used against them. Surely that is not the way that working men stand by one another? It is not in our part of Australia, at any rate. It is a contemptible feature in this matter.

Mr. CROUCH.—How does the right honorable and learned member know that the hatter was not a party to it?

Mr. REID.—That is worthy of the honorable and learned member for Corio. The suggestion is that a man having come all the way to Australia under this agreement desired to get himself treated as an objectionable person, to be bundled out of Australia and back to England again. I cannot take up time by further references to these papers. I shall only make this general observation, that the subsequent action of the Prime Minister himself showed that these men were entitled to be admitted to Australia, and that the interval between the time this was brought under the notice of the Government, on the 4th December, and, I think, the 13th, the date when the order for release was given, was an unjustifiable delay in settling a matter which ought to have been settled with lightning despatch. It was a cloud resting over Australia all that time.

Mr. PAGE.—It was a cloud that the newspapers made—nothing else.

Mr. REID.—I tell the honorable member that these papers show the communications to be of a character quite other than that which he suggests if he means to disparage them. There are communications from persons in the highest official position representing the injury done to Australia by this very act. There are representations from the Premier of New South Wales in response to a communication from the Agent-General of New South Wales.

Mr. PAGE.—The Prime Minister only did what the honorable and learned gentleman told him to do by passing the Act.

Mr. REID.—What I told him to do in passing the Act? Which Act?

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable and learned gentleman admitted being here on the third reading of the Act.

Mr. MAUGER.—And there was a special resolution and amendment.

Mr. REID.—I take all the responsibility involved in that extraordinary state of things. Why, the Denton Hat Mills contended that these men were absolutely entitled to land here. Surely that is a sufficient authority for the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. Is it not an extraordinary thing that while these six hatters were kept all this time in a ship at Sydney, twelve boilermakers—and surely there will be no suggestion that they are geniuses in a professional line—were openly imported into Western Australia by the Railway department of that State under contracts made in England? Advertisements were published in English papers for twelve boilermakers, who were to enter into agreements to come out to Western Australia. Every man in Western Australia knows now that they came out under agreements, but no one dares to put a finger upon them, though they have incurred certain penalties, I think, under this Act. It only shows the extraordinary sort of administration we have when the Government of Western Australia can import twelve men under contract and the Federal Government will not say a word about it, whereas, in the case of the hatters, the hatters' society and the Cabinet were evidently cheek by jowl for days over the matter before those men could land upon Australian soil. I say that if there is any intention to shut out men who come out at union wages, good unionists, coming from one union to another, I shall be no party to it.

Mr. WATSON.—Nor will anybody else.

Mr. MAUGER.—Let them come out as free men, and they are welcome.

Mr. REID.—Free men! They were free men, according to these papers.

Mr. TUDOR.—Were they? Let the right honorable and learned gentleman ask them now.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask that these repeated interjections should cease. One interjection while an honorable member is speaking may not, perhaps, be objected to; but when a number of interjections are fired across the chamber they become most disconcerting, and are most disorderly.

Mr. REID.—I desire to refer to another ridiculous light in which this Act is being put. Surely honorable members who are concerned for the main principles of the Act do not desire that those principles, which are of magnitude, should excite opposition and reproach throughout Australia? Surely they do not desire that a good thing should be discredited by bad management? The men who are responsible for this change in the law are surely interested in seeing that things are done with a certain show of discretion, at any rate, at the beginning. We should remember that these things are all new, and great allowances must be made until the provisions of the law are thoroughly well known. Three Maoris came from New Zealand for three months, I understand, in connexion with an entertainment being given in Sydney at Fitzgerald Bros.' circus, and it was made a matter of State as to whether these three Maoris were to land. A few instances like that would expose Australia to the utmost ridicule. Now, I come to something worse as to these matters of administration. I come now to the administration of my right honorable and learned friend, the Minister for Trade and Customs. I do not know whether my right honorable friend appreciates the logical abilities of the members of this Chamber. If he thinks there is a logical faculty in them, as I am sure he does, I ask him to remember that I do not wish him to vindicate his severity in cases of fraud against the Custom-house. There is not a hard hand which he can lay upon an act of fraud for which every man in this Chamber will not heartily applaud him. I want to avoid that aspect of the question. His is a painful position, we all must admit. We must make allowance for the Minister in that respect, because no matter who is at the head of the Customs department, the position is a most painful and difficult one. I never questioned in all my life the thorough honesty of purpose of the Minister; but still I do think that matters have gone to such a length that even he might consent to look at them in a reasonable light. Let it be understood that I find no fault with the Minister for what he has done in the case of any man who has tried to rob the Customs of a single penny. I am coming to another matter altogether, so do not let us waste time in dealing with a question concerning which there is no dispute. But I say that the action of the Customs department in showing its own inability to understand the Tariff ought to lead the Minister to show a certain amount of consideration to other people; because the fact that two or three thousand separate decisions have been given by the Customs Minister does lead us to believe that it does not know what the Tariff really means.

Mr. THOMSON.—The decisions are contradictory.

Mr. REID.—I quite expect that. In so large a number of cases the best decisions would be so. But I want to point out to my right honorable friend that if, as he knows is the case, the department itself has discovered so many perplexities and difficulties about the Tariff that they have had to issue more than a thousand decisions with reference to the meaning of it —

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I thought the right honorable member said two or three thousand?

Mr. REID.—At any rate there is an enormous number; and that should lead the Minister to be a little more reasonable with people whom he does not even suspect of a desire to defraud the Custom-house. He does not seem to think that there is a distinction between a police court and other courts, but he scarcely does the situation justice there. It should be the policy of the Customs department to work hand in hand with the merchants whom it trusts. If it trusts no one it can work hand in hand with no one, but if my right honorable friend would join with anybody with the object of preventing the sort of competition that is effected by fraudulent conduct on the part of certain merchants, he could have no stronger allies than the honest merchants. Is not their interest the same as the Minister's? My criticism of his general administration is that it does not create that distinction which should exist between the great mass of honorable merchants and the fraudulent merchants. I would not put an honest man in the police court for anything, except, perhaps, his criminal negligence. Now, I come to something worse than that. The Minister for Trade and Customs knows that this House insisted on certain articles being admitted free of duty. I am coming to a case where the Minister set himself against the law and against Parliament.

Mr. CONROY.—What firm benefits from it?

Mr. REID.—That is a wrong observation.

Mr. CONROY.—I shall give instances later on.

Mr. REID.—If my honorable and learned friend wants to insinuate anything dishonest against my right honorable friend the Minister for Trade and Customs, I absolutely repudiate it.

Mr. CONROY.—Wait until the House hears the instances I shall give.

Mr. REID.—There is no map in this Chamber—and I have a number of friends here—in whose integrity I have more absolute confidence than I have in that of the Minister for Trade and Customs.

Mr. CONROY.—I hope that the right honorable member will wait and hear me before he makes that statement.

Mr. REID.—I shall have to hear the honorable and learned member a long time before I alter my opinion in that respect. It is one of the gratifying features of my parliamentary life in this federal sphere that we are able to get on in such a way as to observe the ordinary courtesies of life, to say nothing of the privileges of friendship. At the time when I came into this Parliament I had been in rather stormy seas, and it took me some little time to adjust myself to the altered position. But it has been a source of the greatest possible pleasure to me to preserve those courtesies of life of which I have spoken, and I think that honorable members will admit that I have endeavoured to do so. I do not want to touch upon a matter that is sub judice at present, but at the same time I cannot be deprived of my rights as a Member of Parliament in this matter. There was upon the Tariff a line called cartridges. The Government decided that instead of being dutiable cartridges should be free. The members of the Senate sent down a suggestion that a duty of 10 per cent. should be put on cartridges. The Minister for Trade and Customs moved in the House of Representatives that that suggestion should be rejected. Cartridges, therefore, on the Tariff to-day are free. But in every cartridge there is a certain proportion of shot, and because there is a duty of 5s. per cwt. on shot, the Customs department actually insists that people who import cartridges should pay 5s. a cwt. for the shot contained in the free cartridges. It is one of the biggest curiosities in customs administration that I have seen. My right honorable friend must be a perfect genius in getting revenue if he will not stick at that. But actually the Federal Government has gone to the expense of resisting an action at law in another State—which makes me more free to allude to the matter—brought by an importer who maintains his right to have his cartridges brought in free.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The right honorable member will recollect that the point was raised, and I promised to look into it. I took the advice of legal advisers of the Crown in reference to it.

Mr. REID.—That accounts for everything the Minister has done! But if I learn that the Attorney-General expresses the opinion that such a charge should be made, I admit that it must be a matter that is arguable.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Does any one suppose that the shot should be dutiable out of a cartridge and free in it?

Mr. REID.—In other words, if whisky is dutiable outside of a man it is dutiable when it is inside of him! That is a novel idea! Even the Minister for Trade and Customs could not follow whisky then! It is the funniest thing I have ever heard. Then there is the case of an unfortunate cook who had not the advantage of the flood of light which has been thrown upon the Customs laws of Australia by the Attorney-General. He was an humble cook in a foreign ship, and he had an humble perquisite. That was, that the slush in the slush cask of the vessel was his; and in an unhappy hour he became a criminal by selling his perquisite to a man on shore. The Customs department decided that the slush went under the heading of unrefined tallow in the Federal Tariff.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Fat.

Mr. REID.—Unrefined fat! This slush was brought, by the genius of our friend, under the item of unrefined fat! This cook was not a fraudulent importer, but an honest working man.

Mr. KINGSTON.—He seemed to live on “the fat of the land.”

Mr. REID.—Only when he was in gaol. He was fed on “the fat of the land” there, I suppose. It seems to me that when the attention of this Federal Government, instead of being directed to matters of high State importance, is devoted to dealing with the sale of slush and things of that sort in foreign ships that come alongside, the science of Government has assumed a comical phase. It brings the law into disrepute, and surely our gaols were not intended for servants on foreign ships who make such a fearful mistake as did this cook! Now I come to a still worse case than that. It is the case of a sailor who was intrusted with some silks and a Bible as a present to some people in New Zealand. They have such ideas at home as that New Zealand is next door to Australia. This young sailor was intrusted with these presents for people in New Zealand, and when he was going on shore he arranged for sending them to their destination. For that he was arrested and taken to the lock-up. He was accused of having committed a fraudulent act in defrauding the customs of duty, and was fined. The law places the magistrate in such a position that he had to fine the man £5, an amount representing a month's wages, or perhaps more than that. He was fined for trying to send on to New Zealand something which would not pay a penny to the customs of Australia.

Mr. THOMSON.—Who fined him?

Mr. REID.—The poor magistrate, as his duty is: he cannot help himself. Your innocence is a fact against you under the Kingston administration, not in your favour. When you say you did not know you were doing a certain thing, the inference now is that you are guilty, and you are fined £5. It is a most extraordinary sort of legislation. When the Bill was before the Senate there was an assurance given that such cases would never occur, that they would be dealt with otherwise than by the police courts. I appeal to the Minister to endeavour to avoid such occurrences as these. They tend to bring into discredit not only the Government—I do not mind that—but the whole community. Here is another instance of the eccentric way in which our government is administered. The Prime Minister thought the matter was of sufficient importance to make some observations at a very large meeting in Sydney.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did that because, in a letter in the morning's paper, Senator Pulsford challenged me to say something about it.

Mr. REID.—It was very fortunate that my right honorable and learned friend arrived at last in order that he might take up the challenge. In his observations he condemns his own colleagues for once. I do not know that it will lead to any trouble between them.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable and learned member cannot suppose that it was my colleague who did this?

Mr. REID.—No; I am sure of that. If the Minister had every desire in the world, according to the view which the Customs authorities take, he could not help himself: the law compelled him to do it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It was the policeman who acted in the beginning.

Mr. REID.—When my right honorable and learned friend puts the thing in such a clear way—that it was a sheer mistake—the House will be considerably amused to find that days after he assured the people of Sydney that the goods would be returned and the fine up to 80 per cent. would be returned to the man——

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I said that I would give directions, and I did.

Mr. REID.—I think it would take up a lot of time at a public meeting if the right honorable and learned gentleman had to refine in that way.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have already corrected that matter in answer to a question put by, I think, the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Poynton.

Mr. REID.—I would like my honorable friend to remember my object in making these remarks. At a public meeting in Sydney he said, with reference to the case of that unfortunate young sailor——

It would have been better if he had been summoned instead of arrested.

There is a reflection on the Customs authorities. Of course the poor policeman will be brought into the matter; but that sort of thing will not do. A policeman does not arrest a man for carrying a Bible. Surely even the Customs authorities do not cause the police to do that.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We shall not attempt to get behind the policeman, if that is what the right honorable and learned member means.

Mr. REID.—I am sure that Ministers do not wish to do that. A policeman acts on the instruction of a Customs official to arrest a man. We may be sure that he does not do the thing for fun. It is only Customs officials who do these things for fun——

It would have been better if he had been summoned instead of arrested. Under the whole circumstances of the case——

I assume that the Prime Minister knew what they were when he spoke—— there was not sufficient evidence of guilty knowledge to warrant even the maximum fine.

This sailor who had been prosecuted by the Customs department had been in gaol, and the Prime Minister says to the people of the country that there was not sufficient evidence to cause him to be fined. Is it a matter of indifference that His Majesty's subjects are imprisoned and charged with offences when the Prime Minister himself asserts, against the action in this case, that there was no ground for inflicting any punishment! He goes on to say in his speech—

I have now given instructions that the goods seized shall be returned to Tingey, and that the penalty shall be reduced by about 80 per cent. The only thing we can do when we find that the Act has been administered—

You see, it is the administration of the Act—with a little too much severity—

When an innocent man is put in gaol, he is treated with a little too much severity. That is quite in a line with the genius of Customs administration. We are getting quite used to it—notwithstanding our efforts to be lenient—

I think that the Prime Minister had better not go near Sydney again after making that statement—is to modify the penalty or remit some of it, and that is what we intend to do.

The Prime Minister spoke in Sydney on the 30th April, and on the 15th May the Comptroller-General of Customs sent to the person representing the sailor, who in the meantime had gone away in his ship, a letter in which he said—

I am directed by the Minister for Trade and Customs to inform you that the forfeiture of the goods will not be enforced, but that the penalty cannot be remitted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That is my doing.

Mr. REID.—My right honorable and learned friend is getting infected by the example which he is following. Was that deliberately done?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Done deliberately on the facts of the case.

Mr. REID.—The poor sailor! I am glad to get a poor man into this business, because, so long as the accused is a big importer, there is no mercy for him. People forget that the merchants are a sort of advance agent for the Government. Any man might remember that they have to plank down £9,500,000 for the Treasury. That is a fact which might be mentioned to their credit. I only wish to show that the department which has branded men who make simple little mistakes in complicated entries as criminals make the most egregious blunders, the most silly mistakes. The Prime Minister makes a public declaration that he intends that 80 per cent. of the fine shall be remitted, and fifteen days after that his colleague says it cannot be remitted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I dealt with the question on the papers without knowing anything of what the Prime Minister had said.

Mr. REID.—Exactly. Of two Ministers, both lawyers, one says the case shows that the man should never have been prosecuted, and the other says that the fine should not be remitted. Here is a galaxy of legal talent in the Ministry! A little consideration might be shown for men who make mistakes, when the gentlemen who put them into gaol make the most egregious blunders over the same matter. It is not a very edifying thing that one Minister of the Crown should tell 5,000 people in Sydney that the man had been wrongly treated, that the fine should never have been inflicted, and that 80 per cent. of it would be remitted, and that then the Deputy Minister for Trade and Customs should state officially that the fine cannot be remitted. That meant that the man had been seriously to blame. But who expects these people to know the laws of Australia? Fancy punishing a sailor, travelling round the world in his ship, for trying to do a kindly action for a friend. There is one matter referred to in the speech of the Governor-General which I desire to notice in passing. The paragraph is a very long one, but I cordially agree with the statements it contains in reference to railway communication with Western Australia. My only regret is that the Government did not feel themselves justified in at least making a trial survey of the line without incurring all the delays involved in appointing commissions and obtaining State legislative authority. I am not an expert, but I understand that a trial survey is not an expensive affair, but is, on the other hand, a very practical proceeding, and the importance of the proposal requires that we should at least have a trial survey before any scheme is finally decided upon. The effect of the course now being adopted by the Government will be that after a number of difficulties are overcome a trial survey will have to be made, but it seems to me that that is a step which the Government might well take without waiting any longer.

Mr. WATSON.—Has not a trial survey been made?

Mr. REID.—No, I understand not. A flying survey has been made, but there has been no trial survey in an official sense.

Mr. FOWLER.—The State Government are putting down bores for water.

Mr. REID.—It seems to me that the project is one which at least deserves the test of a trial survey. I have made my views upon this subject pretty well known, and, as I said before, my only regret is that the Government have not been able to move a little more rapidly than they are doing. I observe that the Governor-General is made to congratulate us upon the state of the federal finances. We are told that in spite of the drought—perhaps it might be because of the drought—the finances are in a very satisfactory condition. Now, that statement affords one of the strongest justifications I can conceive for the action which the Opposition took in connexion with the Tariff. The Government stated that they did not expect to receive more than about £8,900,000 in a normal year from the duties levied under the Tariff as introduced. They complained that by our alterations we reduced the revenue they might have expected by £1,000,000 or £1,500,000, and yet the Tariff as reduced by us is yielding a larger amount of revenue than the Government estimated to be required. Instead of receiving £8,900,000—I suppose we can consider last year as a normal year—the revenue amounted to about £9,250,000. I am stating the figures very moderately. That gives the Government from £200,000 to £300,000 more than they expected from a Tariff which we reduced by from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000. Could there be any stronger justification for the attitude of the Opposition? We had not the great advantages enjoyed by the Government in their officials and the manifold opportunities of obtaining information; but, in spite of all these drawbacks, we were able to forecast the effect of the Tariff with far greater accuracy. If their statement as to the effect of our reductions had been accurate the Tariff would have yielded something like £1,000,000 less than they required. This statement in the Governor-General's speech is a thorough justification of our refusal to vote unnecessary revenue. I notice that the Government look for an expansion of our industries in consequence of the better seasons which are returning to the country. A singular state of affairs prevails at the present time. The Government admit that the Tariff is not a proper protectionist Tariff. They acknowledge that it is not satisfactory from their point of view, and yet they say—"We will not allow it to be altered or to be improved, even by honorable members on our own side." That is a clear-cut attitude and an easy attitude to assume. All people who have that "tired feeling" naturally lean towards a policy of leaving things alone, but, from a protectionist point of view, I cannot understand that attitude. If the Government believe in a protectionist policy they cannot believe in the Tariff, because it is admittedly neither one thing nor the other—it is a mixture of both free-trade and protection, and bad at that. I can understand a man who really believes that a Tariff can bring prosperity and provide employment fighting for his policy, and, if he is defeated in the Parliament, going to the country, and saying—"We must have revenue. We are disgusted with what Parliament has done. They have mutilated our policy, and we ask this great democracy of Australia, which believes in it, to give us the strength to put matters right in the new Parliament." Instead of taking this stand, however, the Government are so afraid of the result of adopting such an attitude that, as at the last election, they curry favor with the free-traders of Australia by putting forward their policy in the aspect which will be least offensive to that section of the community. Now, I can appreciate a straight-out protectionist or revenue tariffist, but I have no kind of admiration for men who try to obtain position and power by currying favour with both sides at the same time. That is the attitude of the Government over the Tariff. I have never had much good to say of a certain leading Australian newspaper published in Melbourne, but I must at least admit that if it has been true to one thing it has been faithful to the protectionist policy of Victoria. It may be, as I think, utterly mistaken; it may adopt the most questionable means of advancing its views; but the fact that it has been true and faithful to the protectionist cause is undoubted. Now, what does this organ of public opinion say this very morning? It declares that the Federal Tariff is ruining Victorian industries, that in the year 1902, the first year of the operation of the Tariff, the importations of goods which used to be manufactured in Victoria rapidly increased. I do not, as a rule, and I do not now, accept as facts any figures which that newspaper publishes; but it cannot complain if I accept its figures in order to deal with its policy; and I must invite the attention of the House and the people of the whole continent to the statement made to-day in that newspaper.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—What is its name?

Mr. REID.—It does not need an advertisement, because, according to the sign-boards, it is read by about 5,000,000 people every day. It is called the Melbourne Age. This newspaper has been distinguished by its clever and earnest advocacy of the protectionist policy. Now what, according to the Age, is the result of this very Tariff which the Government say must not be altered—which must stand without alteration? That newspaper selects about a dozen articles which were largely produced in Victoria under the State Tariff. Take boots, to begin with. The manufacture of boots is a very large industry everywhere. The Age points out, I suppose truthfully—I do not know, but it may be so on this occasion—that from 1899, which is considered by the Treasurer, and I think very properly so, to be the last normal year before the effects of the federal financial arrangements were felt, till 1902, a period of three years, the importation of boots into Victoria has doubled despite the operation of a 30 per cent. duty under the Federal Tariff. It will be remembered that the Government brought down a sort of twin-screw duty which taxed boots at so much a dozen besides imposing upon them an ad valorem rate. They thus concealed duties ranging up to 80 per cent. It was a very clever piece of manipulation, but I now see that such duties were really required. No human being, save an expert, could tell what their original proposals meant. But we now see that they were necessary, because under the operation of the 30 per cent. duty imposed by the Tariff the Age points out that twice the quantity of boots is imported that was imported three years ago. Upon hats another twin-screw duty was submitted by the Government ranging up to 150 per cent. ad valorem. Upon these goods there is a duty operating of 30 per cent., despite which the importation of hats has increased by 50 per cent. within the same period. Similarly the quantity of furniture imported has increased by 200 per cent., notwithstanding the effect of a 20 per cent. duty, together with very expensive freight charges. Let us take the industry of agricultural implement making, which was represented as the glory of a Victorian protective policy. We were told what a magnificent industry had been established here by means of the adoption of that policy. Yet, what do we find—that in the three years indicated in spite of the operation of a 12½ per cent. duty, there has been an increase of 30 or 40 per cent. in the quantity of these implements imported. Similarly the imports of machinery have increased by 75 per cent., and those of woollens by about 30 per cent. There has been a decrease in the quantity of blankets imported. In the case of apparel, however, there has been an increase of 130 per cent. in the imports, despite the operation of a 25 per cent. duty, whilst the quantity of brushware imported has increased 70 per cent., notwithstanding the effect of duties ranging from 15 to 25 per cent. In earthenware goods there has been more than a 20 per cent. increase in the imports. The Age points out that, in spite of the federal duties, the imports in respect of these dozen articles have increased enormously. Surely that proves every word which has been uttered by this side of the House to the effect that these industries after 30 years of this peculiar method of intoxication were reduced to such a precarious state that they required an exceedingly strong stimulant to keep them on their legs at all. The stimulus afforded by the Federal Tariff is evidently not strong enough, and consequently they are going down at an alarming rate. That is the strongest justification for anything which honorable members on this side of the House have said.

Mr. WATSON.—Has any allowance been made for re-exports?

Mr. REID.—The Age does not make any. I have not time to follow out all its figures, but occasionally when it suits me I take them upon trust. It suits me to take them as they are upon this occasion, and I believe there may be about 50 per cent. of truth in them.

Mr. McDONALD.—Question.

Mr. REID.—I admit that it may be a question. However, that is the position taken up by the Age. Let honorable members recollect what was predicted when the Tariff was under consideration. All the fences have been down since 1902. In New South Wales we were told that for 30 years past Victorians had been equipping their factories under a protective system, and that the moment their market was extended by the adoption of Inter-State free-trade, the grand manufacturing industries of Victoria would sweep the continent, and New South Wales industries would be heard of no more. Yet now that all the fences are down the people are leaving Victoria, and still its importations are growing bigger than ever. The people have been going out and the goods have been coming in more than ever. That is an extraordinary result for the magnificent descent which the Victorian system was to make upon Australian simplicity. The Ministry will have to turn round upon this point, because the Age is evidently determined to compel them to go to the people upon a straight fiscal issue. The policy of leaving the Tariff alone will not suit the Age. In defence of the infant industries of Victoria, which that journal has been affectionately nursing for so many years, the protectionists of this State must renew the fiscal struggle. How can the honorable member for Melbourne Ports—it is a remarkable thing that he is the representative of a port, but still the fact remains that he is—view this 50 per cent. increase in the importation of hats with any sort of philosophy? It seems to me a personal insult to him as one of the great triumphs of this policy that, in spite of my honorable friend's pre-eminence in that particular line of industry, the importation of these odious foreign articles is steadily increasing whilst the population is steadily vanishing. Of course I can understand a protectionist saying—“This Tariff represents nothing. It does not give my policy a fair chance. How can my policy stand well with the people of the Commonwealth when it is so mutilated that the moment it comes into force, in spite of an all-round Australia for Victorian enterprise, there are these calamitous figures?” The Ministry will have to change its attitude upon this question. I could understand them declaring—“We will not allow the Tariff to be touched because it is a good Tariff,” but I cannot understand them going before four millions of people and saying—“We want this Tariff untouched because it will take a little time to remedy its deficiencies.” If we can spend months upon trivial matters, surely we can spend a few days in adjusting a Tariff which affects the whole of Australia. The Government will not be able to continue its nebulous attitude upon this matter. They will not be able to conciliate the people of Australia by declaring that the fiscal question is all moonshine. That would not go off this time. I do not think that protectionists will allow the Government to stand before the electors and say that the present Tariff is one of which they are proud, and which they will stand by.

Mr. McDONALD.—They say that it is the very best they can get.

Mr. REID.—That is what impotence always says. It takes the best that it can get, but that is not the attitude for the great men in the Ministry, to say nothing of their supporters at the back, to assume. This “tired feeling” will not suit the progressive life of Australian democracy, and the people will not allow such an attitude to prevail. Although I differ so much from the Age, I can well understand its position upon this matter. If this Tariff is ruining Australian industry then it ought to be improved. Personally, I think it is interfering in every way with the well-being of Australia, and I wish to put it upon a sound footing. Now, I come to matters of a wider range than those of party politics—matters which are suggested to us by several references in the Governor-General's speech. There are only two other subjects with which I wish to deal, but they are of very great importance, not only to ourselves, but to the people of the Empire generally. I hope the House will pardon me if I deal with those questions. In the first place the Government intend to ask us to adopt a naval agreement which was arrived at in conference in London. I confess that that agreement is not in the shape which I should like, but after giving the matter the most careful consideration—after fully informing myself of the nature of the additional strength which is involved in the agreement—and upon a view of the whole of the circumstances of the case I feel that the Parliament of Australia cannot, with any sense of fairness or justice, refuse to make the slight concession asked for by the Imperial authorities. No man has a stronger desire than myself to see the beginning of an Australian navy, and I do not mean any support which I give to this agreement to be interpreted as hostile to that view. But it appears to me that we cannot justify a refusal to subscribe £200,000 a year to the burdens of the Empire in connexion with defence. I should be glad if our opportunities were greater, and we were in a position to take a larger share in connexion with the burden of Imperial defence. I feel that so long as we think it right that Australia should remain within the bounds of the Empire—and I hope that time will always remain—we must, so far as our means allow, do all we can to recognise our share in the duty of defence. If we were independent, I do not believe that we could get the present defence for anything like the amount I have mentioned. Our own system of defence would, in my opinion, be infinitely more costly, and perhaps not quite so efficient; and, on review of the whole of the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that it is our duty to accept the proposition which is made. Another matter, which the Government propose to postpone till a later period—practically until after the elections—is one which was discussed in the Imperial Conference with reference to a modification of our trading relations. I think the Government have acted wisely in not pressing this matter on the House this session. I have always expressed the view that if there is to be a revenue-tariff policy, such matters become insignificant, but that if on the other hand there is to be a policy of protection, and the people of Australia declare for a protective tariff, then the least that a protectionist self-governing State in the British Empire can do, if it is determined to shut the door against the mother country to a great extent, is to leave the door a little more open to the mother country than to foreign countries. Therefore, if the decision of the people of Australia is in favour of a protectionist tariff, or of the maintenance of the present tariff, in either event I shall be prepared to give my support to a measure distinguishing between the industries of the motherland and the industries of other countries; but only on that basis. It would not be my act; it would be a corollary of the act of those who believe in a protective policy. What is the essence of a protective policy? It is the interfering with the industrial expansion of every other country in the world, in at any rate a certain number of lines of industry. Related as we are to the Empire, it always has seemed to me to be one of the proofs of the majestic generosity of a great people that they should not only hand over to us rights which enable us to treat this as our own country and our own independent property, but that in doing so they should also hand over to us the right to shut our own doors in the face of the country that has made us what we are. It is one of the most majestic proofs of generosity that the world has ever seen. Where would such countries as Australia be if they were under the flag of Germany, France, or the United States? I cannot forget the development of Imperial policy in the history of the British race. There was a time in the history of Great Britain when the protectionist doctrine was not only fashionable, but when it permeated all the laws of the mother country. What was the colonial policy of England then? It was an odious phase of the protective principle, so odious that none of the British colonies could import a single article made outside Great Britain unless it had first been landed on the shores of England and exported in British ships manned by crews which were three-fourths British. No colonial possession could sell one pound's worth of produce to a man in a foreign country unless that produce had been laid down on the shores of England and re-shipped to the foreign country. That was the colonial policy of the Empire in the protectionist days. But we have had a marvellous expansion since then, and the people at the heart of our marvellous Empire have formed more enlightened opinions. The time was when these protectionist laws were thought to be essential to the stability and security of the United Kingdom. The time was when the navigation laws were considered to be so vital to the stability of the Empire that brilliant men like Disraeli—some of the keenest intellects the mother country ever had—denounced the change from protectionist legislation as one of those disastrous steps which would lead to the immediate ruin of the British race. But we have had 50 years of this expansion of a generous policy. As the great Mr. Gladstone said, the self-governing colonies were left to buy their own experience in whatever market they chose. If the colonies thought protection a good thing they were left free to adopt the policy. Under the policy of giving freedom, and of minimizing the ties of trade and business which existed between the central power and the dependencies of the Empire, the singular phenomenon developed that just as every official tie was removed—just as every artificial means of preserving Imperial trade was removed—just as, according to all the theories of a certain school of political economists, the whole Empire was in danger of dissolving by the mere looseness of the bonds which kept the different parts together, never was the Empire stronger in point of fact, and never was loyalty more practical. We see now that whatever may be the history of other countries, that policy which is suited to the genius of the British race, whether in the mother land or in her great dependencies scattered throughout the world, is such that the more the freedom and liberty the grander has been the union, the greater the loyalty, and the more unassailable the strength and stability of the Empire. On theory, all those statesmen of the past would be aghast at the spectacle of the parts of this majestic system revolving in independent orbits without any visible tie or control to keep them in their places. But still they do revolve without collision or collapse. Day after day in spite of loose ties, and in spite of discordant policies, the Empire has grown stronger and stronger. With all respect to Mr. Chamberlain, whom I consider one of the greatest patriotic statesmen of English public life, and who, I believe, is not a man to advocate great changes in the Empire merely from suggestions of political convenience, I cannot help thinking that, when upon his return to England from South Africa he made the significant remark that he found the people of Great Britain engaged so much upon matters of domestic concern, and so little upon matters of Imperial policy, he was unconsciously endeavouring to make them forget the things which are threatening the downfall of his Government and of his party. The secret of the greatness of the Empire has been the loyalty and devotion of the people of England to their own affairs. It is the municipal instinct within the British race rather than the Imperial instinct of high policy which have made it great. High policy describes magnificent curves, but it may lead to great disasters. It is from the steady, practical common-sense of the race, which has developed with all its might the things near at hand and within its power, that we get the grand results of the British Empire to-day. In a certain sense we are responsible for the burdens of the Empire, but we forget that this Empire, with most of its burdens, has been constructed upon principles and policies with which we have had nothing to do. When Mr. Chamberlain appeals to us on behalf of an Empire which is staggering under its burdens, we cannot forget that, for good or for evil, he is one of a party of statesmen who within the last fifteen years have added 4,000,000 square miles of territory to the burdens of the Empire, and have increased by 50 per cent. the area for which the flag is responsible. Under a similar policy the expenditure which the British taxpayer has to meet has been increased in six years by £54,000,000 per annum, the expenditure in the year 1896-7 being £75,000,000, and the estimated expenditure for the year 1903-4, £129,000,000. Who is responsible for the enormous increase in the territory of the Empire? Are we? When people talk of the burdens of the Empire they must remember that, whilst we are strong in the defence of the Empire, if it comes to large money contributions we must be regarded as being in the position of pioneers. Australia is a pioneer of the Empire. Australians, by their enterprise, are making this great continent the source of renewed health, strength, and prosperity for the whole British race. That is our task in the building up of the Empire. If you measure our loyalty by the amount of money we contribute, we must occupy but a very humble and insignificant place. But true statesmanship does not look at young, struggling communities in that light. Amongst the marvels of patriotism displayed by such communities were the great sacrifices of our busy peoples when the mother country was in difficulty in South Africa. It is not in money contributions that Australia can help the Empire; it is in the maintenance of a spirit of thorough accord, loyalty, and affection. Those things are not to be got by business adjustments. They are not promoted by the multiplicity of self interests which you endeavour to invent. It seems to me that in trying to invent new ties, we are very apt to invent fresh sources of disaffection and trouble, and that when in those dark official days we were bound by a thousand ties to Downing-street, there was a feeling of disaffection, distrust, and dislike which in these days is not heard of. In carving out a place for ourselves, as our fathers did before us, we are doing that which is right by the parent.

land and the parent race. We cannot help the Empire much with money contributions, but we are prepared to help it in every conceivable way which will be beneficial to the mother country and to ourselves. No one has a keener desire than I have to turn the back upon unjust foreign systems of trading such as the mother country has suffered from in the past. I am not a believer in free-trade because I think it helps the enemies of my country, but because I think it helps my country. I would hit Germany and any other country which competes unfairly against us, if I did not fear that in trying to hit them I might hurt our own people. When I was Premier of New South Wales, I opened the doors of that State to the people of Victoria, without the slightest symptom of a generous response. Why did not I retaliate? I should have retaliated had I not felt that in so doing I should expose my own people to suffering and loss. If I had to choose between Germany and the mother country, I would have very little of Germany. I would come to the rescue of the mother country in the matter of trade as in anything else. But I do not wish to see the mother country, after she has emerged from artificial methods of protection, go back to them. Must not such a course make one fear that the indomitable spirit of the race is beginning to fail? What chance has the mother country on the hostile paths of commerce abroad if she cannot fight the foreigner at her own door? What method of preserving the majestic strength and development of the Empire is it for her to shiver on her own hearthstone? If Britain cannot master these problems of competition and unfairness by other methods her day has passed. It is a false policy which seeks strength behind barricades. A barricade is a grand thing for a weak force, but not for a force which is going forth to conquer. Where would the majestic achievements of Great Britain be if that had been her policy in the past? In spite of hostile Tariffs, in spite of attempts to shut the doors of the world against her, she has a trade infinitely larger than that of her competitors. She has a trade about twice as large as that of Germany. Her export trade, small island as Great Britain is, is 20 or 30 per cent. larger than that of Germany. I speak of Germany because public men are not insensible of the advantage of singling out obnoxious individuals as a means of advancing an argument. But what is the competition of Germany to the competition of the United States? German commerce is a mere incident compared with that of the United States. There is a trade of £140,000,000 a year between the United Kingdom and the United States; but the exports from the United States to the mother country are worth £120,000,000, while the exports from the mother country to the United States are worth only £20,000,000. Out of £140,000,000 of trade only £20,000,000 is sent back to the United States. In regard to Germany, the balance between our exports and imports is trivial. I do not like the method of solving vital questions upon which the welfare of this great Empire depends, by appeals to prevailing passions. Do we not know that if there is a wrong in this kind of thing the great author of that wrong is the United States? Surely a customer that buys £120,000,000 worth a year from the United States might receive some show of generous treatment in return. If we will make this British Empire a close corporation, if we will have this doubtful Imperial spirit the vital principle of our Empire, we had better begin to establish a system of universal conscription. The countries which shut their ports have millions of soldiers behind them. If those little countries, mere spots on the face of the earth, have this backbone of military power in carrying out their selfish and unfriendly policy, then, if we are going to establish similar lines of public policy, we must consider the enormous amount of reserved power we must have. I do not say for a moment that I would not do anything. Make any departure you like. I agree with Mr. Chamberlain. Let us cast aside phrases. Let us cast aside the terms free-trade and protection. If this thing were a good thing for the Empire I should be one of the foremost to urge the change. One is open to conviction. I am only addressing these remarks to the House because I feel that I ought to make some contribution to an investigation of this kind. I have felt it more respectful to do so in this Chamber than through the columns of the press, and I feel that when such matters are brought to our attention it is our duty as members of an important part of the Empire to consider them. I hope the House will pardon me if I occupy a little time upon this subject. I admit that it is against all the theories of the world as they are understood, but still it is a fact that when the navigation laws of England were in full force—when they were of the kind I have described—the foreign shipping that entered and cleared the ports of protectionist England represented the proportion of 30 per cent. In the dark days, when all these artificial restraints were put upon foreign shipping, the shipping from abroad that still came into the shut ports of the United Kingdom constituted 30 per cent. of the total shipping entering and leaving the United Kingdom. That was in 1840. Sixty years have passed. The British ports have been defenceless. The ports of the other countries have still been shut against them, and enormous subsidies have been paid to French and German lines of shipping to enable them to fight this helpless rival. And what is the result? After 60 years of open ports and of this open policy, the proportion of foreign shipping that now enters and clears the ports of the United Kingdom is only what it was then. Some people make England responsible for decay if she is not able to resist the law of development in other countries. It is the greatest absurdity in the world. The greatest calamity that could happen to England will occur when these other countries open their ports. The great opportunity of British manufacturing genius and enterprise is secured when the manufacturers of all the other countries of the world have to pay toll on their raw material, whilst the British manufacturer can buy all over the world, and bring the raw material of all the world into his own factory upon the cheapest possible terms. There is no magic in these marvels of industry. Let us consider the matter for a moment. If we put all England under wheat to-morrow; if we revived the glories of agriculture in England to-morrow, how much would all the wheat of England come to! We are dealing with a people who upon that little speck of earth are earning, either in the country or from foreign sources, an annual income of £1,700,000,000. That is the country which opes to improve its strength by artificial methods. I am open to be convinced. If I could believe that there was any sort of contrivance which would enable us to help the mother country against unfriendly nations, I should be prepared to support it. But it is a singular thing that no practical scheme was submitted to the conference. Mr. Chamberlain invited the Prime Ministers of the Empire to meet him in conference upon these matters. Had not our Prime Minister a right to expect that that great practical statesman, with his enormous acquaintance with the problems, not only of Empire, but of trade—with all the resources of the British Government behind him—would have some sort of scheme to submit to the conference? The greatest difficulty must come in the case of the mother country. The imports of the mother country are nearly all composed of two lines—food, and raw materials for manufactures. Those are the two vital elements to the British people to-day. It does not pay them to grow wheat; they make too much in other directions. Food and raw materials! Put duties on food? It was done under the glamour of that great patriotic outburst when the British Government was so miserably opposed by a very able man, no doubt, who missed the greatest opportunity in the history of the British liberal party when he did not loyally go behind the Government in the hour of England's trouble, reserving to himself the right to deal with her failures as a leader of a loyal party. I attribute the position of the liberal party in England to-day to the unfortunate attitude which its leader took in a time of great national trouble. There is one thing the people of no country will stand, and that is, when it is engaged in a bitter war, to find its leaders critics, instead of friends and allies. The time for criticism comes afterwards. I consider that we are in a critical stage now in connexion with the British Empire. There are times when our attention may well be devoted to a subject which covers the whole range of the Empire—one that is not bounded by Melbourne and suburbs. The British Government, at a time when they were powerful enough to do anything, imposed a duty on wheat. That was hailed as a proof that the British Government were determined to begin a policy of protection. The answer is shown now. The same British conservative protectionist Government is taking the first opportunity of removing that tax, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in announcing his intention to take it off, intimated that it had been proved a disappointing and inelastic tax. Thus the first little experiment which had even the suggestion of a protective motive had not been on the statute-book for two years before the old Tory party of England removed it. What is the use of one member of a Cabinet talking about readjusting the fiscal system of the Empire one day, and the next day the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer announcing that the Government would not tamper with protectionist suggestions until the heart and soul of the people were roused? In this matter, as I said, believing in the policy which has prevailed for so many years, which perhaps will not stand analysis by the academician, but which, in the actual development of national life, has made this a greater and a stronger Empire than it ever was before, I feel so deeply concerned for the stability and strength of this Empire that I think most people will follow my example in requiring the most absolute proof of the wisdom of a change before the change takes place. As you will have observed, I have not been talking about Australia. Australia is a young country. It can afford to make mistakes, and can recover from them. But, speaking of this mother country of ours, this majestic heart of the great Imperial frame, if in the great powers which Imperial statesmen use, some new and daring departures of policy come on, we do not know into what difficulties they may land us. There is a strong presumption in favour of the state of things that has produced such marvellous results as those to which I have referred, but I say that so long as Australia persists in a protective tariff there is absolutely no reason in the world why we should not give the mother country a preference over other countries. If you will shut the door upon her, as I have said, I should be prepared to shut it harder upon other countries. But all these projects are alien to my view of the sound relations which should exist in governing countries. I believe in a power of taxation which is used only for the legitimate necessities of the State, and I feel so strongly the danger to which the Empire is exposed that I have felt it to be my duty upon this occasion to mention fully and frankly to this House the sentiments which I entertain.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—In dealing with the attack which my right honorable friend has made upon the Government, I should like to point out that unless his comments upon the six hatters' case, which I shall refer to presently, are to be taken as an exception, none of the legislation passed by the Government in the last session, nor a particle of that which can be reached according to the Governor-General's speech in the present session, has been the subject of his criticism. So that so far as our legislation and its policy are concerned, always, of course, excepting the Tariff, the right honorable gentleman has found no point of attack. That is a significant commentary upon the whole of his speech. Not that I take the speech altogether too seriously, because having listened carefully and attentively to it, I am not honestly able to credit the right honorable gentleman with having said anything which in any sense seriously weakens the position of the Government. He has alluded to the fact that the High Court and the Inter-State Commission Bills were two of the measures included in the programme of the Government before the last session began. That is true. They occupied prominent positions in our speeches, and though neither were promised as first measures, I freely admit that they occupied equally prominent positions in the Governor-General's speech. Any one who thinks for himself will be able fairly to come to this conclusion at any rate : That however necessary it was to pass a High Court Bill, it was necessary in the first instance to carry out such measures as the regulation and amalgamation, so far as we could during the bookkeeping period, of the post-offices of all the States. It was necessary to regulate the public service of the Commonwealth. And as we had to bring in a Tariff during the first session, lest by any chance we should be outside the limitation of two years imposed by the Constitution, it was necessary to bring down along with it a comprehensive Customs measure. Honorable members know that the Tariff was not out of hand for a period of just about eleven months. That, with such business as could be by any chance introduced whilst the Tariff was not under immediate consideration, occupied two-thirds of the session. The measures that I have mentioned with those for the establishment of a white Australia policy were measures which were not only necessary, but which were urgent. The carrying out of the white Australia policy was a subject of this prime consideration. You may talk of legislating for your people how you will, but your first care, I think, should be to take care what your people are. And though they may be in some cases very efficient in industry, if you do not wish to be in a continual course of legislation for races which are in one sense or another, according to our notions, inferior to the race to which we belong, it will be your prime consideration to take such steps as will preserve the national characteristics which we hope to be everlasting in this part of the world.

Mr. REID.—The right honorable gentleman did not legislate for races, but for people who could not pass an educational test.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I shall come to that educational test and to my right honorable friend's part in it before I sit down. The right honorable gentleman may be sure I shall not blink it, because he has made references to it to which I find it quite proper that I should make an answer. But I claim, as I think I shall be able to show by the returns, that the measures passed for this purpose are working out their end and doing it satisfactorily. I am not at one with those who think that legislation of that kind could well and properly have been postponed until the second session. It would have been a matter of very great gratification to the Government indeed if time could have been found in that very prolonged session for the passing of the High Court Bill. But we must not forget the circumstances which surrounded us. Some of them I have already detailed. Let us now come to others. Has not my right honorable friend constantly represented during the recess that, for fear that we should make appointments to the Bench during the recess—and he claims by inference some God-given right to be the monopolist in these appointments—he and his friends prevented us from carrying the High Court Bill in the first session? Has he not, in speeches here and there, stated that he, with the patriotic assistance of his friends in the Opposition, took care that we should not pass a Bill—earlier or later in the session does not matter—that would give us the right to make appointments in the recess, while Parliament was not sitting? Well, if we had passed that Bill so late in session that appointments could only have been made in the recess, we should have had the onus of doing that, and should have done it with this knowledge—that ought to be constantly before our eyes, and before the mental vision of every Government—that if we did wrong in making this appointment or that we should be subject to the censure of Parliament immediately it met. That is a responsibility which we were not likely to shirk, and could not have shirked if we wished to do so. So that all this talk about these motives for delaying or keeping back the High Court Bill—or, rather, these motives for saying that we could not pass it in the first session—vanish into moonshine when once we recognise that the perennial responsibility of Ministers would have attached to them whatever they did under that Bill. My right honorable friend has given that reason, and he has also given another. The difficulty of his position is that the two reasons cannot stand together. Let me read to the House what he said in an interview or a speech—I forget which—during the last recess. The right honorable member speaks of what he deems an unworthy turn of mine, which I shall come to directly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What has the right honorable gentleman got there?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Some cuttings, some of which will grow into very thriving plants directly. The right honorable gentleman has charged the Government with neglect over the creation of the High Court, and has, at the same time, posed as though we wanted to pass the Bill, but he would not let us. Now, as reported in the Argus of 8th May, he charges us with neglect, and those two points cannot stand together. He said—

It was generally believed that Senator O'Connor would go on the High Court Bench. There was no one in Australia but would applaud the appointment of such a distinctly able man, but the Government had no right to play fast and loose over it. Senator O'Connor was the one man who stood out for the conspicuously able and business-like way in which he had discharged his duties in the Senate.

None of that praise is too much.

He was too valuable to the Government, and it would have been inconvenient for them to lose such a good man in the middle of the session, so they selfishly put the Bill aside.

So that the Bill was kept back for three causes—first, because the right honorable member would not let it be passed; next, because the Government was neglectful; and thirdly, because they wanted to keep

Senator O'Connor, and therefore did not want to pass the Bill until they could dispense with his services. There is a variety of reasons. If any honorable member can find any one of them that will stand together with the others, he is welcome to come and take the place which I occupy, because he has far more ingenuity than I credit myself with.

Mr. REID.—I referred to the matter of the delay in not going on with the Bill.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The right honorable member referred to delay in not going on with it, but he knew full well that that delay was inevitable. He knew full well of the measures which occupied this House, including the Tariff, the debates on which did not suffer in the way of length for anything which he and his friends did; he must have been aware, when he made that charge, that the pendency of the Tariff, and the pendency of the other measures which it was absolutely necessary to pass in that session, had been such that the hope of passing the Bill was much less than we had expected. Did the right honorable member prevent the Government from passing the Bill, because he could not trust them to make appointments in the recess? If that be true, it cannot be that the Government sacrificed the Bill for the selfish motive of retaining the services of Senator O'Connor in the Senate. I have often during last session given answers to questions which ought to have saved the Government from that unworthy insinuation. Again and again I have stated that the Government have refused as a Ministry to consider appointments under the High Court Bill, the Inter State Commission Bill, or any other of those great measures under which offices must be created, until those Bills were either passed or as good as passed. And for these reasons—that wherever in the effort to pass such legislation you allow these matters to be too closely discussed beforehand, and a set of people outside, we will say, are on the alert for the purpose of securing offices for their friends, you may create an undercurrent of feeling which renders it difficult to pass your legislation in the impartial form which it should assume.

Mr. REID.—Surely that would not happen in connexion with the Judges of the High Court?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I say that it is a general principle of legislation that the Government upon whom it devolves to make appointments should not make known beforehand who are to be appointed, but should wait until the legislation is practically secure before it mentions names in that connexion; and I have repeatedly said—and this applies to Senator O'Connor as well as to any one else—that not a name has been allowed to be mentioned in Cabinet in connexion with any one of those appointments. Therefore, so much for the alleged delay with respect to the High Court Bill. The Inter-State Commission Bill stands much in the same position. But we must recollect this with regard to both of them—that there was an amount of opposition displayed towards them in the early stages of the session. But now that events have developed in the Commonwealth, and that their nature has been more closely examined, they stand in a different position. We approach these questions now in a much cooler temperature, and both of them have a much better chance of passing as satisfactory measures. But we were told that while we failed to push on these two measures, about one of which my right honorable friend has given forth three such remarkably variegated opinions, there were two others which we unduly hastened. That was, the taking over of the two transferred departments which have passed into our hands in addition to the Customs department. Our view on that subject after full discussion in Cabinet was this: The question was—was it better to pass Bills regulating the transferred departments before assuming their administration, or to take over their administration as a prelude to passing the Bills? We decided, after having fully considered the question—and this has been explained over and over again, but the explanation seems to have been forgotten or lost sight of—that it was rather futile to expect to have a sufficient knowledge of the working of any transferred department unless some Federal Minister were in the position to administer it, and to gain a practical knowledge of what was required in the way of legislation. I take it, that in doing that we have acted upon a sound and wise principle, and that in the case of departments involving considerable study, such as those of the Post-office and Defence, it was right and just to take them over and investigate their working before bringing forward any measure that would afterwards stand or fall by its application to the needs of the community.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is what the Government did not do.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is precisely what we did do. The honorable member forgets that, although the Post and Telegraph and Defence departments were taken over on 1st March, 1901, it was months afterwards before measures were introduced to deal with those departments, and they were not introduced until the Ministers had endeavoured to satisfy themselves of what was required. Although we got no further than passing the second reading of the Defence Bill without a division, still there was a valuable discussion of its provisions—a discussion which elicited opinions which were an additional guidance, no doubt, to the Minister, superadded to that which he could gain from administering the department; and perhaps, one is not sorry that the opportunity of further consideration has been gained. But if that is so, it again emphasizes the wisdom of a Minister being permitted to familiarize himself with a transferred department from six States before he begins to legislate about it.

Mr. THOMSON.—Will the same thing apply to patents?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It may not apply to patents, because the determination of the principles to be laid down in such a measure do not involve the same amount of actual daily experience in the working of the department, which needs much less administration than the others. But it does involve the laying down of certain broad principles under which inventors may beneficially exercise their talent and their ingenuity. The Customs department was automatically transferred by the Constitution. It was possible to take over before legislation for other departments—Post-office, Defence, Quarantine, and Light-houses, with their adjuncts. Patents are not included in that list, and it is impossible to effect a transfer of the Patents department without legislation. That, therefore, places the Patents department in a totally different position from the others to which I have been alluding. If we wish to take over any other department besides the Customs and the four others named in the Constitution, we can only effect that transfer by legislation, and until then we cannot administer the department in any shape or form. That is the clearly understood line of demarcation between what was possible with the transferred or transferable departments, and those which can only be transferred by legislation. I am indebted to my honorable friend for calling my attention to that point, because it helps to make matters clear. The leader of the Opposition has made some references to my speech in Tasmania, which, out of fair play and by way of balance, I have already counterpoised by making reference to one speech of his. He says that I charged the Opposition with having caused the loss of the tea duty. What I pointed out was that a large number of members of the Opposition voted or paired against the tea duty, although according to their tenets it was one of the most legitimate duties which could be imposed.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Did not the right honorable and learned gentleman say that the leader of the Opposition, in combination with the labour party, threw out the tea duty?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I said that a number of the members of the Opposition voting with him, combined with the labour party, for that purpose, and that that was the main reason why the tea duty was defeated, and so it was.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—That the leader of the Opposition combined with the labour party to defeat the tea duty?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Undoubtedly. I do not mean to say by any treaty or compact. The air is full of accusations against us of combining with the labour party, when we had neither compact, nor treaty, nor negotiation with them; and in the same sense we can charge the right honorable and learned member and a number of his supporters with combining in the same way, and that is—to put it politely to them—taking their opportunity whenever they found it to defeat the opposite party by such a combination of votes.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The acting leader of the Opposition made a strong speech in favour of the tea duty.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Who says not? He could be relied on.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Then what is the use of saying these things?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I have not the slightest doubt but that the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, will always vote for a tea duty. It is put before the House that it was by the defection of a number of our own supporters that the tea duty was lost. Let us look and see what element had the stronger effect in producing the result. I am now quoting the names of gentlemen who are not in the third party so as to show what the result was as between the Government and the direct Opposition. Of the members who voted against the tea duty, and who belonged to the protectionist party, counting pairs, there were eight. Of the members of the direct Opposition and acknowledged free-traders who voted against the tea duty, counting pairs, there were ten.

Mr. O'MALLEY. — How many of the steerage party?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I do not know, and I have only one remark to make about the question of steering from the steerage—that, judging from some of the things we have seen in the press in the recess, and a little of that which we have heard to-night, there is a more malodorous part of a ship than the steerage, but from which the other ship can just as easily be steered, and that is the bilge. I have shown that the number of votes and pairs coming from the direct Opposition against the tea duty was larger than the number of defections from the Government side, so that their action was more than counterbalanced by the action of the right honorable and learned member and his friends. But he admitted that it was a legitimate duty. If it was a legitimate duty, and his desire was to adopt legitimate duties, and try to knock out what he called illegitimate duties, why did he not vote for the tea duty and redouble his efforts to knock out the illegitimate duties?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — The night before the Treasurer came down with a statement to the effect that the Government were going to receive under the Tariff £475,000 more than was originally estimated, and that is the reason why the Opposition voted against the tea duty.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — That is a totally unnecessary interruption, because it does not affect the argument I am addressing to the House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — It is true all the Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I notice that the honorable member becomes peculiarly lively in interruptions whenever he is disconcerted, and he is following his usual policy to-night.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I only know that you tried to rob the people by imposing taxation.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Is that a parliamentary expression, sir?

Mr. SPEAKER. — The honorable member for Macquarie will have an opportunity of speaking later on.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — I do not make charges of that kind. I do not even say that anybody in the House who makes certain unworthy and disgraceful references to a political opponent is trying to cheat the people.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I did not wish to say anything offensive to the right honorable and learned gentleman. What I wished to imply by my statement in regard to his robbing the people was this—

Mr. SPEAKER. — The honorable member can only offer an explanation when there is no honorable member addressing the House.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — We are told that I made that reference in my speech in Tasmania because tea is a strong line in that State. It may be a strong line there. I know that Tasmania has a very considerable shortage of Customs revenue having regard to what she requires. That shows very strongly that the present Tariff is not higher than that formerly in operation there.

Mr. THOMSON. — That has nothing whatever to do with the matter.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Then the Tariff revision phrase has no application. Now if tea is a "strong line" in Tasmania, the railway is a "strong line" in Western Australia, and I shall show honorable members what the right honorable gentleman, who has attacked the Government, has had to say about the Western Australian railway project. If I recollect aright, he said that he had always spoken in favour of this railway, and yet I remember a time when he expressed certain other opinions to an interviewer of the Sydney Daily Telegraph as reported in that newspaper on the 15th January, 1901. Before any Ministerial manifesto had been largely discussed, but after I had made some statements to an interviewer, this report appeared in the Daily Telegraph—

Mr. Reid regards Mr. Barton's assurance that the Government will shortly consider the question of building a railway from Western Australia to South Australia as nothing but a political trick intended to influence the Western Australian vote.

That was a splendid way for the right honorable gentleman to express himself in favour of the project.

Mr. REID.—I believe there is a good deal of that element still. I should like to see a little less talk and a little more work.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We can understand the right honorable and very disorderly member when he says before this matter comes into the Ministerial manifesto, that any mention of it is a trick to deceive the electors of Western Australia. We can understand him and his sincerity most perfectly when, after this matter has been made the subject of a Ministerial pronouncement, he goes to Western Australia and accuses the Government of not being sufficiently expeditious, at the same time telling the people that he would build the railway, engineer or no engineer. His utterances on this subject are even more variegated than his statements regarding the High Court Bill. One day the mere mention of the matter is a political trick to deceive the electors, but when the right honorable gentleman goes to Western Australia, where the railway is, to quote his own words, a "strong line," he represents that if he had anything to do with it he would build the railway without reference to engineers or any one else. This is the gentleman who talks about a political trick. Now I can reply to the right honorable gentleman in his own words—"Why should he forget facts so far?" In reference to the tea duty, the right honorable gentleman charges the Government with subservience to the labour party because the honorable member for Bland said he would divide the House against the Government on the question of the recommittal of the duty. The answer to that charge is that the Government considered the question for themselves. They considered whether they had a reasonable chance of securing the recommittal of the duty during the then current session.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What about the salt duty?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member can talk to the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Solomon, about that. The position of the Government regarding the tea duty was that they very carefully examined the whole question. Although a statement had been made by the Treasurer as to the probable results of the Tariff, the honorable member for Macquarie, if he looked into federal questions as federal questions, would soon comprehend that the revenue raised under the Tariff must be relative to a large extent to the financial needs of the various States. With a tea duty the financial positions of Queensland and Tasmania would have been very largely improved, and, although the duty would give much larger returns to some of the States which did not need revenue, it was the anxious desire of the Government to so adjust the revenue with duties like that on tea and other articles, that the more necessitous States would receive a greater financial return, and be relieved to a large extent from the effects of the shortage that would otherwise ensue. The Government were very anxious to recommit the duty with this object, and I now frankly confess, as I did at the time, that when we came to consider the matter, we thought that it would take a very long time, and that it was very doubtful whether the recommittal would be agreed to. What the Government felt, therefore, and what I then stated, was that we should wait until we could see whether the revenue returns showed any necessity for the duty. We were prepared to await the result of the operation of the Tariff without the duty for some months. Our intention, therefore, was not to bring it up again during that session, but to observe the working of the Tariff. If it showed, as we were afraid that it might after a time, a diminished revenue, we could then ask the House to reconsider its determination. The Tariff returns, however, as the Governor-General's speech has shown, are very satisfactory.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That shows that we were right after all.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It does not show that the honorable member was right. The Tariff receipts have turned out very satisfactory, and it is anticipated that sufficient revenue can be secured and that unnecessary financial embarrassment to the States can be avoided, although we were very much afraid that without the tea and other duties such embarrassment would ensue.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—That shows that we had a better knowledge than had the Government.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I do not think so. The honorable member for Macquarie is one of the best oppositionists of whom I know. I never knew him to neglect an opportunity of embarrassing the other side, irrespective altogether of financial forecasts. I am not sure that it may not transpire at any time that there are occasions when a gentleman who may be absent from this House, and who does not quite know what questions may turn up in his absence, acting in full reliance in the sagacity of the whip of his party, allows that whip to decide how his pair shall go. In reference to the Immigration Restriction Act, the honorable member for East Sydney has fallen foul of a passage in the speech which I delivered in Sydney about a month ago. The right honorable gentleman has purported to quote from the report in the Sydney Morning Herald. I shall give honorable members the full quotation of that part of my speech as it was reported in the newspaper referred to. I stated—

The attempt to defeat the Immigration Restriction Act was no attempt on behalf of the labour party—

I think I said "no insidious attempt," because they acted on what they thought was a just principle.

As far as they were concerned, they were always in favour of direct exclusion. I then went on to say—

But the Opposition tried to defeat the Act, because they were leagued with those who want cheap labour throughout the Commonwealth.

The phrase which I have quoted is the right honorable gentleman's subject of attack, and it is supposed that I am accusing him of entering into a combination —

MR. REID.—An unholy combination.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I do not find the words "unholy combination" in the report.

MR. REID.—I saw them there yesterday.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—It is very strange that I do not find them. However, they may be there, and in the meantime I will allow that they are there. What I wish to say is that it was as easily understood by my audience as it will be easily understood by those who sit around me, that one constant ground of opposition by protectionists to the policy of free-trade is that the industries and the manufactures of a country cannot be well carried on without cheap labour unless there is a Tariff to protect them. With such a Tariff we could do without cheap labour, and in the absence of such a Tariff we could do without cheap labour; but in the latter case we should not have the manufactures which our country desires and needs. There is a choice of two things—protection, at a reasonable rate of wages, and free-trade, with cheap importation, which must necessarily drive wages down. In this connexion nothing could have been better expressed than was the utterance of the Secretary of State for the Colonies the other day, when he referred to the fact that it was immaterial whether the people of England could secure goods cheaply, if their workers had not the money with which to pay for them.

MR. REID.—The workers were never in a better position than they are to-day.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—Against the conclusion of the right honorable member I prefer to take that of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I hope he will excuse me for making the preference, because I do so in no disrespectful spirit. Every protectionist regards the free-trade party, unless its members are false to its tenets, as being anxious to obtain the benefit of cheap labour. With cheap importations endangering their manufactures, how can they carry them to a successful conclusion without importing a class of labour which enters too cheaply into competition with their own, and which, while it enables their manufactures to be carried on for the benefit of the manufacturers, does not in any sense allow their own working people to participate in those benefits? That is the position of the protectionist as against that of the free-trader. When I speak of the right honorable and learned member being in league with those who desire cheap labour throughout the Commonwealth, it is because I cannot conceive of a free-trade policy being carried out in this country without its necessarily having the effect of decreasing the rate of wages in manufactures to such an extent that it is impossible to carry on those enterprises with our own people, and only possible to do so by importing those below our own standard. That may be a wrong view to take—probably it is, in the opinion of my right honorable friend—but it is honestly my view, and one which I took leave to express. If my right honorable friend thinks it conveyed any personal imputation, I can assure him that no such thing was intended, and if it had that effect on the minds of my hearers I should be very sorry indeed.

Mr. REID.—If it was merely a protectionist wheeze I do not mind a bit.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—A protectionist wheeze is sometimes better than a free-trade gasp. What I was saying of the right honorable and learned member was this—that he had really allied himself in speech and division with those who, honestly enough on their part, proposed an amendment which he, from his own experience, must have seen would have endangered the passage of the Immigration Restriction Bill. I wished to pass an effective measure. I knew that the passage of any measure in which the colour line was sharply drawn—that is, a measure the object of which was direct exclusion—would, if we could place any reliance on the statements made to my right honorable friend and the other Premiers who were present at the Imperial Conference in 1897, be endangered, and that even if it were passed it would be only at the price of embarrassment to the Empire in its internal and external relations. That was my honest opinion, as it was also that of my right honorable and learned friend, because when he went to England in 1897 he had already submitted to the New South Wales Parliament a Bill containing a distinct provision for the exclusion of coloured races. I think that he had actually passed the measure, and that it was reserved for the Royal assent. If my recollection be correct, it had not been distinctly disallowed by the Home Government when the Imperial Conference met. At that gathering, however Mr. Chamberlain made a speech to the assembled Premiers pointing out that the internal and external relations of the Empire would alike be embarrassed by the passing of any immigration restriction measure which drew an express colour line. He referred to the Act which had been passed in Natal—unfortunately too late for many practical purposes—and suggested to the Premiers from the self-governing colonies that upon their return, if they wished to pass any measure of the sort, it should be upon the lines of that Act, instead of containing provision for the direct exclusion of coloured races.

Mr. REID.—He never made any such remark to me.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That does not matter if what I have stated is the substance of that which the Secretary of State for the Colonies declared and published for the benefit of the Australian Premiers.

Mr. REID.—He never said that an Act would not be passed unless we did what he told us.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. But that the right honorable and learned member himself entertained grave doubt whether any such measure would be assented to is evidenced by the fact that upon his return to Australia he introduced and passed a Bill upon the lines of the Natal Act, despite the fact that he had previously carried in the New South Wales Parliament a measure containing provision for the direct exclusion of coloured races, and one which had not been assented to by the Imperial authorities. That the right honorable and learned member apprehended what the fate of that measure would be unless he acted upon the advice which was tendered to him is perfectly clear from the fact that he came back to Australia and passed a Bill on the lines of the Natal Act.

Mr. REID.—As a mere makeshift.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The right honorable and learned member says that he did so because New South Wales was too weak to insist upon the passage of a Bill containing provision for the direct exclusion of coloured races, whereas the Commonwealth could have insisted upon the passage of such a measure. But I would point out that if the effect of such action on the part of the Commonwealth was likely to embarrass the Empire within and without, that was not a laudable ambition. After what the right honorable member has said to-night about the Empire; after the glowing periods in which he has praised its progress, and offered up his deepest vows and wishes for its integrity, is it conceivable that in the face of an assurance from Mr. Chamberlain of the nature I have indicated—an assurance which did not depend upon Mr. Chamberlain's strength or weakness, but upon the internal and external relations of the Empire—he should, having done one thing when he was Premier of New South Wales, be ready to do another as leader of the Opposition in the Commonwealth Parliament? Surely that position could not be justified. When I hear talk about "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain," who was it, I ask, who said "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain" in 1897? Who was it that came back to Australia and passed the very measure which the Secretary of State for the Colonies had advised? If that was not a case of "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain," then from what mouth does such a statement proceed? The right honorable member said—"Yes, Mr. Chamberlain" in practice, but when an amendment was moved from the Opposition, it was then "Yes, Mr. Watson" came in. When the right honorable member was near Mr. Chamberlain it was "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain," and he was very close to Mr. Watson when it was "Yes, Mr. Watson."

Mr. REID.—I often say "yes" to the honorable member for Bland; he is a very decent fellow.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No doubt the right honorable member would like to see a little more of the honorable member for Bland. Of course there was no compact; it was only that the right honorable member and the honorable member for Bland fortuitously and extraordinarily happened during five years to vote the same way. That, of course, was not "steering from the steerage."

Mr. REID.—No, it was not.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It was not, because what the right honorable member calls "the steerage," he had cheek by jowl with him in the saloon.

Mr. REID.—That is where labour ought always to be.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Then why call the labour party "the steerage?" However the right honorable member tries to change about, it only means that every further reference causes another wriggle.

Mr. REID.—Oh, that is evident.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is true, and cannot be denied. So much then for this attack on the Immigration Restriction Act. We all know the right honorable member's history in relation to this matter. It is like all other parts of his history—and I say this in all kindness—in that it is absolutely consistent and true to the prevailing description of his acts and policy—it is a "Yes-No" policy.

Mr. REID.—I have done more in two years in a straight line than the Prime Minister could do all his life. I have done something for the country to which I belong.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask honorable members not to so frequently interrupt speakers. I have called attention to this breach of order once before to-day, and do not wish to have to do so again.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I should not mind the interruptions so much if they did not take up time. We are told that the Government acted in subservience to a British Minister—that we adopted the policy we did in this Act because of an intimation received from that Minister. But it was conclusively shown by the Attorney-General last session that this charge was absolutely unfounded, and I am more than astonished that it should be renewed. The right honorable member was told, and it was proved—I believe the draft was brought to the table—that before the despatch was received from Mr. Chamberlain the Bill was in draft containing this clause.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was in print.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—And when the proof is in cold print and the right honorable member has been confronted with it, what excuse is there for renewing a charge of this kind?

Mr. REID.—I did not make any such charge. The Attorney-General is quite right in what he says regarding the facts. What I said was that no Government should come to this House to discuss a Bill, having previously submitted themselves to the Secretary of State for the Colonies for his approval of the lines on which it was to be carried out.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to that is that the Government had committed themselves in one if not more drafts of the Bill long before Mr. Chamberlain's despatch came. The Government had thinkingly and deliberately adopted the policy before the despatch, which was supposed to have influenced it, was ever penned. That, I think, is a complete answer to the charge. As a matter of fact, the right honorable member based his criticism on a note which I had written on the margin of the despatch, and which I showed him. That note was made on the receipt of the despatch, and it was to the effect that the Government did not contemplate in the intended Bill to lay down any lines other than those mentioned in the despatch. But why did I say that? Because the Bill was there in print, and when we had already adopted a policy which was in consonance with the despatch, it is too bad to renew an accusation which has already been refuted in clear and set terms by a Minister of the Crown. Reference has been made to what Senator O'Connor said as reported on page 127 of Hansard; and his speech was correctly quoted. All I have to say is that that speech was made on the 10th of May, shortly after the beginning of the session, and at that time, as I have stated, the Bill was already in draft and in the same form as now. Senator O'Connor, in replying to a question, seems to have made a mistake in saying or implying that there would be a direct exclusion of aliens, while there would be an educational test applied to coloured people who were British subjects. That was not the policy of the Government as laid down in the Bill; and the matter escaped my attention, or I should have pointed out the provisions to Senator O'Connor. We all know that a Minister in the opening days of the session may, in the same way as an oppositionist, have a somewhat confused idea of a measure which he has only once read. At the same time I can repeat the assurance to the House that the policy of the measure was actually settled before the session began. I come now to my right honorable friend's utterances in reference to the Tariff. It is rather peculiar how as time goes on the policy of the right honorable member undergoes the "sweating process"—how intended devastation is expressed in lurid terms at the beginning, how the policy is whittled down a little as it is seen to be unpopular, and how at last, when he comes into the House, and when he has probably reflected that he has no more chance of carrying a policy of the kind here than he would have out of doors, it becomes attenuated. What has the right honorable gentleman said previously on this matter? When he came back from Western Australia on the 12th of January he gave an interview to a representative of the Sydney Morning Herald. In that interview he said—

He was going to make free-trade his battle cry.

That does not mean a reduction of some of the protective duties, but means free-trade.

Mr. REID.—It means a revenue Tariff.

Sir Edmund Barton.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No; free-trade is the wiping out of protective duties, and this is what the right honorable member for five years in New South Wales constantly defined as free-trade. While the wiping out went on merrily employes began to think, "It is a good thing because it makes goods very cheap; but I wish we had a little more money to buy what we see in the shops." In the course of the interview the right honorable member went on to say—

He was going to make "free-trade" his battle-cry, and from that policy he had resolved to make no deviation, not even if it cost his party defeat at the next general election. He did not want to get into office by any side issue.

There the right honorable member was like the policeman in the Pirates of Penzance, who sang—

We find the wisest thing
Is to slap your chests and sing—
Tar-an-ta-ra.

Then in reference to the Tariff the right honorable member said—

If returned to power at the next elections, my object will be to disturb the Tariff as little as possible.

That is very nice!

But there are so many duties on the present Tariff which are clearly imposed in order to destroy the revenue, that drastic alterations would be necessary.

Does the right honorable member mean to assert that what he has said to the House to-night implies that there will be "drastic alterations" in the Tariff if he has the chance of making them?

Mr. REID.—Absolutely; that is to say I should bring the Tariff down to a revenue basis.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is a good thing that I have read those extracts, because the right honorable member did not venture to say anything like what he has just now said until he was challenged by the printed testimony to his two attitudes.

Mr. REID.—It is the same thing.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is not the same thing. If duties in the Tariff are to be deprived of their protective effect, we shall surely have the assertion from my right honorable friend that he will be consistent. Let him carry out his policy if he gets a chance, though I do not think that that is coming yet. Then the first thing he would have to do would be to balance the import duty on sugar by an excise duty of £6 per ton. That would be a splendid thing for the revenue. All the sugar that would be used would be imported sugar, and would pay the import duty. But not even the kanaka would be able to grow sugar-cane then. If the sugar-growing industry would not be a white man's industry, it would also be too poor to be a black man's industry. There would be plenty of revenue coming in from the import duty upon sugar, but there would be no utilization of the cane fields, which were surely destined by nature to be of use to us, unless, perhaps, the right honorable gentleman thinks they may be turned into dairy farms. Under his system, there would be no chance of carrying out a white Australia policy unless the perennial and eternal barrenness of the cane land was coupled with the exclusion of coloured aliens. As a free-trader, he must make his excise duty equal to his import duty, and to do such a thing would put an end to the sugar industry. Of course, it would have this advantage, which should not be readily forgotten, that the cane fields could not be utilized for sugar growing by black labour, since not even the black man could then live by sugar growing. We have taken different measures—measures which secure the employment of our own people and the exclusion of those whom it is not thought desirable to have in our country. We have found that the only effective way to do that is to allow a margin between the excise and the import duties, which will give an opportunity to our brothers and fellow countrymen to ply their avocations and receive a profitable return for their labours. Now we are asked to adopt, by the revision of the Tariff, a policy which, if carried out with the smallest spark of honesty, would reverse what we have already achieved, and destroy the sugar industry. When the right honorable gentleman next addresses the House upon the subject of free-trade, let him definitely state his position upon this matter. He may be inclined to say that he would justify what he proposes on the ground of high policy. Those words are often used to cover a multitude of sins. I heard them used a little while ago in Tasmania, when a certain distinguished gentleman from that State, who sits upon the opposition benches, and consequently supports free-trade to the best of his ability, was asked whether, if his party came into office, they would remove the duty upon

New Zealand potatoes and oats. His reply was—"No. We should be against the removal of that duty from motives of high policy." So the farmers of Tasmania are compelled to derive their notions of "high policy" from the prohibition of the importation of potatoes and oats.

Mr. PAGE.—Who said that?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No doubt the statement will be owned by the right honorable gentleman who will probably follow me.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Is the right honorable member referring to me?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is "only a little one." We and those who support us shut out New Zealand potatoes and oats from this market, and we do so because we say that that is part of our policy. But when the free-trader is asked if he would shut them out he says "Yes"; and when asked "Why?" he answers, "From motives of high policy." That is not protection! We have this policy applied to potatoes and oats in one State, and to sugar in another. No wonder theirs is a three-legged policy, which has not the virtues even of a quadruped. The right honorable gentleman who made the utterance to which I refer was not asked any further questions; but he might have been asked whether, if they grew potatoes and oats in a place as far off as Buenos Ayres, he would shut those productions out of the Commonwealth. Perhaps if he had been asked that question he would still have replied "Yes." The "high policy" on the Tasmanian coast is the interest of the farmer there. He is to be protected on that ground, while every one else may be left to starve. That is not my view of an Australian policy, though my notions on the subject are pretty high. However, we can leave these excuses to be dealt with by the operation of the opposing acids and alkalies which they contain, which may form new chemical combinations, but will not lead to a successful political combination. Referring to the Tariff question, the leader of the Opposition said that—

They proposed to take items in the Tariff which were intended to destroy revenue, and reduce them so as to raise revenue.

He was reading certain figures from a protectionist journal, at which he is obviously not afraid to laugh, so that it cannot have the terrors for him which he supposes it to possess for others. There is no doubt a high moral courage about the right honorable gentleman which is apparent sometimes when he wants to gird at a political opponent, but is not so apparent when he wishes to enter into a combination which may be of advantage to his party. Leaving that matter alone for a minute, he wants to raise the fiscal question, because it was not a fair issue at the general elections, and he raises what he has dignified by the title of an "old wheeze" with reference to my utterances at Maitland. I have remained silent long enough in this House on the subject of my Maitland speech, because I did not want to join in an absolute saturnalia of waste of time. Those utterances were before the public, and the assertion that I have deceived the public required no refutation from me. But let me go back to those utterances to see whether it is not true that the issue was fought out, and fought out fairly, at the general elections. Take one of the utterances which have been most quoted—

Revenue we must have—that is the all-important consideration—because without that revenue the State will not be advantaged but cursed by federation.

That we must all admit—

The Commonwealth must pay its way, help the States to pay their way, study their every detail, distribute the burden justly, and do no mischief. That is the task now before my honorable friend, Mr. Kingston. He is capable of performing it. But it cannot be performed with any such notion of revenue Tariff as we have been hearing of in all the capitals of Australia. The situation forced upon us can be forced upon any Government. Do not mistake me when I say that the situation forces itself upon us. I am a protectionist, and so are nearly all my colleagues. But if we are to raise a great revenue for the security of the Federation, then we cannot be prohibitionists, and our protection must be moderate, because prohibition or exclusive protection would lead to a prevention of that access of revenue which is necessary for the proper government of the country.

It is the constant cry of my honorable friends opposite that the operation of the Tariff, reduced as the duties have been, is to raise a revenue sufficient for the needs of the country. If, as they say, protection prevents the raising of revenue for the needs of the country, how can they assert that this is a Tariff the revenue from which would be increased by great reductions in the rate of duties?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—May I ask which of the right honorable member's colleagues are not protectionists? He says that "nearly all" of them are protectionists.

Sir Edmund Barton.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I say that nearly all of them are so, more or less. I have already shown that the right honorable gentleman and the leader of the Opposition are free-traders only more or less, and decidedly less when local interests are concerned. I know at whom the shaft is aimed, because it comes from an old rival and political opponent of one who was sometimes a Ministerial colleague of my right honorable friend, Sir Edward Braddon. The right honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, believes in a duty on potatoes and oats, only against New Zealand of course, because that is a matter of high policy. My honorable friend and colleague, Sir Philip Fysh, believes in the Tariff which we brought down, because as it was introduced it fulfilled the proposals of the Maitland speech in providing for the necessary revenue without destruction of industries. How can any one argue for a moment that a man who lays down a policy of obtaining sufficient revenue, coupled with moderate protection, is not putting before the country the fact that he intends to bring in a protectionist tariff? Let me read a few lines more from my Maitland speech:—

But if we are to raise a great revenue for the security of the federation, then we cannot be prohibitionists, and our protection must be moderate because prohibition, or exclusive protection, would lead to a prevention of that access of revenue which is necessary for the proper government of the country. Australia has known tariffs for many years in all the States. There has been more or less protection even in New South Wales, and there is still £3 per ton on sugar. Who left it there? What is it there for? Are we to abolish that protection now, and begin the prosperity of the union by ruining our northern farmers?

The policy that was laid down was this: In the first instance, it was pointed out that direct taxation would be no part of the policy of the Government, because it professed its desire—and very sincerely professed it—that the States, as far as possible, should be left the opportunity of imposing direct taxation to make up any shortages which might occur in their own finances. It was not that direct taxation was an undesirable thing, but that it ought to be a reserve and resort for the States to make up any shortages that might occur under the Tariff. The Government also laid down the principle that it would not only try to raise all the revenue that the Commonwealth required for its own government, and for the necessary returns to the States out of the Tariff, but that it should couple with that a policy of refusing to destroy industries which had grown up in the States. It must be remembered that, with diverse tariff policies in half-a-dozen States, it must happen that industries have grown up in one State which under a different policy have not grown up in another. If it were possible to make six tariffs, it would be possible to maintain an industry in the State where it existed. When we have, however, to make a policy for the whole six States, it follows as a matter of course that, while maintaining protection to an industry which has grown up in one State, we are giving the very opportunity for its creation in another State where it has not previously existed. That must necessarily be the result of any tariff which pursues the two objects of revenue with protection, and the refusal to destroy an industry in one State must mean the encouragement of a similar manufacture or production in the others. From this it must have been perfectly obvious to any one with any degree of fairness in his composition who read my speech, that we intended a protective policy, and that we, being protectionists, did not desire to see that policy operating in one State and not operating in another. The Tariff must be uniform, and the things which could not be produced in a State owing to its former Tariff may, in the future, constitute new industries in that State, although not new to other parts of the Commonwealth. That was the course of reasoning which lay behind all the argument to which reference has been made, and an assertion that the Tariff, even as it was brought down by the Government, was in any degree in opposition to that course of reasoning, is not only unfair, but is one of those many statements which people try to convince themselves and others are true by the frequency with which they make them.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—Why did the right honorable gentleman's chairman give up his policy?

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—Because he was not as intelligent as he might have been.

MR. REID.—He resigned from the right honorable gentleman's committee.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—He was the only member of my committee who left it, and therefore, with one exception, the whole committee understood the speech which I made, and adopted the principles laid down in it.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—But the chairman of the right honorable gentleman's committee resigned.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—Has the honorable member never lost a member of his committee? He has had from time to time a good many of them on the committees of his opponents. The honorable member voted against federation, and he lost his constituency. We can leave it at that.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—I won back my constituency, notwithstanding the right honorable gentleman's opposition.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—No imputations of motives, if the honorable member pleases. Having read that passage from my speech, it now remains for us to consider whether those who, with their leader, cried out, were ever misled. Let us find out whether they were.

MR. REID.—I was not misled.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I shall utilize that confession in a minute or two in a way that the right honorable gentleman may not like. My right honorable friend, on the 7th March of the same year—after this speech had been delivered—said—which the Prime Minister of Australia adopts. He chooses a red-hot protectionist Ministry to carry out protection to the bitter end—if they are strong enough—and yet he is constantly trying to persuade the free-traders that really if they support him everything will come out in the end just the same as if they supported me.

But look at the unscrupulous attitude—

I do not like to say that this is a case of Satan reproving sin—

I did not attempt to persuade the free-traders; but I do say that a policy such as I laid down, and such as was embodied in the Tariff which I introduced, might well have commanded the support of those who desire to see the union of this country continued with justice to the history and the future of the several States. This was the object with which I brought forward that manifesto. It was equally the object with which the Tariff was brought down, and that Tariff as introduced was lower than any other known protectionist Tariff in the world. Honorable members of the Opposition said, "Why don't you do as Canada does? There is a free-trade Premier in Canada. He has carried out free-trade in that important Dominion. Why do you not follow in his footsteps in this Federation?" We published our Tariff side by side with the Canadian Tariff, and one was about twice as high as the other. Suddenly, after that publication, all the talk about Canada ceased. Up to that time the free-trade Prime Minister of Canada was being belauded to the skies because he had adopted a policy which was practically the only policy that could have held that State together and protected it from destruction. Free-trader as he is in theory, he is that sort of protectionist; and I am that sort of protectionist. The passage which I have quoted shows that the leader of the Opposition knew that a protectionist Tariff would be brought down. The right honorable gentleman did not mistake my words, and my words convey no other implication than that. The right honorable gentleman said much more—as he generally does—than I have quoted. He made this statement—

Mr. Barton is still half-hearted—

I do not know how he found that out—but his position is unmistakable, if his language is not. He figured at the protectionist gathering at the Australia Hotel the other day, and witnessed the large subscriptions handed in by protectionist manufacturers in support of the campaign, and surely he did not take those moneys other than as a contribution tax in support of a protectionist campaign.

Why, in every speech in that campaign I said that the policy of the Government would be a protectionist one—

The manifesto of his own association has now been published. It is the manifesto of the association formed by Sir Edmund Barton at the Hotel Australia, an association of which he is the president.

That manifesto was a protectionist one and I claim as I have claimed all the time from the day of its utterance, that the Maitland speech was a protectionist one. But what is more to the purpose is this: That the honorable gentleman was not misled, as he said the issue must be free-trade and protection. Now what does that involve? On the 9th January, 1901, before any of these utterances, and even before my manifesto, the right honorable gentleman used these words in an interview at Launceston, and we shall see how they contrast with the attitude he has assumed this afternoon—

It was the desire on all hands, and it was in the interests of every one connected with industries, that the fiscal question should be settled as soon as possible, and settled finally now. If it was not made the issue of the first election, the defeated party could claim that the matter had not been fought out, and could keep up an incessant feeling of unrest that would seriously affect commercial interests. The general desire is to fight the question out once and for all, and so leave future sessions free for such matters of pressing concern as may come up for consideration.

What was the right honorable gentleman's opinion then? Even before I made my speech it was that the clear issue was free-trade and protection, and after I made it he raised the same issue, and in another speech, which it is, perhaps, unnecessary to quote, he said that any free-trader would be a traitor who did not vote against the Government. Did he expect, then, any other policy than that which was brought down? From his own confession he did not. How, then, do the right honorable gentleman and his friends stand with reference to their charge against me of having deceived the country? They knew, from my references to the composition of the Ministry and to the fact that there must be protection, though it must be moderate—and it was moderate to the extent of being lower than any other protectionist Tariff we know of—they knew from these facts that while there would have to be a large revenue collected, the Tariff must be a protectionist Tariff, and from that position from that day to this neither I nor any of my colleagues has ever wavered. How, then, can it be said that the issue was not before the country? And if the issue was fairly before the country, what is the answer to be made by any one, including himself, to the words of the right honorable gentlemen, when he said that if it were not made the issue of the first election, the defeated party could claim that the matter had not been fought out, and could keep up an incessant feeling of unrest that would seriously affect commercial interests. It has been made the issue of the first election, the defeated party cannot claim that it has not been fought out, and the members of that party are, therefore, not justified, in the words of their leader, "in keeping up an incessant feeling of unrest, which will seriously affect commercial interests." I say, therefore, that to talk of making this Tariff the issue of the general election over again, and to talk of making alterations, which will be drastic, no matter how the right honorable gentleman tries to whittle away his words, is a policy which stands condemned in the extract which I have quoted from his speech. The right-honorable gentleman said enough in that interview to show that it would be a most injurious and improper thing for this country to have to go through the fiscal struggle again. He has shown in what he said there, and from his own confessions at this table to-night that he cannot complain that he was misled or that he understood the issue in any sense other than that in which it was raised and fought out ; and having been so raised and fought out, he will deserve every condemnation which he has stated if he attempts to raise it again at the next election.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It is the people who will raise it, and not the right honorable gentleman.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member has got into a very bad habit. He makes so many speeches, many of them very interesting ones, in this House, that he has got into the habit, which persons get who are talking all the time, of thinking that he is the people. Now I may leave that question of the Tariff issue, except to point out that it is not a justification for saying that the country should be torn asunder again by the fiscal issue being raised at the general election, to admit that this Tariff is not all that this Ministry could have wished it to be. There are some of the duties which have been reduced which we could have wished had not been reduced. Some duties have been abolished which, for the sake of some of the States, the Government could have wished not to have been abolished. But it is still a Tariff which raises a large revenue. It might be more beneficial to one or two of the States if it raised something more—

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Hear, hear !

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—My right honorable friend cheers me very properly, but it is a Tariff which combines, although not so fully as the Government could have wished, the double principle of revenue without destruction. We find it in accordance with our policy to that extent, and we are therefore perfectly consistent with that policy in refusing now to allow it to be disturbed. As the honorable member for South Sydney has said, the people can make a revision and they can enforce it. The whole question may be raised at the general election, when that comes, if the people wish it, but those who raise it im providently, and those who raise it to the injury of the country, and against the fair meaning of their own utterances, will be judged by the people, and I have no fear of the result. My right honorable friend was, if I may use an every-day simile, "barking up the wrong tree" with reference to the gentleman named Mr. Martin. It is enough to say that neither is Mr. Martin nor was he ever a chief electoral officer. He never was proposed as a chief electoral officer, and Mr. Lewis is acting so far in that position only temporarily. Mr. Lewis is in receipt of a pension from the Government of New South Wales. He receives only a very slight addition to that pension, and for the work he is doing for the Commonwealth he is certainly not overpaid. The Commonwealth pays him, I think, some £300.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That is sweating.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No, it is not, because he is in receipt of his pension, which amounts to about £300. I fully admit that it may be necessary in making a permanent appointment to this position to grade it somewhat higher and to give a little higher salary, but taking things as they are no one can say that this gentleman is being pampered.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Do you give him an allowance?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Nothing but the ordinary travelling allowance—actual expenses. I need not, I think, make any further reference to Mr. Lewis, but I may say that it does not follow that he will be permanently appointed Chief Electoral Officer. He is, however, a man of long experience in dealing with these electoral questions, as well as with questions of local government. He has had wide experience in that respect in New South Wales, and his services have been found to be very useful in his present temporary capacity.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He was acting in that capacity in New South Wales just previously.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—He was recalled, I think, to the New South Wales service to render services in that capacity. Now I come to the all-absorbing topic of the six batters. My right honorable friend says that he takes his share of the blame. It is interesting to know whether he was in favour of the section as passed. I give him whatever credit is due from the fact that he was absent from Parliament when the clause went through. But it is interesting to inquire whether he was against that clause when he saw that it had gone through, because he was here in subsequent stages of the Bill before it went to the Senate—and at not one of those stages did he take exception to it.

MR. REID.—I never observed it.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—From which remark it follows that my right honorable friend spoke about it though knowing nothing as to what was in the Bill.

MR. REID.—It was a subsidiary matter.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—The proviso was one of the longest provisions in the Bill. However, we will take the assurance of the right honorable member that he did not read the Bill. Although it was "swellin' wisely" before his very eyes, like the fat boy in Pickwick, yet he did not observe it. But there were others who did observe it. The honorable member for Wentworth gave it something which I can scarcely call opposition or support, but I think he expressed the opinion that it was too drastic. The honorable member for Macquarie gave it his whole-hearted support, and it was carried without a division. I do not think that, except in what I have mentioned, there was any word of disapproval from the opposition benches. It went through in the Senate and came back to us; and from the first to the last, after that clause had been implanted in the Bill, it did not provoke—except the comments which were raised against it in the Senate—any opposition from Parliament, and certainly it provoked none from this House. Consequently that clause may be regarded as not being the work of one side or the other. It was not the work of one side or the other, being a proposal not originally contained in the Bill, but in an amendment emanating from the Opposition side of the Chamber.

MR. REID.—Was it not in the Bill originally?

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—No.

MR. REID.—That is how I missed it.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—Now we have got it! My right honorable friend is in this habit—which accounts for the inaccuracy of some of his statements—that he only sees what exists in a Bill when he reads it as laid upon the table; and if he bestowed a little more care upon measures, he would, according to his way of thinking, read them in the original draft!

MR. REID.—It is enough to look at them once.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—Now we find this position—that the right honorable member and his party are in the same boat. The amendment came from that quarter. There was no more subversion in this quarter of the House in voting for it than in that. I do not accuse any party of subversion in voting for it. I explained at the time that the amendment was quite in consonance with the opinion expressed by me in the Legislature of New South Wales, and when I was afterwards spoken to, in an interview with the press, I gave the very quotation from the New South Wales Hansard that showed that I expressed that opinion ten years before. So that I cannot be accused of any sudden conversion in this respect. Whatever my right honorable friend may say, I have been reasonably consistent in my opinions. When I do change them it may be at intervals of something like fifteen years or so, like my change to protection, but it is not on the same day, and it is not caused by a visit to England.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman changed in about seven days on one occasion.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—That is not a fact, as I have explained over and over again. But it is natural enough, coming from the lips of gentlemen who never read anything except from their own side. Now, amongst prohibited immigrants under this measure—that section having been passed with the common consent of the House—is placed—

Any person under a contract or agreement to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth.

Then comes this proviso—

Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to workmen exempted by the Minister for special skill required in Australia or to persons under contract or agreement to serve as part of the crew of a vessel engaged in the coasting trade in Australian waters if the rates of wages specified therein are not lower than the rates ruling in the Commonwealth.

Now, referring to this particular case, the position arose in consequence of a telegram which I received from the Sub-Collector of Customs in Sydney, Mr. Baxter. He intimated to the secretary of the department that there were six felt hatters landing under contract. They were bound for Sydney, and were about to arrive under contract to perform manual labour. There was not a word then about any special skill. I gave the usual direction. It was to exclude them, because such persons must be excluded under the law until special skill required in Australia is proved. The fact that that applies to artisans and workers of skill, and not to mere manual labourers, is clear, because if the condition applied only to persons of special skill, there would have been no occasion to insert the proviso that it should not apply to them. That is enough to show that persons of some degree of skill were aimed at under the proviso in this section of the Act if the English language means anything. That law being in existence, it was my duty to administer it, not from any party aspect, but as carefully and impartially as though I were a Judge on the Bench. That is what I did. I could not let the hatters come in until they or those with whom they had agreed were prepared to show that they possessed special skill which was required within the Commonwealth. That assurance could have been furnished as soon as their employers knew that the vessel had arrived at Fremantle. It was not furnished; and it appears that when they landed there they were examined as to whether they were under any contract or agreement, but the Customs-house officers examining them could not find out that they were. They came round, and this telegram came from the Sub-Collector of Customs before they reached Sydney. I gave the necessary order that, being under contract to perform manual labour, the hatters should not be admitted. At that time I had no knowledge whatever of those applications or suggestions from outside quarters to which my right honorable friend refers. A letter was written to the Minister for Trade and Customs by one of the labour organizations. It was dated the very day I gave that order, but I did not see it for some time after. It was sent to the department of my colleague, and a note appears upon the papers to that effect. There is a note of mine on the papers, which I put upon them soon after I saw the letter referred to. The note was to this effect—

Not before me at the time I directed that the men, being under contract to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth, must be regarded as by law "prohibited immigrants" until it was shown to me that they possessed "special skill required in Australia." At time of decision to that effect no representation was before me, except an official one from Customs, Sydney—namely, Mr. Baxter's telegram.

That disposes of the suggestion that the Government were influenced in any way in excluding these men by any outside representation. What an absurdity it would have been—if it were true that the Government were influenced by outside representations to shut them out under any circumstances—that nevertheless they afterwards admitted them. If those outside representations had their influence as suggested, the men would not have been admitted afterwards. That is enough to show how absurd that outcry is.

Mr. THOMSON.—It is more than an outcry.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If the honorable member says that the Government were so influenced I give the statement my distinct denial, and I wish that he would be more accurate in future. Whether in pursuance of the outcry or not will be plain to every unprejudiced reader of these papers, and if it is not plain to the honorable member after reading them, he is not unprejudiced. I have, as I have said, administered the Act as if I had been a Judge on the Bench, and when the honorable member knows the facts of the case—which it is obvious he does not now know—he will agree with me. What I did then was this: I gave that direction consequent upon a telegram from my own officers pursuant to information which of course came from a private quarter. Afterwards—some days afterwards—an application was made to me. There was a note from my under-secretary to say that he had been waited upon by the president and the secretary of the Felt Hatters' Association, who informed him—that was, on the 5th December, whereas my decision was given on the 4th—of a telegram having been received stating the names of men on the Orontes in possession of agreements to work for Mr. Charles Anderson—the names of the men follow—and that other men were to follow in the next Orient steamer. They said that they had reason to believe that the men were under a similar agreement. A protest was handed to me undated, but received on the 9th, by the Victorian branch of the Australian Association of Felt Hatters, giving reasons why, in their judgment, these men should not be admitted. Two days afterwards—that is to say, eight days after the telegram came from the Collector of Customs in Sydney—there was an application in writing from Mr. Anderson, the employer, for their admission. That was the first application for the exemption of the men. It was impossible to exempt them until some evidence was brought before me that they were entitled to an exemption by reason of possessing special skill required in Australia. The reason why I waited was that I had to wait. How could I, without the necessary evidence, admit them when prima facie they were within the law, and so must be excluded? I had to exclude them until the evidence was brought before me. But that evidence could have been submitted on that day or the next day; and if there was delay which resulted in inconvenience to the men, at whose door does it lie? Does it lie at my door, when I had not the opportunity of finding out anything, or at the door of those who knew the facts and did not bring them before me? The employer knowing the facts at last made an application in writing to me, and it was supported by statutory declarations. Again acting from a sense of impartiality after considering those declarations, I wrote to those who had protested against the admission of the men, and pointed out certain questions upon which I wished them to give me information so that I might have the full facts on both sides. They answered the queries I made and produced certain other papers. I considered the statutory declarations and other evidence brought before me by Mr. Anderson, and with the same open mind the representations which had been made to me by the Felt Hatters' Union here, and having given full consideration to both, I decided that, under all the circumstances, these men were possessed of special skill that was required in Australia; and after writing a long memorandum in which I explained the whole of my opinions, I gave orders, by telegram, for their admission to Sydney. I submit to this House that it was impossible for me to have given those orders before that date. I venture to say, from all that went on at the time, that the noise which was made about this thing originated from some party source, and was got up without regard to the interests of this community by those who wished to gain a party advantage. One would think that those who dealt with matters of this kind coldly and impartially were deserving of the support of all sections in the community and of both sides in this House. But I found to my bitter experience

it was not so. I found that a turmoil was got up here, followed by another turmoil got up by some men in England, and obviously arising out of telegrams which were sent, which caused the Agent-General for New South Wales to write to Sir John See that it was affecting Australian credit. Whose fault was it if it did affect Australian credit? That the exclusion of the six hatters brought down the value of our debentures by about 10 per cent. is a kind of fiction which exists in the imagination of those who act in this manner. But if it did seriously affect Australian credit, it could only have been owing to the guise in which the facts were sent to England by those who were interested. If the facts, as I have detailed them, and as they appear in the papers, had been telegraphed to England—I tried to counteract the inaccurate reports afterwards, but my telegram was too late—there would have been no talk from Mr. Copeland or any one else about an injury to Australian credit. The idea of saying that because we require that persons who come here should be free men absolved of contracts which they might have entered into in other lands, and free to make their own arrangements, we wish to shut out reasonable and decent immigration, is as wicked a fabrication as ever was invented against a Ministry. Now, at last, I have had the opportunity of defending myself in this House. The attack is a disgrace to those who uttered it, and one which, when the whole of the facts have sunk deep into the public mind, will bear its refutation and its retribution. The right honorable and learned member who has challenged me on this subject says that he would have legislated in a different way. Well, he did not try to legislate in a different way when he had the opportunity. He says that he did not read anything about this matter, that he preferred the Bill in its antiquated form to its up-to-date form. If he is going to draw up an amendment to put the provision on what he deems the right footing, why did he not suggest the form of it in his speech? Will he sit down at the table on any day of this week, before the debate is closed, and draft the form in which he would put the provision so as to do justice in a fairer form than it now does? I wish to assure the House that I am the last man to be accused of any attempt to shut out any reputable European from these shores. But when I find that from a good and correct motive a provision of that kind has been passed, even if men ultimately turn out to be entitled to come in, I must, if they are under contract, refuse to allow their admission until they prove their title. The proof of the contract, the admission of it—and they did admit it—was prima facie evidence that they could not come in. That evidence could be entirely rebutted by proving that they were possessed of a special skill that was required here. In the interval, before that proof was given, prima facie, they were not entitled to admission. The moment it was given, and given to my satisfaction, I was bound to let them in, and I did, and on similar evidence I let in six of their successors. But what is the reason for all this hubbub if it is not a party move? Let my right honorable and learned friend attempt to draw out the clause which he says he will draw out, and then do not let him talk any more of this. Let him try it on 60 or 600. That is the way to test it. This is not a question of six hatters; it is a question of whether men are to enter Australia free, or whether they shall be stopped if they are under contract to perform manual labour, with this one exception, that if they are possessed of a certain degree of skill which is required, they will even then be entitled to admission. That is the point of this law. I submit that the law is reasonable, and if the case came before me again to-morrow, I should act in the way I have done, and in no other way. If the case occurred 50 times in a year I should act in that way. And to prove that I was right in so acting, when the six successors of these men came forward in a fortnight, what happened? The necessary proof was given before they reached Sydney, and I was enabled to allow them to land without obstruction. Does not that of itself show that if a right course had been followed under the Act in the first instance by others than myself, the men, having their title proved, would have been admitted just as their successors were? And, therefore, is it not clear that the whole blame of this transaction rests upon those who could and ought to have done that which was necessary in the circumstances, and brought forward the requisite information? Without that it was absolutely impossible for me to act. I reiterate that I shall administer the Act irrespective of clamour, irrespective of pressure from one side or the other, in the future as I have done in the past, and I shall do that even if it causes half-a-hundred of these telegrams to go to England, of which it may be said, as Tennyson says, that—

A lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.

Now, with regard to the question of the boilermakers. In a day or two I shall lay upon the table some papers which will save me the necessity of making any further reference to this matter, and show that the Government have acted quite rightly in what they have done. Although it is unfortunately a fact, if I recollect rightly, that these men did slip past the inspection of the officers appointed for the purpose, it is nevertheless a fact that they were imported at a time when it was impossible to get other persons to do the work; not under strike conditions, but under conditions in which it was reasonable that men with their special skill should be admitted. But there is another point in connexion with the matter. The Supreme Court of New South Wales has decided that to tax the imports of the State is to tax the King.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That is foolishness.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not propose to criticise the decision of the court, although I may be permitted to remark in passing, that I could understand it if there were seven kings instead of one. There is no doubt, however, that if the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of New South Wales—and it is the possible diversity of decisions in different States that constitutes so strong an argument in favour of the establishment of the High Court—is good, the point might be raised that we were stopping the King by stopping the boilermakers from coming into the Commonwealth. However, I shall leave this matter and pass on to that of the three Maories, regarding whom almost as much fuss has been raised as in reference to the boilermakers.

Mr. TUDOR.—Was exemption applied for in their case?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I am not quite sure, but I shall lay the papers on the table, and honorable members will then be able to see for themselves. The Maories were detained only pending reference by the man who saw them arrive, to his superior officer. It is not a fact that any instructions from the department over which I preside had to be awaited, but the moment the matter was explained to the Collector of Customs in Sydney, it was quite obvious that the men were not intended to be affected by any section in the Immigration Restriction Act, and therefore they were granted exemption for three months. I do not think that there is anything in the Immigration Restriction Act that is intended to apply to persons, whether they be coloured or not, who come here under short engagements as members of a theatrical troupe, and who do not intend to stay in the country. I do not regard as immigrants persons who come here under such conditions, and who remain here for perhaps three months, but the term applies to those who come here for the purpose of settling permanently, and making their living here. I do not intend to refer to the diversity of cases connected with the administration of the Department of Trade and Customs to which my right honorable friend devoted attention. I am of opinion that the administration of my right honorable colleague in the Customs department—whatever criticism is passed upon it—is open to this justification: That it at any rate forms an exception to some of the administrations that we have seen, because it is absolutely and sternly just to all alike, and that whatever my right honorable colleague does for the protection of the revenue against one class of people he does against all. It is not a fact that the Customs Act is intended to allow gross blunders and gross negligence to escape punishment. The first object of the Act is the protection of the revenue. There are two things against which protection is required—one is fraud, and the other is negligence. Negligence may exist in the employment of a dishonest clerk, or a smart one—I prefer to use the latter term. It may exist in the employment of an incompetent clerk, or in the employment of one who, though competent, is careless. It was not intended, I take it, that revenue prosecutions were not to be entered upon against any persons except those who were believed to be guilty of crime. Revenue prosecutions bear on their face the traditional usage that they are applicable alike to those who commit crimes, and those who are guilty of breaches of the law, although such breaches may not be criminal. As to the remarks which have been made with regard to respectable merchants and traders being dragged to the police courts and being compelled to sit “cheek-by-jowl with criminals,” and to “hob-nob with drunkards,” the experience of our courts is sufficient to show that there is no ground for the suggestion. The proceedings are conducted in two divisions. There is the summons court for those cases in which no criminality is imputed, and the charge court for those who are brought up for drunkenness and criminal offences. The suggestions that have been made are intended only as a little kerosene kindling to brighten the fire of discontent.

Mr. GLYNN.—What the right honorable gentleman has stated does not apply to all the States. In South Australia all offenders have to appear in the same courts.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Not at the same time.

Mr. GLYNN.—At the same sitting.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Not “cheek-by-jowl with criminals.”

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not say that.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is the charge. Those who are prosecuted by the the Customs authorities are brought up in accordance with the law, and although I know that hardship may sometimes be caused when persons devoid of criminal intent are punished for breaches of the law, it would be very difficult for the Minister to discriminate. It would be very difficult to administer the Act so as to secure that accuracy which is necessary for the protection of the revenue, without exposing the authorities to charges of unfair, if not dishonest, discrimination. I am not disposed to enter upon an inquiry into the matter of the shot in cartridges referred to by the right honorable member. I only wish to say, regarding the distinction he drew, that the Attorney-General determined that while shot was dutiable and cartridges were free, if cartridges contained shot that was dutiable, such shot did not become divested of its dutiable character by being passed into the cartridges. My right honorable friend suggested that on the same principle if there were a duty on whisky before it was drunk, it should also be subject to duty after a man had swallowed it. The answer is that a man's digestion will pass away whisky, but a cartridge has no digestion to enable it to pass away shot. That is where the difference lies. Now I desire to refer to the case of the man Tingey, whose youth was amongst the pathetic considerations urged, not on his behalf, but against the Government. Tingey is a quartermaster employed upon a mail steamer, and I need only remark that the shipping companies do not usually appoint boys as quartermasters. There is a constant practice which compels much vigilance on the part of the Customs officials. I refer to that habit which prevails—it may be innocently sometimes—amongst people who come off ships in the harbors of bringing parcels with them. It may be, in some instances, that a present is brought ashore with instructions to have it passed on, say, to New Zealand, as in the case under notice. Again, we have many cases of men who are charged with receiving uncustomed goods, and who say that they do not know the people from whom they received them. What happened in the case under notice was this: A strict watch having to be kept, a police constable saw the young man Tingey—we call him young in order to satisfy honorable members opposite—coming ashore with a suspicious-looking parcel under his arm. He was taken by the constable to the Customs officer on the wharf, and the parcel on being opened was found to contain some silk, braid, linen and other dutiable articles, of the value altogether of about £5. To the eternal condemnation of the Government, there was also a Bible. That, of course, ought to have consigned the Government to everlasting perdition. The Customs officer, finding that the goods were dutiable, acted as he would in any other case. He laid a charge against the “young” man, the charge was investigated, and the minimum penalty was inflicted, the goods being forfeited. On the morning of the day on which I spoke in Sydney, Senator Pulsford, through a letter in the newspapers, challenged me to make some reference to this case. I sent for the Collector of Customs,—there being no Minister connected with the Customs then in Sydney—and I read the papers. I saw that this young man was liable to prosecution for the offence of bringing ashore—not actually smuggling—dutiable articles without making any declaration, and that, of course, he had been rightly prosecuted within the law. I was of opinion, however, that it would have been better not to lock him up pending the hearing of the charge, as the officials did. I am sorry that they did so, but of course the Ministry have to bear whatever burden attaches to their action in that connexion. As they knew that the young man had come off a mail ship, it would have been better to have summoned instead of arresting him upon discovering that the package contained dutiable articles. Therefore, I said that the goods should be returned to him, and not forfeited, and that the penalty should be reduced by at least 80 per cent. At that time I had seen only a portion of the Customs papers relating to the case, but they were enough for the purpose. It is my principle in matters of this kind—as, indeed, it would be that of any Premier who values assistance from his colleagues—to refer them to the department to which they properly belong, and I therefore intended to communicate with the gentleman who was administering the Customs department upon my return to Melbourne. Unfortunately, owing to the delay of a day or two, the Treasurer, who, with sublime confidence in his leader, had not read my speech in Sydney, had, in the meantime, directed that the parcel should be returned—thereby revoking its forfeiture—but had declined to remit the fine. However, I had formed the opinion that it would be right to remit four-fifths of the fine, and as the Treasurer's instruction was given in opposition to what was on my part a virtual promise, I will see that the latter is given effect to, and I have no doubt that the Minister for Trade and Customs will cheerfully acquiesce in carrying out my direction. Of course, cases will sometimes occur in which officers exhibit a little over-zeal. These cases cannot be avoided. They occur in every port in the world, and under every Customs law in the world. Sometimes there are cases of remissness, and sometimes of over-zeal. This may have been a case of over-zeal, but inasmuch as the action of the officers who took part in it was a natural one, I do not think that any punishment should be awarded them. They erred in an honest endeavour to prevent the petty evasion of Customs which is rampant in every port in the world. So far as the case was before them, the young man was treated only in the ordinary way. They had before them facts which led them to believe that the Customs were being deliberately deceived, and consequently I can make an allowance for their action in having the young man locked up over-night. I admit that it would have been fairer to have summoned him instead of arresting him, but I cannot find it in me to pass any harsh criticism upon the officers for the part which they played. Therefore I take the whole of the responsibility for their action although I was not present. These are the whole of the facts connected with the arrest of this young man Tingey. Those who desire to attack the Government upon petty matters are so eager in the hunt that while they have been spending months, perhaps years, in attempting to show that my right honorable friend the Minister for Trade and Customs is making a dead set at the well-to-do importers, the moment they can make a charge against the Government they assert that the directions of the Minister had brought a poor young quartermaster to grief. In the case referred to the offender was a poor man, but they are so hot in their desire to pull my colleague down for what he does to men of much more substance and means, that they forget he draws no distinction between rich and poor, and that when a poor man brings himself under suspicion it is equally incumbent upon him to clear the matter up. I think I can leave that case at the point to which I have brought it. Now, I wish to utter a word of hearty commendation of my right honorable friend for having, after giving his close consideration to the naval agreement, come to the conclusion that it deserves to be passed by this House. Time is running on, and I have no desire to detain the House till a late hour. It is not my purpose to make a speech in defence of that agreement to-night. It was arrived at after long and careful consideration as the best that could be made under the circumstances, having regard to our position financially and otherwise. It is of a temporary character only, and may be terminated at the expiration of ten years, when the financial conditions of the Commonwealth will be vastly different from what they are to-day, and when certain provisions in our Constitution will have ceased to exist. The whole field will then be open for the adoption of any policy which the Commonwealth finds itself strong enough to undertake. In the meantime, if no other consideration prevails, I am convinced that under the present constitutional limitations, our financial resources will not allow us to obtain any such adequate defence as is proposed. When I reflect that there are few, if any, in this House who would wish to sever our connexion with the Empire, while it continues and while our financial and other conditions remain as they are, I think that this agreement embodies a reasonable adjustment of the relations between us and the old country in the matter. I am not one of those who believe that we should pay exactly the same proportion to naval and military defence as do our countrymen at the other end of the world. There are conditions surrounding us in our development, and conditions consequent upon the numerous functions of government that we undertake, which place us in a totally different position from that of countries where much is carried out by private enterprise. These things render us unable to contribute as much as do our countrymen at the other end of the world. But I would point out that the cost to the Commonwealth of the existing naval agreement is only about 6d. per head. If the proposed agreement be carried, our contribution will be a little less than double that sum. In other words, there will be an addition of less than 6d. per head. The £106,000 which we already contribute represents a little over 6d. per head, and the proposed addition of £94,000 represents a little under 6d. per head, so that the total cost will be about 1s. per head. When we compare that with the burden which rests upon our countrymen in the United Kingdom and other parts of the Empire, it will be recognised that whatever objections can be urged against the agreement, from the point of view of principle—and upon that I hope we shall have a good debate—the objection as to cost will not hold water.

Mr. CROUCH.—Has not Canada the same financial difficulties, and has she not refused to join in the agreement?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Canada has many similar financial difficulties. I am not here to criticise the policy of Canada, although it may be said for that possession that it is more contiguous to the scene of operations in past warfare, while we are nearer the scene of operations which may be expected in future warfare. There is, therefore, not much to choose between the positions of the two countries. I could, however, wish for myself that Canada would recognise some responsibility in the matter of naval defence, and it is my honest belief that she will do so. I have very little to say to-night on the question of preferential trade, mainly because the interruptions to which I have been good-humouredly subject have spun out my speech to some length. I do not agree with the leader of the Opposition that, because it is not possible to deal with the question this session, our disagreement for the time being is somewhat academical. But I do believe that the time has come, or is rapidly coming, when the Empire will have to consider whether its cohesion will not be promoted by trade arrangements which, as between the goods of our countrymen of the Empire and the goods of foreigners, will give the preference to the goods of our own kith and kin. I am not affected by vague threats of retaliation, or by that dread of retaliation which some public men express. The leader of the Opposition objects to the intrusion of the passions into this question. I have no desire to see that intrusion, but I say that the Empire was never made by too much concession to the views and opinions of those who already do their best against us, and it will never be held together by too much fright. It was not by any cowardice that Britons won the Empire, of which we have helped to win our share. It will not be by cowardice or fear of the opinions of others that the Empire will be held together. It is not only, though largely, the interests of the component parts, but the interests of the Empire as a whole, which we are bound to consider in the future unless we mean to leave the Empire. If we do not mean to leave the Empire, the general and common interest must not be ignored. That need not prevent us looking after our own interests. It may be a moot question for this part of the Empire or another whether preference should be given by reducing the Tariff in favour of Great Britain, or by increasing it as against the foreigner, while leaving the duties as they stand to operate in reference to the mother country. This is a matter affected not only by considerations of policy, but is also affected by considerations of revenue. So far as I can see, considering the position of the States as they stand under federation, it would be more possible for us, while doing our duty to our own country, to give a preference by raising the duties against the foreigner, while not raising them against our own kith and kin, than by the converse process. But it must always be recollected that these questions are entirely relative. If a country has an average 10 per cent. set of duties, and it is considered that the financial needs of that country are no more than met, she can increase her duties by 5 per cent. That would be called an increase of 50 per cent., but nevertheless the duty is only one of 15 per cent. In the same way another country may have 30 per cent. duties and reduce them to 20 per cent., showing a decrease of 33 per cent. It will be seen that all these matters are wholly and solely relative. We may turn a 15 per cent. duty into a 20 per cent. duty, or vice versa, and so long as the proportion is the same it does not matter whether we call the basis on which we operate free-trade or protection. It is better to keep the words "free-trade" and "protection" out of connexion with this matter, for the reason that the cohesion of the Empire is a question far away and beyond that of any fiscal theory. I do not think there is any free-trader in the country, or at any rate in this House, who would rather sacrifice the Empire than sacrifice free-trade, or run any danger of sacrificing the Empire. I do not think that at a pinch there is a protectionist who would not say that the safety and cohesion of the Empire are above all considerations of fiscal policy. But we have to work in accordance with existing conditions. Our first duty is to our own people—to raise the requisite revenue, and if possible to see that our people obtain reasonable opportunities of employment. When we have done that we can take into consideration the question of preferential trade. If the day arrives soon—I shall be very glad to see it, because I think that common action on the part of the various divisions of the Empire in this direction might possibly be come to without too severe a battle between fiscal theories—and if the necessities of the Empire require it, we shall be gratified and delighted to see that consummation. If it is not possible to do this by agreement, those who are for Imperial cohesion will sooner or later have to do it in spite of disagreement. The strongest Minister that England has, perhaps, seen in recent years is of opinion that it is a higher consideration for people to have money to pay for what they want than to see goods cheapening day by day and find them further from their reach when they are cheapest. That is an utterance coming from a free-trade source. I do not profess to give the words with extreme accuracy, but that is at any rate their meaning; and when an opinion of that kind is expressed from a free-trade source, it is premature to judge the statesman who makes it as having joined the ranks of the protectionists. I do not profess to say that the Minister has joined the protectionists, but at any rate the utterance gives reason for hope that in considering this Imperial problem some common ground of platform may be come to whereon, even at the expense of some of the academical opinions we have expressed in speeches, we may do that which would help us to remain "one and indivisible."

Mr. FISHER.—That Imperial Minister's chief said the very opposite at the conference.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not think that the Minister's chief did say the very opposite. If the two utterances are carefully considered, it will be found, I think, that they are not in disagreement. If two Ministers like Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain were in entire and irreconcilable disagreement on a question of this kind, it would not be in accordance with British practice for them to remain in the same Cabinet. Finally, I would ask honorable members in regard to the Naval Agreement to which I have alluded, to be kind enough not to make up their minds until they have heard the whole of the facts. The leader of the Opposition was not at first entirely inclined to adopt the agreement, and it is only on closer consideration and with a fuller acquaintance with the facts which surround it, that he has come to the opinion, that under our conditions, it is the best agreement we can adopt. I ask honorable members to wait until the agreement is explained, and all the facts and circumstances are before them. If they will do so, I have every confidence that the agreement will be adopted. I have to thank honorable members for the kindly patience which has allowed me to reach the end of my speech, after the subsidence of the little storm of interruption which went on for some time. I cannot but feel that although the pungency and iteration with which the leader of the Opposition adverted to some topics called on me to make some answer, there has not to-night been any serious attack made on the position of the Government. I cannot think that the attack, such as it is, comes from a gentleman who sees that he has ground on which to displace the Government.

Mr. REID.—I do not want to do so at present.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Then I cannot congratulate the right honorable member on his consistency, because I do not think that until the present moment there was ever a time when he did not want to put out the Government to which he was in opposition. The right honorable member has stated in many speeches which I have not quoted that the Opposition would do their best to oust the Government; but, if he has lost that desire, then we may hope he is in the happy position of a convert. That position would be only consistent on the right honorable member's part, because it would in his speech to-night be "Yes" for the Government staying in, while in his speeches outside it is "No."

Mr. REID.—I will try to put the Government out at the general election, which is the proper time.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There is an old saying, which, although it may be brought from the nursery for the occasion, is none the less a truth—"Strong words off weak stomachs."

Mr. REID.—I have a pretty strong stomach.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I allow that to be so, in regard to some of the things which the right honorable member swallows, mainly opinions. I have been labouring under some disadvantage, because I feel that, notwithstanding the many interruptions—which have caused me to take a longer time than I intended—I have no real and serious attack to which to reply. And so long as the causes of discontent with the Government can be summed up in such a speech as we have had from the leader of the Opposition, I may conclude that the Government retains the confidence of the House.

Debate (on motion by Sir EDWARD BRADDON) adjourned.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House at its rising adjourn until tomorrow at half-past two o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT.

STANDING ORDERS.

Motion (by Sir EDMUND BARTON) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I wish to suggest to the Government that if we could manage in some way or other, without occupying too much time, to pass our permanent standing orders, it would be of great advantage to do so. I have seen the proposed standing orders, and they do not appear to contain a large number of debatable subjects. I do not suggest that their consideration should take the place of pressing business, but if I can co-operate with the Government in passing them through with a minimum consumption of time I shall be willing to do so, because I think it would be a proper thing to pass them. We might devote a Friday or two to their consideration.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—In reply. I shall, of course, give consideration to a suggestion made by the right honorable gentleman in so friendly a manner; but, having compared the provisional standing orders with those passed by the Standing Orders Committee, I must say that the points of difference do not seem so many or so great as to justify us at the present stage in occupying time by their discussion, and a conversation which I had on the subject with Mr. Speaker this morning left me with no other impression.

Mr. REID.—Were the standing orders by which we are now governed passed by the House?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 27 May, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Senator DOBSON presented a petition from the Hobart Public House Trust Association, praying the Senate to legislate so as to eliminate private profit from the liquor traffic.

Petition received and read.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers:—

Resolutions agreed to at a Conference of Premiers at Sydney.

Papers relating to admission of certain boiler-makers into Western Australia.

Papers relating to admission of certain Maories into New South Wales.

Papers relating to arrival of six hatters under contract.

Ordered to be printed.

Return under the Immigration Restriction Act.

Regulations under the Public Service Act.

The PRESIDENT laid upon the table the following papers:—

Receipts and expenditure for year ended 30th June, 1902, with report of Auditor-General.

Receipts and expenditure for period ended 30th June, 1901, with report of Auditor-General.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—In view of the papers which the Postmaster-General has laid upon the table in relation to matters arising under the Immigration Restriction Act, is it the intention of the Government to lay upon the table such papers as exist in connexion with the refusal to permit the Sultan of Johore to land in Western Australia? They seem to be of as much consequence as the others.

Senator DRAKE.—I know of no such papers.

Senator WALKER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce this session a Bill to amend the Immigration Restriction Act of 1901?

2. If so, is it also the intention of the Government to provide that Maoris, civilized natives of the sister colony of New Zealand, shall not be prevented from landing in Australia merely on the score of colour?

3. And in like manner, and for the same reason, is it the intention of the Government to provide that civilized aborigines of Norfolk Island, Fiji, and New Guinea shall be exempted from the restrictive provisions of the existing Act?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. No.

2 and 3 answered by No. 1. No Maori has been prevented from landing.

DAYS OF MEETING.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the days of meeting of this Senate during the present session be Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of each week, at the hour of half-past two o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday and Thursday, and at the hour of half-past ten o'clock in the forenoon of Friday, unless otherwise ordered.

It is a copy of the resolution which was passed at the commencement of last session after discussion.

Senator DAWSON.—Is it intended to sit on Friday so as to allow private members' business to be taken?

Senator DRAKE.—Whenever it is convenient to the Senate.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—This, I think, is a fitting time to raise the question of the conduct of business. It is likely to be a short session, and judging from the indications we have had of the intentions of the Government, we are to be asked to mark time while their measures are being dealt with in the other House. During that time the Senate is to sit on only three days in the week while the other House is to meet on four days in the week, and towards the close of the session I suppose we shall be asked to sit on four days, and to rush through the legislation of the other House at express speed. The only Bills to come before the Senate immediately are the Patents Bill, and the Senate Elections Bill, one being a measure of some importance and the other simply a machinery Bill. If this course is adopted we shall witness the same result in the Senate as has been so often witnessed in the Legislative Councils of the States. The Senate, which in this respect, I suppose, corresponds to the Upper House in a State, will be asked at the very last minute to assent to the legislation which has been passed by the other House. We ought to insist that some of that legislation should be initiated in the Senate, and that it should sit as often as the other House. It will not be fair in the last few weeks of the session to ask the Senate to merely assent to legislation which has been framed by the other House. It seems that if we accept the motion we shall practically have nothing more to do than to give our assent to the proposals put before the Senate by the Government. I should like to know whether the Senate is prepared to do that—to take a back seat, and sit formally on three days a week to deal with legislation of minor importance, whilst all the measures of first importance are introduced and dealt with by the other House, and the Senate in the last month of the session asked merely to give a cursory glance at that legislation, and assent to it. We heard a great deal last session about the Senate being the guardian of State rights. Every measure to be introduced during the coming session will hinge upon the question of State rights. Yet the House which is supposed to be the guardian of State rights is to take a very secondary position in dealing with that legislation. We might have some assurance from the representative of the Government in the Senate as to what is their intention, and as to whether we are to have any of those Bills introduced here at anything like an early stage of the session, so that we may deal with them properly and not in a hurried manner. I think that we might very well meet on four days a week, and that some of the new Bills might be introduced here, so that we could, concurrently with the other House, be dealing with important legislation, instead of having to wait, as we did last session so repeatedly, to enable the other House to send us something to go on with. There is another question which involves the rights of the Senate as a house of legislature. In the ordinary course of events it is impossible for a private member to bring forward any question, because the time is occupied by Government business. On Friday it is proposed that a certain portion of the time shall be set aside for private member's business. It may be argued that a private member will occupy time in introducing debates of a literary debating society character; but we never know when a private member may introduce business of supreme importance to the people of Australia. By allowing this proposed order of business to be adopted, we are depriving ourselves as private members of the opportunity of bringing forward questions of importance. I think that we ought to insist upon the Senate sitting on the same number of days as the other House sits, and we ought also to insist on being given exactly the same opportunities as are given to the House of Representatives of dealing fully with all the legislation that the Government submits to Parliament.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I submit as a point of order, that a general discussion at the present stage is not only outside our standing orders, but is opposed to the entire practice of Parliament, inasmuch as we are discussing business that ought not to be debated until the Address in Reply to the speech from the Throne has been dealt with. In the House of Commons the rule is that no discussion on any topic of general business arises until after the Address in Reply has been adopted, and I believe the same course of procedure is adopted in all Colonial Parliaments. I submit that under our standing orders—to go no further—only formal business can be taken prior to dealing with the Address in Reply. I do not object to the discussion as to the number of days we should sit, but am merely submitting the point that it is only proper and in accordance with parliamentary custom that we should not discuss it until the Address in Reply has been adopted.

THE PRESIDENT.—Standing Order No. 34 says—

No business beyond what is of a formal character shall be entered upon before the Address in Reply to the Governor's opening speech has been adopted.

Looking at the motion, it seemed to me to be a formal one, and I did not stop the honorable senator who spoke because his remarks were certainly relevant to the question. But I think it would be well to, as far as possible, carry out the standing order which I have quoted.

Senator BEST.—I wish to ask whether Standing Order No. 34 is in force in this Chamber at all? If I remember rightly, that was one of the eliminated standing orders.

The PRESIDENT.—I learn that that is so.

Senator DRAKE.—I certainly should not have proposed this motion if I had thought that it was going to lead to a discussion. I thought that it was the general desire of the Senate that we should adopt the practice which we followed at the commencement of the last session. The President did not put the question as to whether these motions were formal or not—I presume because it was concluded all round that they would be taken as formal.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator knows that the practice was unsatisfactory last session.

Senator DRAKE.—If the Senate desires to have a debate on the question I shall ask to be allowed to withdraw the motion, so that we may proceed with the discussion of the Address in Reply. But I put it to the Senate that it is desirable that this motion should be carried now, because it will enable the Senate to have a knowledge with regard to our course of business, and will give honorable senators the advantage of knowing beforehand the days when their attendance here will be required.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Whilst I very greatly agree with what my honorable friend Senator Pearce has said—and none of us can be forgetful of the inconvenience that was caused at various times during the long last session, because of the arrangement of business while we were waiting upon the other Chamber—yet I would ask him not to move an amendment now, because the motion permits of any alteration being made at any time to suit the convenience of the business of the Senate. I do not understand that Senator Pearce has any intention to move an amendment.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I desire to point out that three days a week for the Senate ought to give us equal debating time with four days a week for the House of Representatives. Therefore I hope that the motion will be allowed to pass as it stands. At the same time it would be a convenience to the Senate if we had an assurance from Ministers that we shall not be kept idle and that we shall have Bills of importance to go on with.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DRAKE)—

That on Wednesday and Thursday, during the present session, Government business take precedence of all other business on the notice-paper, except questions and formal motions, and that private business take precedence of Government business on Friday up to the dinner hour.

That the right be reserved to His Majesty's Ministers of placing Government business in the rotation in which it is to be taken.

DEPUTY PRESIDENT.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DRAKE)—

That it be a sessional order that whenever the Senate shall be informed by the Clerk at the table of the absence of the President, the Chairman of Committees shall take the chair of the Senate as Deputy-President during such absence.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH : ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—I beg to bring up the report of the committee appointed to prepare the Address in Reply to His Excellency the Governor-General's speech. Google

The Address in Reply was then read by the Clerk, as follows:—

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL—
May it please Your Excellency,—

We, the Senate of the Commonwealth of Australia, in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the speech with which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I beg to move—

That the Address in Reply be adopted.

I always feel that the mover of the Address in Reply is at a great disadvantage, because he is generally supposed to be rather friendly to the Government, and has not the latitude that those who are in a divergent position happen to enjoy. There is a certain sense of tameness in getting up simply to express agreement, when, perhaps, you would like to "contradict a wee." I ask the hearty sympathy of all my friends on account of the situation. The Government has been very much criticised during the recess—no Government more so. With a new Constitution, new machinery, and unknown results, this was inevitable.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—And deserved.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Oh, it is the duty of people to criticise. I do not say whether the criticism is deserved or not, but every one does his duty in keeping a very acute eye upon institutions that are new, and about the working of which no one knows very much. I claim standing here as one not agreeing with all that the Government has done by any means—

Senator GLASSEY.—But with most of it.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Yes. I claim that they have managed during the recess magnificently, and that they have strengthened their position in the eyes of the people of Australia as compared with their position at the time when the recess was entered upon. Although there have been harshnesses—great harshnesses, in my opinion—in administration, that administration, taking it altogether, in spite of six hatters or twelve hatters, or any other number that honorable senators like to mention, has been excellent. I say again that it has been harsh at times.

Senator DAWSON.—But just.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I will not say that. Sometimes it has seemed to me to be harsh and unjust, but it was conducted on strong lines and with certainty, as though the Government had resolved that the only possible way was to be severe, even though they hurt their own friends in the course of their administration. The one subject that has always been discussed during the recess has been the severe administration of the Customs. There were one or two cases to my knowledge that were just about as hard as they could possibly be, in which persons who were perfectly innocent were brought up and punished. At the time it seemed to me to be very cruel and unjust, and I have not altogether altered my opinion on that subject. But at the same time there was a big area to go over. There were big questions to be considered, and above all there was the duty of treating friends and foes alike, and of maintaining the observance of the law. That, I believe, has been the honest attempt of the Government. I am perfectly sure that we should not have given the Government the power they have had if we had known that they were going to exercise it as they have done. But although we should not have given them the power, it does not follow that they have not exercised it well, and that we did not do better than we knew. That is practically my opinion about the whole matter. I think the law has been administered admirably, and in a way that has commended itself to the people of Australia and made the Government infinitely stronger.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Does the honorable and learned senator believe that? I do not.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—When we speak about the opinion of the people, we must remember, of course, that the people always like some other fellow to be punished. The Minister says—"I have put down fraud, and done this and that," and we know that to be the case. At the same time, although there may have been an occasional injustice here and there—

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Occasional?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Yes.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Frequent.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Although there may have been an occasional injustice here and there, I think the people of Australia generally say that there has been a stern, inflexible resolve to carry out the law, and that it has not been so badly carried out, having regard to the whole. In instances, however, injustices may have occurred.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They fixed up all that they caught.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Yes. This question of administration is the principal one. I do not propose to deal with little incidents like that of the six hatters, and of the Maories, who, it seems, were not kept out of Australia, although I suppose my honorable friends from New South Wales vehemently declare, or at least suspect that they were prohibited in some way or other.

Senator PEARCE.—Then there is the case of the Sultan of Johore, who was not kept out.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I do not even propose to refer to the case of the Sultan of Johore, who, I think, was not subjected to much inconvenience. He spoke to me about the matter, and he did not complain. His grievances were published in the newspaper, but in conversation with me he made no complaint, although we discussed some very private matters. The great subject of discussion during the recess has been this question of Customs administration. We have had many opportunities of seeing what was done, and how it worked. We have also had to recognise that we have a responsibility for the legislation we passed, and after thinking the matter over very carefully my conclusion is that the work has been very well done, and that the action of the Government in the administration of Customs affairs has been very excellent. I do not propose to make any further reference to that matter. We know, of course, of the visit paid to England by the Prime Minister; and we know of the work that was done there, resulting in the naval agreement which has been the subject of very great discussion throughout Australia. That the Prime Minister maintained the dignity of Australia when in Great Britain we all know. We know, too, that he appealed not only to the intellect, but to the hearts of the people there. I firmly believe that his work was excellent, and that the naval agreement is a most commendable arrangement.

Senator DAWSON.—Not for Australia.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I am simply expressing my own opinion, and I repeat that the naval agreement is a most excellent arrangement for Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Not a naval man in Australia agrees with the honorable and learned senator.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—We need to consider the views of naval men out of Australia as well as here, in order to arrive at an even balance of opinion. At present we have a number of ships that are quite played out—there is no doubt about that—and we pay £106,000 a year for them. The new proposal is that we shall pay £200,000 a year for many more ships of a much better class—ships which are not merely new, but which are to be kept up to date. Incidentally it is proposed that these vessels shall be training grounds for our Australian men. They are to be manned practically by Australians, and the difference in the expenditure is the difference between £106,000 and £200,000. Under the new agreement the Commonwealth will have a first-class cruiser which will probably be of about 12,000 tons, with a speed of 21 knots; two second-class cruisers, of about 5,800 tons each, with a speed of 21 knots; four third-class cruisers, of about 2,200 tons each, with a speed of 20 knots; and four sloops, of about 1,070 tons each, possessing a speed of 13 knots. These ships are to be of modern type, and are to be kept so. That is a very important point. The armament of the ships to be provided will be immensely superior to that of the ships at present on this station, and the guns are to be of a much heavier and more modern type than those of the existing squadron. The agreement does not mean that this is all which the Imperial Government is to do. It sets forth what they undertake to do, but they will have to provide more assistance if that assistance is required. In addition to the provisions I have mentioned, three ships are to be kept as drill-ships, and used for training a Royal Naval Reserve. One of the second-class cruisers is to be manned exclusively, if possible, by Australians and New Zealanders; and the Royal Naval Reserve, which I have mentioned, is to consist of 25 officers and 700 men. The agreement speaks for itself. Under it employment will be given to a number of Australians in the following ways:—

(a) As crew of the second-class cruiser. This will absorb about 470 to 500 men in permanent employment.

(b) As permanent crews of the three other vessels, used as drill ships, which will require about 350 men altogether (these men will be paid at special rates).

(c) In the Royal Naval Reserve 725 men, as mentioned above.

What possible complaint can there be in regard to the agreement? That is a question which has puzzled me for a long time. It seems to me that it is a most admirable arrangement—entirely the species of agreement that we require. Of course the fleet will have to be under the Admiralty. There must be one head; there cannot be many. But the fleet proposed is one that will meet the growing requirements and importance of Australia, and the agreement which has been made is a most liberal one on the part of the Imperial Government, and one which we all ought to affirm. I was somewhat puzzled at first by a statement published in to-day's issue of the Argus, that it is proposed to keep some of the old ships on the station. That at first sight appears to be inconsistent with the agreement. As a matter of fact, however, it is not, because these vessels are to be retained to do duty as drill ships, and they are quite suitable for that purpose.

Senator PEACE.—The complaint is that the vessels of the fleet can be taken away at any time.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—That is inevitable, and would have been inevitable under any circumstances. As long as we are under the Imperial Government, the Imperial power must be exercisable when it is necessary. But, whilst the Imperial authorities will be in a position to take these vessels away at any time, we know that we impose upon them the duty of sending other ships to us at any time. We expect them to do far more than is provided for in the agreement. They undertake to defend us, and we say to them—"We are prepared to give you this assistance." On the other hand, they say—"We require the use of these ships if necessary; but we undertake to send you ever so many more if the necessity arises, so that your defence will be assured." The two things must be co-relative, and to my mind the agreement is an exceedingly fair one. I notice that a paragraph in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech promises a Bill to provide for the amicable settlement of industrial disputes. I admit frankly that that is not a class of legislation which has ever recommended itself very strongly to me. There is a man in Victoria at present holding the office of Premier of the State who has managed to settle an industrial dispute in a most amicable way. Every one praises him, and every one asserts that there would not have been any dispute at all had he been in charge of the department concerned. He never gave in. If we could manage to manufacture a few men of that class and discrimination, we might be able to dispense with boasts of conciliation, and allow people to make their own bargains. However, we have not yet seen the Bill referred to.

Senator GLASSEY.—The honorable and learned senator prefers a Donnybrook state of affairs to a condition of peace.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I like peace. But what I understand by this term of "amicable settlement" is that it is proposed to make a man do what he does not want to do. That is not quite my view of the term. An amicable settlement is a settlement obtained in a court of law by forced process.

Senator DAWSON.—What is a court of arbitration?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Just the same.

Senator DAWSON.—Then why object?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—If there were better administration, I do not think there would be any necessity for us to bother about these laws for the settlement of industrial disputes. I do not think that they will work well; but I do not condemn the proposed Bill, because I have not yet seen its provisions. I await the measure with anticipation.

Senator CHARLESTON.—It will be similar to the one which the honorable and learned senator passed in South Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable and learned senator opposed it.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I opposed it to the best of my ability; let there be no mistake about that. Many subjects are dealt with in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech, first among them being the establishment of the High Court, while next in importance I put the proposal to create an Inter-State Commission. Both are essential necessities of the Constitution, and essential necessities of the Constitution to a greater extent in the case of the Senate than in the case of the House of Representatives. So far as the High Court is concerned, these are things which we have had many opportunities of seeing that the Senate required. I thought the Government were to be reproached for not having dealt with this subject at an earlier stage, and that it was not a fair thing to leave the Constitution in a defective condition, which those who passed it intended should not exist. But, on consideration, I think that, although the Government did not know they were doing well, they really did well in postponing it, because there was undoubtedly a strong feeling that immense expenditure was going on, that this and that body were being established, and that really there was no necessity for the High Court at all.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—There is that feeling still.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—That was a strong feeling; and the result of the delay has been to enable the public to know and to declare universally that the High Court is an absolute necessity, and that the Constitution cannot be carried on without it. There is no doubt that throughout Australia the feeling originally was not very favorable to the High Court—people always hate Judges and lawyers—but that feeling is gone, and people now recognise the absolute necessity of establishing this tribunal, without which the Constitution cannot work nor exist. So I forgive the Government for not having introduced the Bill before. I think the delay has turned out well, because I am sure there is now a strong public feeling in its favour.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They did introduce it.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Only nominally, as the honorable and learned senator knows. I think that public feeling in favour of the measure will become infinitely stronger as time goes on and the necessity for it has been proved. I do not propose to go into the question of the acquisition of New Guinea, or to take up more time. In my opinion, the Ministry behaved admirably in recess; they have retained the confidence of the people, and the legislation they propose, or some of it, at all events, is excellent. I mean to wait until I see certain of the measures which are mentioned in this speech before expressing an opinion upon them, and, meanwhile, I very cordially move the adoption of the Address in Reply.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON (Tasmania).—I have the honour to second the motion for the adoption of the proposed Address in Reply. I am glad to find that the Ministry intend to place the High Court Bill before us as their first measure, for until the High Court of Judicature is established the structure of the Commonwealth will be incomplete. Although at one time I considered the expense in connexion therewith unnecessary, and that delay might very well take place, I am now convinced of the need for the High Court, in order that the objects for which the Commonwealth was founded may be fulfilled. Reference is made in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech to the selection of the area for the seat of government. I consider that is a matter which should be decided, in order that the good faith of the Commonwealth may be maintained towards New South Wales; but I am strongly opposed to starting building operations until the Commonwealth is in a financial position to warrant the expenditure. The third matter I shall touch upon in seconding the Address in Reply is the proposed measure for the establishment of Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration. In view of the suffering inflicted upon women and children by reasons of strikes—

Senator PEARCE.—And lock-outs.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—And the dislocation of business fatal to the poorer classes, and in view also of the necessity for preventing if possible the bad after-effects of strikes, I shall welcome the establishment of Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration. I now come to the agreement entered into with the Admiralty. I have not had an opportunity of reading that document, but it is really with the principle of the agreement that I purpose to deal. We must view this matter dispassionately, and endeavour to keep before us the facts which have to be considered. First of all, we find that the old colonial policy of making payment for naval protection is being continued. Secondly, we find that, in consequence, we are not proposing to establish or encourage a local seafaring spirit. Thirdly, the Commonwealth has now external duties and responsibilities, and we learn from the speech with which we have been honoured that the Commonwealth is about to increase those responsibilities by the acquisition of British New Guinea. It has been urged that in this agreement we are making an excellent bargain. But I ask, can a bargain be a good one that strikes at the foundation of national life, and by that I mean the responsibilities of undertaking our own defence? It seems to me that we are trifling with our position if we fail to realize that trouble may happen in connexion with some of our external territory. Is the Commonwealth of Australia, may I ask, in such a case to seek for Imperial assistance when we have assumed the responsibilities of government? We stand upon the threshold of a great future, but that future depends upon ourselves. It depends upon our maintaining the characteristics of the British race, and the greatest of those characteristics has ever been self-reliance. I consider that now is the moment for laying down a broad national policy of defence, so that not only the naval, but the military defence of the Commonwealth may be steadily and efficiently built up. I have purposely avoided discussing what may arise in case of war, but this I shall say, that Australians will be proud to serve either on sea or land whenever the Empire is threatened. I give my adherence to the Ministry for the purpose of ratifying this agreement which has been entered into by the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth with the Admiralty on the distinct understanding that the Commonwealth is never to be pledged again without the assent of Parliament having been first accorded.

Senator GLASSEY.—Parliament has to approve this time.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—Quite so. But our faith has been pledged by the action of the Prime Minister.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, no.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—Honorable senators may say so. I quite understand that the position is that the ratification of the agreement is subject to the approval of Parliament, but hopes have been built upon the consent which has been given.

Senator PEARCE.—The Prime Minister was given to understand that.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—The right honorable gentleman may have been given to understand that, but I hope that no Australian community will be found willing to repudiate the action of our first Minister.

Senator FRASER.—If it is a wise one.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—I have little more to add. I shall wait and reserve my opinion and action upon the various Bills which are to be brought before us. I may say now, that I most thoroughly and cordially approve of the action of the Ministry in their endeavours to administer without partiality, favour, or affection, the laws which we have passed, although I have personally disagreed with some of them. I must congratulate them also upon the endeavour which they are making to try to improve the service between the State of Tasmania and the mainland. I hope they will not procrastinate in this matter, because it is one of vital importance to the community of Tasmania as well as to the people of the mainland. With these few words I beg to second the motion.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This Senate yesterday paid its tribute to the memory and public services of our lamented friend, Senator Sir Frederick Sargood. I think it will not be out of place if I now express my regret—a regret which will, I am sure, be shared by all the members of Senate—that Mr. Ewing, lately a senator for Western Australia, is not with us during this session. We knew him as an incisive and vigorous debater, and if his attendance in the Senate was such that we did not know him as continuously and as frequently as we should have liked, it was owing to circumstances, and not to any lack of interest on his part in the high duties which he had undertaken to perform as a senator—circumstances which probably honorable senators will feel have led to his retirement. I feel personal regret, because Mr. Ewing sat on this side of the House, and always took a very deep interest in all that went on in this Chamber. I congratulate my two honorable friends upon their addresses. Remembering that in Senator Downer we have an old parliamentary hand, we could scarcely have expected less from him than the effort he made in proposing the adoption of the address in reply. However difficult the task may be, he showed us how it is possible to seem to agree when one would very much rather contradict. It has often happened that we are called to curse and we remain to bless, or we are called to bless, and something happening, we remain to curse. In the Bible there was a gentleman who had some experience in that respect, but I am quite certain that no one could have performed that difficult operation with more dexterity and more infinite good humour than Senator Downer did on this occasion. I also desire to thank him for relieving me from the necessity of making any remarks upon the Customs administration, because when he applied the terms "cruel" and "unjust" to it, although he thought the Government had done magnificently after all. I for one have no more to say. I think he sounded a very excellent note, when he said that in all probability we would not have given these powers if we had known that they were so to be used. I am quite sure that honorable senators will agree that I need offer no further remark in regard to the Customs administration. Senator Cameron has not had the parliamentary experience which we all recognise in Senator Downer, but I think that every one of us will admit that in seconding the motion he gave evidence of powers and abilities that take the place of experience, and that he infused into his observations on the points to which he called attention, a warmth and earnestness of feeling which bespeak his sincerity. Every citizen is entitled to express his views on public questions, whether they take the form of a speech from the Throne or not, so long as he does so calmly and with whatever intelligence he is able to bring to bear upon the question, and it is more incumbent on us here, even if it is distasteful or unpleasant to others, notwithstanding divergence in regard to the views of other people. This speech exhibits a characteristic which certainly is new in my experience. The prolixity of Governors' speeches has been a theme of remark for very many years. It has been a prolixity that many persons have considered to be growing. Hitherto it has been due to what I may call the natural glorification of things that have been done and to a natural diffuseness of statement as to things proposed to be done. But the speech now before the Senate devotes at least three of its longest paragraphs to matters that are not proposed to be done. That is a new experience to me, and probably in a sentence or two I may refer to these paragraphs. I suppose they are really in the nature of safety valves or blow-holes—perfectly innocent things; but they are of some value in this respect, that they refer to matters which might have been the subject of statements of policy, or at any rate indications of what might have been.

A number of other important measures are in preparation. Among these is a Bill to provide a uniform navigation and shipping law. This measure, however, is unnecessarily long and complicated.

There is another matter mentioned to which I shall refer in a minute, but this goes on—

My Advisers will gladly take advantage of any opportunity which may offer of bringing these subjects before you, but they are not sanguine of being able to do so in the course of this session.

Would it not have been just as well to have told us that they had no intention of introducing this uniform Navigation and Shipping Bill, or the other measure relating to the taking over of the State debts.

Senator DAWSON.—Surely it is permissible to state a reason why.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not object to the reason why if they will tell us what it is all about.

Senator DAWSON.—Because there is no chance of passing the Bills. One of them contains 700 clauses.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We may then well congratulate ourselves upon being spared that infliction. I should have liked to have some indication of what the policy in regard to this uniform navigation and shipping law is likely to be. My impression is that, during the conference in England, some resolution was arrived at by the Premiers, and with the concurrence, I suppose, of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that there should be some policy offered to protect the coastal trade—in fact, for the matter of that, the whole shipping trade of the Empire—from unfair foreign competition; that it was desired that foreign States should be baulked in their attempts to make inroads upon the shipping industries of the British Empire in cases at any rate where they were heavily subsidized. That was the proposal, but at this end of the world we have always understood—at least, I understood—that the policy of the Ministry, if we are to take their expressions from time to time, was not only to cover foreign shipping, but to bring the P. and O. and the Orient Steamship Companies and other British-owned lines, as we are talking of shipping, into the same boat.

Senator HIGGS.—Why not?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend need not ask me why not. Let him ask the Prime Minister, who assented to an Inter-Imperial policy extending only to foreign shipping. What I wish to know is whether this most favoured treatment is to be extended to the companies I named or similar British companies which are trading along the coast of Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—As we are not going to consider the subject this session, what is the use of discussing it?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend forgets that we have these two beautiful paragraphs in the speech, and the public wish to know for their guidance what is this uniform Navigation and Shipping Bill which we may have brought before us, although naturally enough Ministers are not sanguine that it can be dealt with.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—They have to find out what that is, too.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not know whether that is an authoritative statement.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But I should say it is true that they do not know what they are going to do, and although these Bills are in preparation, the whole thing is really moonshine, and it would have been very much better if it had been eliminated from the speech. So also, in regard to the taking over of the State debts, I do not know what the policy is. Perhaps they are still thinking that out, as Senator Downer says.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER. — Do not attribute knowledge to me.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not saying this in the way of complaint. I thought the honorable and learned senator was in the inner secrets of this matter.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Not altogether.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable and learned friend is over the threshold, anyway. As to the question of taking over the State debts, I think that requires a great deal of calm and quiet consideration. I hope I am not introducing any feeling into the discussion. I wish to address myself to the question without any partisanship, but at the same time I wish to make known my views on this and several other subjects. I take this opportunity of saying how thoroughly I agree with some remarks made by the Attorney-General with reference to a proposal emanating from a recent conference of the State Premiers. No one can contemplate the thing for an instant without seeing how ridiculous a wide and unconditional proposal to take over the State debts would be. The public debts of the States amount to £215,000,000, and if the Commonwealth, without some such precautions as those to which the Attorney-General alluded, were to agree to take over those State debts, what a magnificent thing—magnificently bad thing I should say—it would be for the States. They would start further borrowing to run up another debt of £215,000,000 with a clean sheet, and if these expressions indicate, as I think they do, their views on the subject, the Commonwealth Government are doing a right and patriotic thing in letting it be clearly understood that, before any proposal of the kind is even considered, it must be accompanied by some sort of understanding or condition with regard to future borrowing—with regard to what the States are to do when their emancipation from debt takes place.

Senator GLASSEY.—Surely they would never take over the debts without taking over corresponding assets?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not know what they would not do, and I do not know what the States would like them to do; but if that is to be regarded as one of the causes of offence between the Commonwealth and the States, then I am all for the Commonwealth, and I am all for the Ministry that takes an attitude which is one, not only for the protection of the credit of the Commonwealth, but also for the protection of the States against themselves. The next paragraph, in regard to the transcontinental railway, is a very long one. I am glad that it appears in the speech. In the first place, it indicates a less vigorous pronouncement on that subject than the speech with which the first session of this Parliament was opened, and, in the second place, it contains this statement—

They are, however, of opinion that the isolation of Western Australia retards the development of the federal spirit.

I say nothing on that point, but I do say that at the present moment, at any rate, a proposal for the construction of that railway will put a very severe strain on the federal spirit of the State from which I come. That is all. I do not mean to enlarge upon these things, but the matter occupies a very long paragraph in the Governor-General's speech. I do not complain of it at all, because it will be a salve to one of the Ministers, who is no doubt deeply interested in this question.

Senator DAWSON.—The leader of the Opposition wants to build a railway at once, without consulting the engineers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Perhaps he knows all about it, and that it will be a success. That is more than I know. But I am not responsible for his determination of a great engineering question. Then I take exception to the next sentence, simply to show that at any rate it does not express my view—

It is admittedly desirable to remove so serious a bar to the complete political and commercial union of the Commonwealth.

There are united in that sentence two things which are considerably different. The political union is one thing. The commercial union is another. I do not profess to be an expert in this matter, and do not profess to have full information as to the commercial aspect of it. But so far as I have been able to ascertain, I can see nothing which will render this railway a means of improving much less making complete the commercial union between Western Australia and the eastern States. It may have a political aspect; and I confess that I should like to see all the States within this union linked by railways. That is an expression of what may perhaps be called "a pious hope." But there are other considerations to be taken into account, and I think it right at this moment, without expressing a final opinion one way or the other, to say this at any rate: that so far as I am able to gauge public opinion, it is not favorably viewed in the State of South Australia. The next paragraph to which I should like to call attention is that in which it is said—

The Imperial Conference held during the past year in London may be expected to be far-reaching in its results.

I have seen nothing to justify that. I rather agree with the views of the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfred Laurier, who at the conference exhibited a great deal of caution and of unwillingness to be drawn by various resolutions into what he described, with great force and eloquence, as the "vortex of militarism." But it is a good thing, it seems to me, that there should be these conferences. With regard to the naval agreement, which forms the subject for another paragraph, I shall offer one or two remarks later on. In the meantime, I may say that I agree with the view which my honorable friend, Senator Cameron, has expressed upon this subject, although I do not quite see, with him, that the logical conclusion of his views was to support the confirmation of the agreement. This particular paragraph proceeds—

Other matters of great importance to the Commonwealth were discussed, and the conclusions of the conference will be laid before you. The urgency, however, of questions of domestic importance prevents Ministers from asking you to give immediate consideration to the question of preferential trade—and to other subjects dealt with in the resolutions.

Then comes what appears to me to be really the most extraordinary paragraph of all—at least the most unusual. It is that in which we, a self-governing Commonwealth, are devoting a paragraph in the Vice-regal Speech from the Throne to a commendation of what I cannot regard otherwise than as an electioneering speech by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The paragraph is this—

My Advisers observe with gratification recent utterances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies advocating the encouragement of trade relations between various parts of the Empire.

In the first place we have not got those utterances about which we are to express this gratification. We have only got a telegraphic summary of them. I take it that that fact first of all ought to discount our going into this reference to the speech of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In the next place the paragraph is to be discounted by the fact—the notorious fact—that the Unionist Government in England is at present suffering a kind of eclipse. We know quite well that ever since the Venezuelan trouble, and the negotiations which became known in connexion with the Baghdad railway, which was—if I may use the expression—to be "boused" by German capitalists, the growing fear has been manifested in various ways that every vote given to the existing Unionist Government in England is a vote given to the German Emperor; in point of fact, that the key to the foreign policy of England has been handed over to the safe keeping of Berlin. The result has been, of course, that there has been a great deal of feeling on the subject.

Senator BEST.—Mr. Chamberlain's pronouncements are not in that direction by any means.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In which direction?

Senator BEST.—In favour of Berlin.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable and learned friend is quite right. Finding that state of things existing, to keep up the falling fortunes of his Government, which were influenced by this state of feeling in regard to Germany, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who is, as we all know, the most accomplished electioneerer possibly in the world, starts a new idea, and makes it the occasion, as the telegraphic summary of his speech will show, for a defiance, so to speak, of Germany and of everything German.

Senator BEST.—And that has been his policy for several years past.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not saying that it has not been.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable and learned senator stated that he started it recently.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I heard Mr. Chamberlain speak on the subject in 1897 or 1898.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Mr. Chamberlain can read the signs of the times better than anybody; and Mr. Chamberlain, seeing the signs of the political times in that respect, throws out a suggestion which is another strong beat upon the big drum of imperialism, in order to divert public opinion from those other subjects upon which feeling in England is hostile to the Ministry of the day. I do not say that he is to be blamed for that. I merely say that, in view of these things, we should not jump too hastily at this expression of a new policy laid down by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. We have an excellent illustration of the situation in England when we find a procession of 100,000 non-conformists, whose proceedings are reported in the next column of the Times, or of our own papers, marching to Hyde Park to protest against the education policy of the Government of which Mr. Chamberlain is a member, and when we find the force of that nonconformist opinion in England exhibited in the withdrawal of at least one of the objectionable features of the new Education Bill. But I merely mention these things in the hope that honorable senators will see that, at any rate, there is no particular reason why we should jump at this suggested policy and accept it as likely to be carried out, or to be of benefit to us. My belief is that that policy will never be accepted in England.

Senator DOBSON.—I believe that it will be.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It will be time enough for us to consider how far it is going to affect the people of Australia, and how far it is going to give a basis upon which we can erect some structure of preferential or reciprocal trade, before we talk about adopting it at all.

Senator DOBSON.—How can you have a federated Empire without a system of reciprocal trade?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am as much in favour of reciprocal or preferential trade, or of anything that will add to the profits and prosperity of Australia, as any man. But I am not going to be led away by what is manifestly an electioneering speech.

Senator DOBSON.—No; I do not think it is such.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Well, I am merely expressing my own solitary opinion. I, for one, at any rate, am not going to swallow anything with my eyes shut, or to accept any proposal of that kind until I know definitely and practically what it really means. I am not going to accept it until Mr. Chamberlain—who made the speech referred to, not as Secretary of State for the Colonies, but as member for one of the Birmingham districts—tells us distinctly what he proposes.

Senator DOBSON.—It is an old idea of Mr. Chamberlain's.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is none the better for that.

Senator DOBSON.—But the honorable and learned senator is arguing that he has just started it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — He started these remarks just as—if I may use the phrase—he “slipped into” Russia on another occasion by saying that “he must have a long spoon who sups with the devil.” I do not want to go into that matter at greater length, but I would point out that it was done at a time when the motive was quite obvious. It was equally to his credit as a politician that he started this idea; but all I say is that I deprecate our taking it to our bosom until we know something really about what this child is. Then I come to a rather apologetic paragraph in the speech explaining how it was that more legislative work was not done during the last session of Parliament. My complaint is really not that there was not enough done, but that there was rather too much legislation enacted. We all know, and some of us said so when we had the speech from the Governor-General at the opening of the last session, that there was rather too much of a banquet spread before us—a banquet in fact whose viands it would be perfectly impossible for us to consume. I demur to the statement that legislation was prevented from passing, and that proposals of the most urgent character could not be brought forward, in consequence of the exhaustive discussion on the Tariff. There was a feverish desire, it seems to me, to legislate on subjects which were not very urgent, but which were most agreeable to a section—an influential section—of the supporters of the Government. More urgent measures were set aside until those to which I have generally referred were passed. And with what result? With this result in, certainly, some instances, that there was deep discontent—and in that respect, with great humility, I differ from my honorable and learned friend, Senator Downer—in more than one State. It gave us difficulties of administration which provoked expressions of resentment against the union which made such legislative acts possible. I think I am stating facts, so far as regards the feeling in more than one State. I shall offer three illustrations. In the first case we had postal legislation. I am not going back on the question we debated last session as to the possibility of our postal legislation being postponed and of our proceeding under the Acts in force in each State; but I would point out that the postal legislation passed by us has for its outcome the question of the employment of coloured labour on mail steamers. It has for its outcome, within the shores of Tasmania, the trouble in regard to the local postal arrangements, owing to local legislation which legalizes an institution there that is affected by our Postal Act. Then we have the kanaka legislation which, at any rate, whatever the rights and wrongs of it, has left us an evil, or a difficulty which has to be rectified. We have also the Immigration Restriction Act under which that amusing incident of the six jolly hatters was possible. As to the first of these matters, and in fact in regard to all of them, the difficulties that were pointed out by various honorable senators are coming home to roost. In connexion with the postal contract we are now faced with a practical difficulty with our co-contractor, England.

Senator MILLEN.—Which Senator O'Connor was careful to point out.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am bound to say, as my honorable friend reminds me, that the Government in the first instance were averse to the provision in regard to the exclusion of coloured labour. I am not going to stigmatise it in any way, but I hope it will be repealed. I shall be on the side of repealing it at the earliest possible moment. I want no misunderstanding on that score. I am merely pointing out the difficulties into which we have been driven by the legislation which has been described as very urgent. I deny the urgency of it, and I say it was due not to the policy of the Government themselves, but to the power of an influential section of their supporters.

Senator DAWSON.—How did the honorable and learned senator vote on the proposal to exclude coloured aliens?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I shall tell the honorable senator all about that later on. I am not dealing with that matter now. I am dealing with the difficulties created by this extraordinary and absurd—I was going to say disloyal, but I hardly like to use the term; I will say “imprudent”—provision introduced into the Postal Act. I simply wish to point out what the position is, and I desire incidentally to say that so far as regards mere seamanship, there is to my mind no justification for the attitude taken up, and which I will not say is embroiling us, but is creating entanglement with England in relation to our mail contracts. I have not seen the papers on the subject, but I gather from the press that negotiations are going on in regard to the establishment of a Commonwealth service between Australia and Colombo. I hope that the Ministry, in whose good sense I have great faith when they are not overborne by influences which they are not able to resist, will refuse to exhibit themselves for public ridicule by entering into any such arrangement. So far as seamanship is concerned, we know that a century ago there were no men in the world who made more capable seamen than the seafaring population on the west coast of India.

Senator DAWSON.—Absolutely no. They are unreliable.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend does not read history. I would ask him to read the history of India about the time of Clive. He should read of the trouble experienced by Britain in bringing to an end the sea power and depredations of those men on the west coast of India. They defeated the Dutch, who I will not say were our equals—my national pride refuses to allow me to make that statement—though their ships on one occasion went up the Thames, with a broom at the masthead of the admiral's vessel. I am afraid that sometimes my honorable friends forget the lessons which history should teach them in regard to this and many other matters. So far as this matter is concerned, I think it is a legitimate subject for debate, but not in connexion with the stipulation that the mail steamers are to be boycotted in relation to the carrying of the British and Australian mails, simply because they happen to employ seamen who are not as white as we are. I shall ask honorable senators to remember—and I trust the suggestion I make will bear fruit—that we must consider who are to replace these seamen on our mail ships, if they are successful in casting them out. How are they to be replaced? Is it English seamen who are manning the merchant service? No; it is the Dutch, the Swedes, Danes, and—

Senator STYLES.—Foreigners. The free-traders employ the cheapest labour.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend need not introduce that matter now. I am not going to address myself to that subject. If we cast these coloured men out they will be replaced by foreign sailors. I would rather employ on a British merchant ship a coloured sailor who was a British subject and competent than I would employ those who might become immediately the enemies of England.

Senator DAWSON.—Coloured labour is cheaper.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not dealing with the matter from that point of view, but if the honorable senator bases his argument on that ground, then away goes all the large and eloquent talk about race troubles, and the desire to keep our race pure.

Senator DOBSON.—It has been proved that the lascar is not cheaper than other seamen.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I said just now that there was a difficulty in connexion with the kanaka—how does that difficulty arise, and what is our position? It is this: that Queensland, the State which we intended to benefit by imposing a customs duty of £6 per ton—£3 in their favour—objects to lose the £2 per ton rebate in respect of white-grown sugar. What is it that is proposed to be done? It is proposed that the people of the southern States—the people of the non-sugar growing States—shall put their hands in their pockets and make up the loss to Queensland growers who raise sugar by white labour.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And the growers of New South Wales as well.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes.

Senator STYLES.—That was understood from the first. I understood that was the arrangement.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It was not understood in that way in the State from which I come, and a very severe wrench will be given to the federal spirit in South Australia, if the people of that State are asked to put their hands in their pockets and pay a tax practically in order to make up that loss.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—They were the advocates of a white Australia, and they ought to help to pay for it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I shall be greatly surprised if South Australia agrees to pay the proposed contribution to Queensland. I rejoice that that question is going to be put to the test of the pocket. There is nothing like it. It is all very fine for the people of southern Australia to say —“We are going to expel the kanakas from Queensland,” and it is also all very well for my honorable friends of the protectionist party—who, of course, according to their views, are entitled to do so—to impose an import duty of £6 per ton on sugar. It is likewise very proper from the same point of view to allow a rebate of £2 per ton of the excise, but if the people of the southern States are asked to make up that £2 per ton rebate, as well as pay the customs duty, they will hesitate a long time before they do so.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator believes in the kanaka?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not dealing with that phase of the matter. I am dealing with a different question.

Some of the States have suffered quite enough by the heavy duty placed on sugar for protective purposes. Take the case of Tasmania. We know very well—at least I take it as a fact stated in this chamber by Senator Fraser—that the growers of Queensland were competing with imported sugar in Victoria and probably elsewhere before this provision was passed.

Senator FRASER.—In every State.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Whether that is so or not we have agreed, and we cannot back out of it at this moment; to a heavy customs duty of £6 per ton on sugar. The people of Australia have to pay that tax. The excise was to be paid by the grower with a rebate of £2 per ton to those who could grow it by means of white labour. But we find that they are kicking against that arrangement, and will not pay it in spite of all the other advantages they enjoy. They expect the people of the southern States to put their hands in their pockets and pay it for them. If they expect that to be done, it shows how credulous they must be. Just one word about the six unsuspecting hatters. I do not refer to the matter with a view of re-opening the question of administration so far as regards the attitude of the Prime Minister, but it is a curious thing that, according to the papers, these men, when they arrived in Victoria, were not prevented from landing. They landed here, and in a confiding moment—under the influence of the blandishments and hospitable attentions of their fellow unionists of this State—they handed over a copy of their agreement.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned senator know that to be a fact?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I find it in the papers.

Senator DAWSON.—It is not in the papers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot imagine that these men handed over an agreement in order that it should be sent to the Prime Minister for the purpose of keeping them out, when they had come 12,000 miles for the purpose of getting in and securing employment under better conditions than they had in the old country. But the document will be found in the papers, and it was sent, and sent by a union official, to the Prime Minister for the purpose of keeping out these men of our own blood, of our own race, against whose honesty there was no imputation, who were unionists, and true unionists bearing credentials from the old country. It was sent in order that after they had been dined, or whatever it was, in Victoria, they should be shut out in New South Wales.

Senator PEARCE.—In order that they should come in as free men.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friends will see why I am making these remarks in a minute. I said that I was not going to re-open the question of the Prime Minister's administration, or of the course he took. I thought myself at the time that it was a perfect farce; but I recognise the painful, difficult, and, if honorable senators like, the politically perilous position in which the right honorable gentleman was placed. I do not wish to accuse the Prime Minister of not being animated by a desire to do his duty to the best of his judgment and ability in the painful position from which, I think, he was only extricated by the outburst of Australian opinion at the time.

Senator MCGREGOR.—By compliance with the Act.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What I desire to point out is that I hope that the head of the Executive will never again be placed in a position to exercise that sort of judicial discretion.

Senator PEARCE.—Would the honorable and learned senator allow six lawyers to come in?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I shall show honorable senators in one minute, what it all means. We know what the effect of it was. We know from the papers that Mr. Copeland, the Agent-General for New South Wales, wrote out to say that this incident had not only made us ridiculous in the eyes of every English-speaking community, but that it had affected the credit of New South Wales.

Senator DRAKE.—That is on the report that reached them. Who sent it?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I know also that it was stated in the press at the time that Sir John See had said that if he had only the control of the police he would soon see that those men were liberated. My sympathies were entirely with Sir John See.

Senator MCGREGOR.—He had control of the police.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not dealing now with the principle. I think it is an absurd one. But the provision that the Minister is to determine whether a workman is to be exempted on account of special skill simply imposes upon the Minister a duty which ought not to be placed upon him. I may tell honorable senators, and Senator Playford will bear me out in this, that if we object to workmen being brought into the State under agreements such as these, under agreements and conditions that are not fair, we have in South Australia another remedy by which anything of the sort can be prevented. You will get no man, surely, who is not a fool, to leave his employment in England and come 12,000 miles to Australia to enter into another engagement, unless you give him a promise of better wages and a promise of an engagement for a definite time? The man would be a madman to do such a thing. On the other hand, how can you expect any employer of labour in Australia to bring out a man unless he binds him by agreement to remain for some definite time in his employment? The two things are reciprocal.

Senator PEARCE.—Let him bind him here.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator think the men will come here?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes; look at all the people who have come out already.

Senator PEARCE.—Did the honorable and learned senator come out under contract?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—This simply shows that my honorable friends are running a good principle to death, and let me tell them in all sincerity that by legislation of this kind they are doing their own cause more injury than they can possibly do it good.

Senator CHARLESTON.—The Prime Minister's interpretation of the provision is of such a broad character that it will not affect the landing of men here at all.

Senator PEARCE.—Then let us repeal it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I hope it will be repealed. I am making these observations with a view, if possible, to secure that it shall be repealed. I wish, however, to offer this consolation to any honorable senator who may think there is no remedy, and that a man may be tricked into an unfair and fraudulent agreement in England: There is a means in our State at this moment of preventing anything of that kind. We have a most salutary law to which, I think, no one can take exception. Under our masters and servants legislation we have a provision by which no agreement can be set up in any proceeding against a man for not complying with it, if the person against whom it is produced disputes its execution on the grounds of forgery or fraud. If he can show that misrepresentations have been made to him there is an end to the agreement.

Senator DAWSON.—That may be very difficult to prove, and it does not apply to indented labour anyhow.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is a further provision, and it is this: If a man comes out to South Australia, under an agreement of a most fair and honest character and without any misrepresentation, to work for three years, and if at the end of a year he thinks better of it and desires to escape from the agreement, he has only to go before a magistrate, and the thing can be done under an order of the magistrate upon his repaying simply the actual cost of bringing him out.

Senator PEARCE.—He can always get a magistrate who will do that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not expect Senator Pearce to make an observation of that kind. But if there is to be legislation of this sort, then surely it ought not to be the head of the Executive who should determine questions of this kind, but it should be some court of summary jurisdiction, where the thing can be dealt with, and justice can be done. However, on these and on many other grounds it is a blot upon our statute-book.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Could the honorable and learned senator have administered it in any way other than that in which it was administered by the Prime Minister?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think Senator McGregor could have been listening to me. I said distinctly that I was not re-opening the question of the particular administration. I thought it was a perfect farce, especially when I remember that we have been passing high duties in order to encourage manufactures, native industry, and all that sort of thing, and then in the next breath we seek to exclude skilled artisans who are required to make our industries a success.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did the honorable and learned senator object to it when the Bill was going through the Senate?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Object to it ! Of course, I always objected to it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did the honorable and learned senator object to that specific section ?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What is the use of asking whether I was here ? The honorable senator may hunt through Hansard to find out whether I was here, whether I debated the section or moved an amendment. I do not care whether I did or did not, whether I was here or was not here.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If the honorable and learned senator assures us that he did not debate it we shall accept his assurance.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am much obliged to Senator O'Keefe, but I tell him that if I had supported it 50 times over I consider that the section should be blotted out of the statute-book. It is a most astonishing thing that when we find that Canada is opening her arms to 5,000 British immigrants—

Senator DE LARGIE.—Canada has the same law.

Senator DAWSON.—Farmers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Farmers ! The section deals with manual labourers. Canada is opening her arms to thousands of farmers, while we in Australia, the proud inheritors of the same blood, the same traditions, and the same history, shut out six hatters. Really, if it were not painful and pitiful it would be the most amusing comedy that has ever taken place in regard to national affairs.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Would the honorable and learned senator administer the law in any other way ?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I know how my honorable friend would administer it.

Senator PEARCE.—A British subject was deported from Canada this year for a breach of the same law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I refer to this matter only because I think Senator Downer referred generally to the subject of the misguided strike which took place here in Victoria. I saw in connexion with that very sad episode in history, when constitutional government was challenged, that it was stated by one of the leaders of the movement that they relied upon the Commonwealth Government putting in force this particular provision in order to prevent the importation of engine-drivers and stokers to take the places of those who had struck work. I say that is an instance of the abominable misleading tendencies of legislation of that character.

Senator PEARCE.—We know now why the honorable and learned senator desires to have it repealed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I welcome the effort that is to be made to remove another source of uncertainty and irritation, and to fulfil a duty which rests upon us under the Constitution. I refer to the selection of the seat of government. A good deal of confusion has been occasioned in connexion with this matter, and especially in relation to the coast involved, to which my honorable friend, Senator Cameron, has alluded. There has also been some misunderstanding as to what took place in America. I wish to set that right now in the hope of removing, if not all, at least some of the objections which certain of my friends entertain on the subject. In America the determination of the question of the locality of the seat of government excited very great controversy and a great deal of feeling, not only between States, but between sections of States. The question there was whether the seat of government should be in the North or in the South, whether it should be in New York or Pennsylvania, Virginia, or Maryland. There was local prejudice to contend against ; there was local pride, if you like, and of course there was local self-interest also to be dealt with. All these influences combining, as honorable members know who have made themselves familiar with that period of American history, inflamed public feeling to white heat. Happily that does not exist here. It is a fortunate circumstance in my humble judgment that, in the wisdom of the Convention, they prevented the possibility of ferment of that kind. They settled that the seat of government should be within the borders of New South Wales.

Senator STYLES.—Not the Convention, but six gentlemen who had no authority from any one.

Senator PEARCE.—It was indorsed by the people of Australia.

Senator STYLES.—Because they could not help themselves.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am very much obliged to Senator Styles for the correction. It was done at a subsequent conference, but, as Senator Pearce says, it was not done by six irresponsible gentlemen.

It was done by six gentlemen subject to the approval of the people of Australia ; and the people of Australia by the best of all methods—the referendum—put their seal upon it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They had to say “yes” or “no.”

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have heard all that before, and if it had been vital, of course they would have rejected the Bill. The people of South Australia said—“Well, as to that, we may differ, but we agree to it rather than imperil federation,” just as they did in connexion with certain appeals. I never doubted for a moment that, in relation to this or anything else, people would say—“Well, that is not going to prevent us from agreeing to the union.”

Senator PLAYFORD.—They did not indorse it any the more.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They indorsed this statement as a condition of the Federation.

Senator STYLES.—It was Hobson's choice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is in the Constitution. We have to carry it out, and we are happily removed from all possibility of conflict on that score. Yet in the United States, in spite of that condition of things which led to so much feeling, the site was picked, and the corner-stone of the capital was laid on the 18th September, 1793—within four years of the inauguration of the union. We have passed through two and a half years without one of their initial difficulties, and any questions as to the precise locality of the site should be settled. Let us get rid of them. It does not concern any of us in any of the other States, because I feel that even my honorable friends from Victoria do not set up for a moment that the capital can be in Melbourne. Whatever views we may take, there it is in the Constitution. There may be friction within New South Wales. Let it be confined within its borders. Do not allow it to spread to other States. In America it was not until seven years after the corner stone was laid that the Federal Executive was housed in Washington. That is a lesson to us all, and the answer to any criticisms on the question of expense is, let us hasten slowly so far as the building is concerned. Let us not only hasten slowly, but let us proceed modestly. We do not want a marble palace ; we do not want the building to rise in the night ; we do not want it to rise as did the palace in Pandemonium, like a kind of exhalation. We want the site fixed, and in my humble judgment we want to set about making whatever arrangements are necessary for our accommodation there humbly, not extravagantly, as early as we can. That is my view on the subject. But, in spite of the matters that I have referred to as possibly creating some of the friction or discontent which has appeared, I do not believe that the real spirit of federation is waning in the slightest degree. I have no sympathy with all that irresponsible talk, sometimes influenced and brought about by persons really occupying more or less responsible positions, and who ought to feel a sense of their responsibility. The Commonwealth is really in its swaddling clothes ; it is hardly clothed yet. In spite of some of the matters which my honorable friends have indicated, it is really too early to talk of failure or of disappointment. It is a source of encouragement to us when we remember that the difficulties and discontents in America, intense as they were, were largely due to the fact that the Constitution was wholly the work of the politician, it was never remitted to the people. Here the Constitution is the work of the people, and in my belief it can never come to nought, except by the action of the people themselves. If these causes of irritation do exist, I think that many of them will disappear with the establishment of the High Court. The High Court is the pivot of the Constitution. We may hold what views we please as to its composition, as to its procedure, and as to any detail. The Constitution is really a round table intended to be supported on three legs, and it has only got two of them at present. Senator Downer referred to the fact that it was part of the essential conditions of the Constitution. I am not going into the matter in any detail, but I wish to correct one or two misapprehensions that have been floating about on this subject. The three supports of the Constitution are the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Section 1 says—

The legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament.

Section 61 says—

The executive power of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen and is exercisable by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative.

Section 71 says—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia.

The Constitution establishes that third power in the High Court, and although it is perfectly competent for Parliament to render that provision nugatory by abstaining from making the necessary provision for its procedure and its personnel, but to do so would be a failure to carry out a trust which was committed to its hands. It would be a failure to carry out a duty which was laid upon the Parliament by the Constitution. Section 71 is imperative.

Senator FRASER.—But we passed a short measure authorizing the State Judges to do all that is necessary.

Senator BEST.—But that Act expires at the end of the year.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That would not be carrying into effect the power that was confided to us, the trust that was reposed in us by the people of the Commonwealth. I have only one or two other remarks to make on the higher aspect of this question, because I dare say we shall have a later and better opportunity of speaking, and of removing misapprehensions that may exist upon various aspects of the subject. But, in the United States, the Judiciary was wanted to define, as it is expressed by authoritative writers, and establish the scope and purport of the Constitution. It was to expand it if necessary in the cause of broadening freedom. No one can read the story of Chief Justice Marshall without feeling that the Constitution as expanded and as carried into effect nowadays is a very much larger and broader instrument of Government than that covered by the mere strict letter within the four corners of the original instrument, which is a mere skeleton. The function of the Supreme Court of the United States was not only to fill up that instrument, not only to expand it to rank the utmost breadth of a growing freedom, but to set limits beyond which its express or its implied powers should not go—to secure on the one hand adequate power to the national Government, and on the other hand to conserve State rights and the rights of the people. Differences and disputes which are the subject now of able and controversial correspondence between State Ministries will, I think, take refuge and rest finally within the walls of the High Court of Australia. There they will receive their final determination, and there they will end. It has been said that in Canada—and I think it right to point this out—there was no Supreme Court for a number of years. Why? The Constitution of Canada rests upon a totally different principle from that upon which ours rests. There is nothing in the Canadian Constitution corresponding to our Judicature. There was no occasion for it. Why? Because the Dominion Government—the Dominion Governor-General, which means the Dominion Executive—has the power to veto any State Act which it thinks conflicts with the Constitution. Do you think the people of Australia would have tolerated that? Of course not. The people of Australia preferred the system of the United States. If there is an encroachment let us have a tribunal to decide it. If there is a State right that is infringed, let us have it settled by a tribunal above and apart from all party and parliamentary government. If there is a right of the Commonwealth or a power of the Commonwealth that is challenged by a State, let us have it settled free from the breath of parties or the natural heat and vehemence of Parliament. That is what distinguishes ours from the Dominion Constitution. Here I would read two or three lines from a recent article in the October number of the Edinburgh Review, evidently an expression of opinion emanating from jurists who look at the matter from outside, and perhaps on that account more valuable than the opinion of those of us who assisted in framing the provision under which this question arises. The writer of the article calls the failure to appoint the High Court a hitch. Referring to the delay, I make no complaint with regard to it. I am not disinclined to agree with my honorable and learned friend Senator Downer, who said that the delay had led to a widespread increase of feeling that the High Court ought to be established at the earliest possible moment. This writer says—

A far more serious hitch is the failure to create the Federal Supreme Court. At any moment a constitutional dead-lock may occur, and there does not exist at present any means of unlocking it. The appointment of this Court is all the more necessary since the famous 74th clause has removed all Inter-State constitutional questions from the purview of the Privy Council. Many such questions have arisen between the Provinces of Canada, or between the Dominion Parliament and the Provinces, and have been decided by the Privy Council. But Australia claimed internal independence from Privy Council control. We all remember the struggle over the 74th clause, and most of us were perhaps content that Australia should be left to settle her own constitutional problem. The Federal Court, as laid down by the Act, closely resembles the High Court of the United States.

It is an exceedingly able paper. The author of it I do not know. I am not saying that it is to be accepted as gospel, or anything of the kind ; but it is the view of an able outside writer, who recognises what many in Australia do not recognise : that our Judicature stands upon a level with that monument of judicial power, beneficence, and integrity, the Supreme Court of the United States, and has no parallel with the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada. Of course, it is obvious that matters may have to be decided, and will continue to be decided, in the States Courts. Honorable senators who were in the Convention will recollect that the reason why the judicial committee introduced into section 71 the provision which empowers the Parliament to invest other courts with federal jurisdiction was in order to save the enormous expense which the establishment of a network of federal courts as in the United States might mean in Australia.

Senator WALKER.—Hear, hear.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend behind me (Senator Walker) knows that I myself put in those words to save expense. But the cardinal feature is that the Federal High Court of Australia occupies exactly the same position and relation to our Constitution as does the Supreme Court of the United States. We may paralyze it ; we may do as we please with it ; we may abstain from discharging our duty to the people who sent us here—but it must come, unless we repeal that provision of the Constitution.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—No one doubts that ; it is premature, that is all.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is never premature to do your duty and to discharge the trust which the people laid upon you under the Constitution. I am glad that the Ministry, who, I know, are men who thoroughly understand the Constitution under which they are working, have placed this in the forefront of the measures which they propose to submit to Parliament. In that connexion I may say that in reference to the solution which the court may offer of many difficulties which may arise between the States and Commonwealth Governments, I do not wish it to be supposed that I agree that many of the things which have been set up as such are State rights. I know that the expression has been used to dignify—perhaps almost to sanctify—mere disputes of administration, questions of difference between State Executive and Federal Executive. I entirely repudiate anything of that kind. We know what the term "State rights" means ; but a difference as to whether a whole building or a portion of a building should be taken over by the Commonwealth is not a matter of State rights.

Senator PEARCE.—Or the question of precedence at a banquet.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is that regarded as a State right ?

Senator PEARCE.—Oh, yes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then that is an excellent illustration of how the expression may be misused. For instance, in our State—I think I may say this now and here as I come from South Australia—we had a controversy on the question whether it was right that a communication from the State Government with regard to the position of a Dutch ship called the Vondel should pass through the Prime Minister, as the Minister for External Affairs, or should go direct from South Australia. I entirely concur with my friends of the Federal Government in the point that it would be ludicrous to allow that claim. In our State they made a fuss on the subject, which was not worthy of the occasion. The claim, if allowed, would be a bad precedent.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It was not worthy of the model State.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is one of the exceptions that prove the rule. The States may very well recognise their lessened importance, and that we owe—the people of Australia owe—not a second, but a first allegiance to the Commonwealth. On the question of defence, I want to say that I think that at the present moment the defences of Australia are very much in a state of chaos. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction on the subject, and therefore there can be no doubt whatever that one of the first measures which we ought to be called upon to deal with is that relating to defence. Our defence should be upon a uniform basis. It should be under one control. But with six different codes to work under—because under the State Acts at present there are six different codes—it is no wonder that there should be long minutes passing between the Federal Commandant and the Prime Minister and the Minister for Defence as to whether some suggestions which the Commandant made with regard to military arrangements during the Easter manœuvres had the authority of the Minister or not. I hope that all that sort of thing will pass away. In that connexion I wish to say that I think that we are entitled to look for a minimum of expenditure and a maximum of result. I strongly object to any extravagant expenditure in connexion with the permanent forces. We want no army for aggression. We simply want a force for the internal defence of Australia. We want to defend our own shores, and for that purpose we require a citizen army. We want the population to defend themselves. It is our duty to foster what we may call the auxiliary or volunteer forces—the citizen army. It is our duty to encourage them by every means in our power, and to assist them all we can. If there is to be any considerable expenditure, I, for one, would very much rather see it laid out upon volunteer forces—the citizen army—than upon the permanent forces, with all their paraphernalia and gold lace and parade. I am afraid that I cannot agree that the proposed naval agreement is the most excellent arrangement possible. I am speaking merely for myself; I do not know what my friends may think.

Senator GLASNEY.—The honorable and learned senator's leader in the other House has agreed to it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I wish I had an opportunity of convincing him of the rightness of my idea. At any rate it will take a great deal of argument to induce me to agree to that contract or bargain. In the first place, in my view, we, the free people of Australia, ought to pay no subsidy or tribute towards an expenditure or in a direction in which we have no voice. That is the first thing. Australia is simply a naval base for the British fleet. We must all recognise that. The squadron in Australian waters is, as has been pointed out by my honorable and learned friend, Senator Downer, simply a portion of the British navy. This is a naval base for that portion of the Pacific fleet. Why should we pay 300,000 sovereigns a year in order to preserve—if that were necessary—this naval base, which must be preserved as a naval base for the British fleet in any event?

Senator FRASER.—It is for our advantage, though.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We shall have an opportunity of dealing with it more fully later on, but I will ask honorable senators to consider the propositions which I am going to submit. Our share of the responsibilities of defending the Empire is best met, in my judgment, by our defending ourselves and our own shores. That is the view of the Prime Minister of Canada; it is a view in which I entirely concur. We do our share in defending ourselves. We have our internal defence; let us have our naval defence, whatever it may be. Let us defend our own shores and our own territory—a magnificent portion of the British Empire—and we shall be doing our duty to the Empire. It must be remembered, too, that we want no navy to patrol the high seas. People say—"Oh, we cannot afford an Australian navy." But of course we must first understand what is meant by an Australian navy. We do not want a navy in the sense of wanting a fleet for aggression, a navy to patrol the seas, or to go to the North Pacific, or to the Indian Ocean, or to the China seas; but we want a navy—if you are to use the term in that sense—to defend our own shores and our own ports.

Senator DOBSON.—What about our merchant vessels on the high seas?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We shall see about that matter in a moment. We require our coastal and our harbor defences, and we want a navy manned by Australians and under Australian control.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Then we shall require immigration. It cannot be done with the present population.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have been able to man our land forces, and man them so effectively as to be in a position to raise contingents which have done excellent service in the Empire's war in South Africa. We shall be prepared to pour out our blood and expend our treasure again if the occasion should arise and the cause be just; but it ought not to be by way of subsidy or tribute. We have even assisted with our seamen and with our ships. We all know that South Australia sent the gunboat Protector, efficiently manned and equipped, to China, and that she went up the rivers there.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — Six men and a boy.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If they were all such efficient and vigorous men as my honorable friend is, six men and a boy would be a sufficient crew. I do not think they would want six men and a boy, if they were all as aggressive as the honorable senator is. I dare say we should be able to do the same thing again. We know also that we had a coastal defence while the States were separate. We had a defence by forts and ships of our harbors. Why are we now to say that we cannot continue that system under the Commonwealth, and extend and improve it? Why is this subsidy necessary for us to secure the continuance of what I have called this naval base, which, as I have said, would have to exist in any case, when we have no control whatever over it? Some of my honorable friends talk about defence. But what are we told? This fleet is to be wholly under Imperial control. The Admiral will be absolutely independent of the Commonwealth—of all the Governments and Parliaments within Australia—and if he takes it into his head or receives orders he will be able, on the alarm being given, to clear away with his fleet to the China seas or the Indian Ocean and join some other portion of the British fleet. In that event what would become of the defence of our shores?

Senator PLAYFORD.—In doing so he might be protecting our shores. The honorable and learned senator should read Captain Mahan.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have done so, and I may say that I have read a greater writer than Captain Mahan, so far as Australia is concerned—Captain Cresswell.

Senator STYLES.—Of South Australia; and a good man, too.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; I agree with Captain Cresswell, unless he has altered his opinion, and I do not think he has. Some honorable senators say that if the squadron cleared out to reinforce the British fleet somewhere else it would be defending us all the same; it would be destroying the enemy's fleet.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Which would otherwise come here.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But is it only an enemy's fleet which would come to our shores? I do not believe it would ever come near us. It would be privateers and swift cruisers and torpedo boats that would come here, and it is exactly when our squadron, under the Imperial control, is ordered away from the coasts of Australia that these little chaps, so to speak—not little Japs—will be down upon us, and we shall be undefended.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Where will Captain Cresswell be?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He will be here, but he will have no ship to control.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—He will have the Protector.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Not at all; we have no vessel. We are to depend entirely upon this subsidized squadron. I am not discussing the matter now from the mere stand-point of pounds, shillings, and pence, but from the higher aspect in which it presents itself to me, and that is that we must remember we are a self-governing people. My honorable friend Senator Cameron has expressed that point very strongly indeed. "This bargain," he said, "strikes at the foundation of our national life." I agree with him. We are a self-governing people. We are deeply loyal to the Crown. We are bound to the Empire by indestructible ties of blood and kindred and history and tradition and language. Even if we may have no particular reason to fall down and worship the British Parliament, we are still bound by its foreign policy. Let us never forget that. We are bound by its foreign policy without any hand in its formation, and without voice or hand in its conduct.

Senator DOBSON. — Is not all this a step towards obtaining an Imperial Council?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — No. What would be the good of an Imperial Council? How would it satisfy the aspirations of Australia? We might have one or two representatives upon it. Even if they were made peers they would not represent the public feeling of Australia.

Senator KEATING. — They would be like the Judge on the Privy Council.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Who ought to be there, but is never present. We cannot escape from this position. We are bound by the foreign policy of the British Parliament, and they may plunge us into war to-morrow. Yet we cannot say no. It does appear to me that, in return for submitting ourselves to that position, the British Government might well refrain from asking us to pay this £200,000 for the consequence of it.

Senator DOBSON.—Our proper share is about £4,000,000.

Senator Sir JOS AH SYMON.—Then £200,000 is a paltry sum having regard to the £35,000,000 or thereabouts which the British navy costs the Imperial taxpayer. It can be of no appreciable benefit to England. I cannot believe that England has put it in any such buckstering way, for that is what it must be assumed to be if it is to be taken that the British Government really want the money. Why are we asked to pay? I really cannot understand it. We are to hire a squadron for £200,000 a year to defend our shores—if its admiral pleases.

Senator GLASSEY.—We might as well hire an army.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I would remind honorable senators that the Imperial land forces were withdrawn from Australia a good many years ago, and withdrawn, I think Senator Cameron will bear me out, with great advantage.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—Hear, hear.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why are we to be asked to pay a subsidy to the Imperial Navy any more than a tribute to the maintenance of the British Army? There are other ways of helping the British Empire in a strait. I would prefer that that help should come when the Australian people are in a position to know the exact facts of the case, and to say whether it is right and just that they should lend that help. That is what I desire. I want no handing over of tribute to be spent in a way in which I have no voice. If it is, as I have heard it said, that this £200,000 per annum is to be paid simply to foster industry or unity—it must be industry, if it is to have any effect—it must be a debatable matter, but if it is to foster unity, it is a very poor way of doing it.

Senator FRASER.—Unity is right enough without that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Exactly. It is a pity that the Marquis of Salisbury is not still at the head of the British Government, otherwise some of these recent propositions, and some of these speeches, about preferential trade would not be so readily made. I find that not so very long ago he gave utterance to the following statement, which I commend to the attention of my honorable friends, especially Senator Dobson—

There is talk of fiscal union; there is talk of military union. Both of them, to a certain extent, may be good things. Perhaps we may not be able to carry them as far as some of us think, but in any case they will not be the basis on which our Empire will rest. Our Empire will rest on the great growth of sympathy, common thought, and feeling between those who are, in the main, the children of a common race, who have a common history to look back upon, and a common future to look forward to.

That is the basis of our race, and the foundation of our allegiance. The last paragraph to which I desire to refer in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech is that in which the federal finances are spoken of as being in a very satisfactory condition. We are told that—

The return of good seasons, which is now so widely expected, will give new impetus to the development of our resources and the expansion of our industries.

I should have thought that at least one little word might have been said for our imports. "New impetus to the development of our resources." I think we might usefully have buried the fiscal hatchet, and have had added to the line "the expansion of our industries," the words, "and of our imports."

Senator STYLES.—Do not introduce free-trade.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not going to do so. What does our revenue, which is in such a satisfactory condition, depend upon if not upon the expansion of our imports? But I do not want, as my honorable friend says, to introduce anything controversial, even though it be such a fascinating subject as that of free-trade and protection. Of course I admit that there has been, and I suppose there will be to the end of the chapter, disagreements between us on many points of policy which some of us may think are for the best interests of the country, whilst others may think them inimical to those best interests. Mismanagement is incidental to all human and public affairs, no matter what Ministry is in power, no matter what the personnel of the Parliament which may be in session; and in spite of all the indifferences, the irritations, or controversies that may take place—in spite of all this—the future lying before Australia, its States and its people, is as full of promise as ever it was. None, I think, can set bounds to Australia's power and prosperity if we, the people of Australia, are only true to ourselves. There is no impediment to success unless we ourselves raise it.

Senator FRASER.—The drought stops us a bit now and again.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There may be intervals, as my honorable friend says, there may be fluctuations which are natural to any country, but there can be no impediment to the final success of this union unless we ourselves raise it up. There can be no danger, unless we ourselves create it. What then is our duty? It is, in my humble opinion, so far as in us lies to do our best to make the Commonwealth fulfil the spirit of the Constitution; to make it fulfil the highest aspirations of the people of Australia, and, above all, to give our union the first and chiefest place in the patriotism and in the love of all the people.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I do not intend to say very much with regard to the opening speech. With part of what it contains I am pleased to say that I agree; with a good deal I disagree. In regard to the High Court, which is first on the list, I think we can well afford to go slowly. We are not supposed to rush headlong like a torrent down a stream immediately we have federated. That was not at all the idea when we federated. The idea was that we were to go slowly and cautiously, and that we were not to create irritation anywhere if we could possibly avoid it. But what have we been doing? We have been creating irritation almost everywhere.

Senator DAWSON.—Not with the High Court.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Some important people have to be provided for.

Senator FRASER.—I am not going to blame people for trying to secure high positions. That is, of course, a failing of human nature, and what is human is more or less excusable.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Everything human is divine.

Senator FRASER.—Some things human are not very divine. Notwithstanding the very nice peroration of my honorable and learned friend, Senator Symon, assuring us that everything is going on swimmingly, I say that at present everything is not going swimmingly. Everything will come right if we are prudent, careful, and, above all things, economical. But that will not be the case if we are going to rush into the establishment of a High Court, at a cost of £15,000, £20,000, or £30,000 a year, when there is absolutely no necessity for it.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It will cost us £50,000 a year.

Senator FRASER.—I shall limit the cost to £30,000 a year, or even less; but if we are going to rush into an expenditure of that kind, when we are in the very tight financial position in which we stand at present, I say there can be no justification for that sort of political conduct. The courts already constituted by the Federal Parliament are capable of doing the business required to be done. They have, indeed, only been called upon to do very little so far, but the little they have been called upon to do they have done very well.

Senator DAWSON.—No, no.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Some people find fault.

Senator FRASER.—I say they have done very well, and no real fault can be found. Some people would find fault with what an angel from heaven would do, with anything and everything. But I contend, in a general way, that the decisions of the courts in respect of federal matters have given general satisfaction.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator is not an importer.

Senator FRASER.—I am an importer.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Then the honorable senator has never been caught.

Senator FRASER.—I shall not say very much about that, because I can hardly trust myself upon that subject, and I have no desire to disturb the atmosphere. I say that we cannot afford the vast expenditure involved in this proposal just now, and there is no absolute necessity for rushing into it. We should wait until after the next elections, and until the new Parliament is in full swing, and then, if nature is more favorable to us in giving us good seasons, as I hope will be the case, times will be better, and we shall be in a position to be a little more extravagant. So much for the High Court. Now, as to the seat of government. I agree that we have accepted the position willingly and cheerfully that New South Wales must ultimately be the State in which the federal capital shall be established; but it does not follow that we should decide the matter in the first Parliament of the Federation.

Senator WALKER.—Nor for the first 100 years, I expect.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Would the honorable senator wait for 100 years?

Senator FRASER.—No. But I say that I should be willing to wait for two or three Parliaments. We can keep faith with New South Wales, and with other people who desire that the terms of the Commonwealth Constitution shall be enforced, without deciding this matter in the first Parliament. Let the site be decided, if honorable senators like; but what I am afraid of is that if we decide upon the site in this session there will be a hue and cry got up for the erection of buildings, and that, in my opinion, would involve an unnecessary expenditure which may well be avoided. The people of this country already owe £215,000,000 or £216,000,000, more or less, and they cannot carry any more burdens. We have to pay an enormous amount of money to the money lenders in London, and we are heaping up debts upon debts. The only safeguard in the matter of this indebtedness is to let the States remain impecunious.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Then spend their money on buildings.

Senator FRASER.—The only safeguard against further expenditure and further reckless borrowing is the fact that some of the States of the Commonwealth—and I am not going to name them—are now in such a position that they can hardly borrow at all. The State Ministries or any other Ministry will therefore have to tell the people of this country—what they should have been told long ago—that it is prudent to be economical. If we relieve the States of present indebtedness, they will rush into further indebtedness. I would as soon trust the States Governments as the Federal Government. I would sooner trust some of the States Governments than I would trust the Federal Government, so far as I am able to judge, because even during last session we had to prevent the Federal Government from borrowing. Of course all borrowing, whether by the Federal or by State Governments, involves a debt upon the people. Who has to pay the piper?

Senator STYLES.—The people.

Senator FRASER.—No. I am going to differ from that very usual phrase. I say it is the farmer, the miner, the vigneron, the wool-grower, the man who labours in the fields. He is the man who has to pay the piper. He is the man who pays us £400 a year, and but for him we could not be paid at all. If we overload him too much by Federal or State indebtedness we shall kill the man who pays, and we shall kill the “whole boiling.” It is not at all desirable to encourage any further indebtedness. We are now groaning under a load of debt which we cannot afford to pay.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that we should repudiate?

Senator FRASER.—No. I leave that to Senator McGregor. That is according to his Christian faith. We are not now as we were even twenty years ago. We have a vast deal more indebtedness now in Australia than we had twenty years ago, and we are still piling up the agony. I am now speaking to the people of Australia, and telling them my honest mind in regard to these matters. I say that twenty years ago we were in a much better position to meet our indebtedness than we are in to-day. Even ten years ago we had 64,000,000 sheep in New South Wales, 20,000,000 sheep in Queensland, and so many more in Victoria and in the other States. What have we now? We have 7,000,000 sheep in Queensland, 20,000,000 perhaps in New South Wales, and, with droughts such as Australia never anticipated, and never previously suffered from in this world's history, will any one tell me that we are in a position to increase our indebtedness? I say that the public man who will encourage public borrowing at this stage will not be doing his duty to the Commonwealth. I say we can do no worse thing than to encourage borrowing or extravagance of any kind at the present time. I shall speak on every possible occasion against anything of the kind, and against any action by the Federal Government which will result in extravagant expenditure.

Senator DAWSON.—We are in a better position this year than we were in last year. The drought has lifted.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—But the losses have been made.

Senator FRASER.—I grant to the honorable senator that the cloud has been rent, and that we can now see daylight. But what have we now to do? We have simply to work like slaves to pull up what we have lost. Vast numbers of men have gone under, men whose names will never be heard of in the financial world of the Commonwealth. They have gone under quietly, and nothing is said about them. They are not like bankers and merchants who, when they fail, file a schedule; but farmers and men following similar occupations. They owe money to one or two, and, as a rule, they are honest men who, when they fail, give up all they have, and not a word more is heard of them. Very many of such men have gone under, and there are more to follow, I am sorry to say; so it behoves the Parliaments of Australia, State as well as Federal, to be wise and to refrain from extravagance of any kind where it can be avoided. We are promised courts of conciliation and arbitration. I agree with anything that will bring employer and employé together. But if you go beyond that, and introduce anything in the shape of compulsion, then I say without fear of contradiction that you will be ill-advised.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator would object to the Strike Suppression Bill introduced in the State Parliament of Victoria on that ground?

Senator FRASER.—I do not think there was compulsion there. Does the honorable senator mean to say that a section of people in any country have the right to strike against their own country and to destroy public property? Does any honorable senator contend that any section of the civil servants of the country have an inalienable, God-given right to strike against the Government of their own country? Surely that is not contended? I warned my friends in the Railway department before the difficulty occurred—I begged and entreated many of them whom I had the honour, privilege, and pleasure of recommending for employment in the department five - and - twenty years ago, not to resort to so extreme a measure. I wished the men well, and I told them that it would be sheer madness for them to strike. I am sorry for their position. A great many of them are very good men.

Senator PEARCE.—The whole of them are.

Senator FRASER.—All the members of any section of the community are not good. While I should like to follow Senator Symon in his eloquent statement about the naval agreement I cannot agree with the deductions he made. We are still a small community, but we have an enormous export trade. Unfortunately, it is not now so large as it ought to be, but up to a few years ago it was very great indeed. We could not survive a stoppage of that trade for six months.

If we could not export our produce year by year in security, the people of Australia would become insolvent. Therefore, we are greatly interested in insuring the safety of our ships, and the transport of our produce to other countries. And if we can obtain that security—I do not mind for how many years—I see no other course so suitable and so wise as that which is here recommended. I presume that there will be a condition in the naval agreement that we shall have certain protection in the case of a naval war.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The only condition is that the fleet subsidized may be sent wherever the Admiralty likes without reference to us.

Senator FRASER.—I do not deny that we may be left in a fix, but I do not anticipate that it will be done.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does not my honorable friend think that if the subsidized fleet went away from our shores we should not be protected against a privateer or a cruiser?

Senator FRASER.—We can trust the British Government not to leave us unprotected.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Let us have a little control. Let us have a say in the business.

Senator FRASER.—No; that is not practicable and, besides, too many cooks always spoil the broth. If Canada, Australia, South Africa, and other colonies were allowed to have a say in naval affairs, the Navy would not be so well handled as it is at present. I consider that Australia would be better served by paying a subsidy, especially such a small one as is proposed, because we cannot afford to establish a navy for many years.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It depends on what my honorable friend means. We do not want a navy to go and fight the Japanese in Japan.

Senator FRASER.—The smallest navy that we could possibly require would cost infinitely more than the subsidy, and in case of trouble we should depend on our land forces. In my opinion, it is the best arrangement we can make. Fortunately the paragraph in the speech relating to the transcontinental railway is vastly different from the one in the previous speech. It is a very mild proposal that is mentioned in this speech. I know a good deal about railway construction and the country which this line is proposed to traverse. Although its construction might give a little additional traffic to the railway systems of South Australia and Western Australia, the amount of that extra traffic would not be equal to the contribution which South Australia would have to make.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would not provide grease for the wheels.

Senator FRASER.—I am delighted to hear such an authority as my honorable friend express that view. When I was seeking a seat in the Senate, I strongly denounced this proposal on forty platforms. On every possible occasion I denounced this extravagant idea. It ought to be scouted.

Senator STYLES.—The Government are not in earnest.

Senator FRASER.—If they are not in earnest in this business, the paragraph should have been omitted.

Senator PEARCE.—That is not very flattering to the Government, coming from a supporter.

Senator FRASER.—It is not flattering to the Government. It is a deplorable thing if for the sake of popularity hunting the Government put such a statement in the opening speech. It is an outrage to suggest the construction of this railway. The rails would rust from want of use. When I was in Riverina the other day, I drove my buggy and pair without the slightest hitch over yards capable of drafting 2 000 sheep, and fences, too, of course. During the drought the drift sand had raised the yards 4 feet high. But that country is a garden of Eden in comparison with the country to be traversed by this transcontinental railway.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Even the squatters have not taken up a bit of the country.

Senator FRASER.—Could stronger proof of the worthlessness of the country be adduced than the fact that not an acre of land has been taken up along the route of this railway? It all lies waste and waterless. The steamers run at the rate of 20 knots an hour, but the railways do not average that speed.

Senator PEARCE.—The steamers only travel 14 knots.

Senator FRASER.—They can travel 20 knots, and under the new contract the speed will be faster.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The new contract will not allow these ships to come down.

Senator FRASER.—If the new contract is confined to the use of old tubs, as it is likely to be, we may have to go back to the old 10-knot boats. A few words now regarding the sugar industry.

Senator PEARCE.—It is not ruined, as the honorable senator told us two years ago it would be.

Senator FRASER.—I did not say it would be ruined. What I said was that the sugar-growers at Cairns, which has a worse climate than has Mauritius, could not get on with white labour. I stake my reputation on the accuracy of that statement. In a few days I shall be able to produce some returns to show that my opinions were well founded. Experience so far has borne out all I said last session. Queensland sugar was competing with other sugars in Hobart, Sydney, and Adelaide, and if the Government required revenue it could have been easily obtained from other articles than sugar. The confectionery and many other industries have been handicapped by the enormous increase in the price of sugar.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The Australian people are paying no more for their sugar now than they did before federation.

Senator FRASER.—The price of sugar has been raised enormously. Even with the rebate of £2 per ton, there is an advantage of £3 per ton to the sugar-grower. The growers of North Queensland will prove by absolute experience in a few years that they cannot get along without black labour. The Government bungled the sugar business, and now they state that they intend to alter with the method of payment of the rebates. Last session I said that the arrangement was a silly one. According to their own showing it is an unbusiness-like one, and does not do credit to either the Government or the people. Last session I said it was grossly unfair that foreign ships could enter British ports on the same terms as British ships, and naturally I was very pleased to hear Senator Symon refer to this subject. For many years foreign Governments have subsidized ship-owners in various ways so as to induce them to send out their ships to take trade away from British ships. We could never have won the day in the Transvaal but for the ships of the mother country and her dependencies. We could never have transferred 200,000 soldiers to South Africa but for the enormous number of our ships. Any blow at our shipping is a blow at a vital part of the mother country and her dependencies. All British ships should be placed on one basis. I will not, so far as my voice goes, allow any distinction to be made between a British ship built or owned in England and a ship owned in Australia. There should be no distinction whatever. We, one and all, belong to the British Empire. I am, however, thoroughly in favour of compelling foreign shipping to pay higher charges than British shipping pays. That is a movement in the right direction. Why should those enormous foreign ships come here—ships built and owned in foreign countries—very fine ships, for the building of which I admire the pluck of the people who own them—and pay no more than ships owned and built by British people? No other country on the face of the earth would allow them to take advantage of our ports and get the benefit of our expenditure and take our trade away whilst giving nothing in return. Of course, the United States confine their coastal shipping to their own vessels. I do not blame them for that. America is a huge country, and its people have the right to confine their coastal trade to their own vessels. The Monroe doctrine has to some extent been thrown overboard in regard to the interference of the United States in the affairs of the rest of the world. American policy is very different to-day from what it was twenty years ago. But are we going to draw distinctions between British ships coming here from a British port and ships owned within our own territory? I say, "nay." Let us make no distinction between a ship carrying the English flag coming to our ports and a British ship carrying the Australian flag. The United States Government makes no distinction between ships owned in various parts of their dominions, but we propose to make a distinction between an English ship and an Australian ship. Such a policy is not entitled to be classed as statemanship. As to the Pacific cable, it has been launched at the expense of the various Governments concerned—English, Canadian, and Australian. But what have we done? We have entered into an agreement, subject to ratification by Parliament, and have given the Eastern Extension Company—which is a very clever, powerful, and grasping company, ably managed—terms to which they were not entitled. I admire the management of that company, but there was no reason why we should give them undue advantages.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not think we have done so.

Senator FRASER.—I think so.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have only given them the same advantages as four States gave them.

Senator FRASER.—Some years ago we entered into an agreement with regard to the Pacific cable, and that agreement was broken by some of the States—not by Queensland, not by Victoria. The Eastern Extension Company, being very astute, secured certain privileges in these States. I remember that at the Pacific Cable Conference held at Ottawa some six or eight years ago it was stated by representatives of the Eastern Extension Company that no cable could cross the Pacific, because of the distance from Vancouver to Fanning Island. They declared that over and over again, and when my friend, Sir Sandford Fleming, stated otherwise, they laughed him to scorn.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They never said anything of the sort.

Senator FRASER.—My honorable friend, Senator Playford, was there.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes, and I know all about it. They only said that the long line of cable between Vancouver and Fanning Island would work very slowly.

Senator DRAKE.—That has been falsified by facts.

Senator FRASER.—They declared that it would be almost impossible to work the line, and that it would take many years to construct it. It has now been built at the expense of British people, and the Prime Minister—I think very unwisely—gives to the Eastern Extension Company the privilege of opening offices in Melbourne, Sydney, and elsewhere.

Senator DRAKE.—In Sydney they have that privilege under their own agreement.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Surely Senator Fraser would not prevent men from opening offices? He has some idea of a little bit of freedom.

Senator FRASER.—I would not do an injustice to them; but does the Senate think we are acting fairly by the Pacific cable when we allow a powerful and wealthy company to open offices, and for anything we know to the contrary, to give rebates of anything you like to its customers? The giving of permission to open offices in Sydney and Melbourne gives the company command of two-thirds of the Australian business at one stroke.

Senator DOBSON.—They have reduced their terms.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We cannot do without the company in sending telegrams to the East.

Senator FRASER.—What I complain of is that an agreement which I consider an unwise one has been entered into. Now the company will, of course, monopolize nearly all the trade, and a line that has been built and paid for by British, Canadian, and Australian people will be starved.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator wants a monopoly for the Pacific line.

Senator FRASER.—No; I only want fair play, and it is not fair play to let the Eastern Extension Company do almost all the business and starve the other line.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They only want to open offices, not to do all the business.

Senator FRASER.—They never had the right to open those offices before.

Senator DRAKE.—They had in four of the States before federation.

Senator FRASER.—The arrangement is very unwise, and very prejudicial to the Pacific cable because, as I have pointed out, the great bulk of the business is done in New South Wales and Victoria. I hope that our session will not be a very long one, and that we shall justify the opinions expressed many years ago with regard to the benefits of federation. I agree with Senator Symon that there is friction at present. There was bound to be friction, but it will pass away in time. The creation of the Commonwealth was a wise and a good thing, but we have not taken that advantage of it which we ought to have done. We have not made the savings which were prophesied. I remember going to many meetings before federation and saying that economies would be effected here and there. I should be ashamed to repeat now the statements which I made then. There have been no savings, but all the same old extravagances have gone on. Economy is one of the things that I hope the people of Australia will insist upon. I trust that the legislation of the session will be framed in a common-sense way, and will be for the good of the whole Commonwealth.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I am very glad that this debate is not on party lines, and gives us the opportunity to speak as we think, whether we favour some parts of the Governor-General's speech or otherwise. I notice that there are 25 paragraphs in the speech and, therefore, if I occupy a little longer time than usual, I shall blame the speech on account of the number of topics with which it deals. The address in reply consists of only two paragraphs which are, of course, very brief. In this connexion I desire to compliment the speakers who proposed and seconded the address in reply. Some remarks have been made in the course of the debate to the effect that whatever is in the Constitution we should see carried out, whether it costs money or not. Personally, I have always been in favour of the early establishment of a Federal Judiciary or High Court, and I think that in a matter of this kind the question of expense is altogether secondary to that of efficiency. We cannot expect to have a thoroughly efficient High Court, such as Australia requires, unless we secure the services of the best men available. Personally, I shall be very sorry indeed in one respect when the High Court is established, because we shall then lose from the service of Australia in the political field some of the most brilliant intellects we have amongst us. But there is another provision of the Constitution which is of special interest to New South Wales. That is the provision as to the Federal territory. It is surely a matter of history that New South Wales would never have come into the Federation, and that the Commonwealth would not have existed at all, had it not been that the section in question was inserted in the Constitution. I am, therefore, very pleased to see that the Ministry intend to bring that matter forward during the session. I have heard the point made for the first time to-day, that although we may settle the site for the federal territory, there is no hurry about erecting the capital itself. But I am under the impression that when we have selected the site, we should take preliminary steps, at all events, for laying out the capital. The next point to which I have to allude is in regard to defence. Here I thoroughly indorse the action of the Government. It is extraordinary to my mind that some honorable senators should look upon the sum of £200,000 a year as being a kind of tribute money unworthy of being paid by Australia. They should think of what an enormous trade we have, and that this £200,000 a year is practically for insuring the safety of our trade. I consider that it is a very cheap insurance premium. Were we to attempt to establish a navy of our own, we should have to buy or build huge ships of war for the defence of Australia. Then every few years there would come new discoveries in naval architecture, so that we might find after we had spent a million of money on a ship, that after five or six years it was altogether useless. While I strongly approve of the policy of the Government with regard to naval defence, of course I differ from them as to their immigration policy. I trust—although the Postmaster-General said that there was no intention of bringing in an amendment in the Immigration Restriction Act—that when the Ministry sees the feeling existing in regard to it in both Houses they will reconsider their determination, and resolve to amend the Act, at all events with regard to its application to British subjects. The incident of the six hatters promises to be as historical as the story of the three tailors of Tooley-street. All over the world we are the laughing-stock of English-speaking people. Contrast our procedure with that of the Canadian Government and see the consequence of the opposite policy in the Dominion. I have here an extract showing that recently 2,000 British emigrants left the Mersey for Canada, carrying with them capital to the extent of £500,000.

Senator PEARCE.—They were not under contract.

Senator WALKER. — I don't care whether they were under contract or not. I voted against the absurd section to which I have referred. I should like to see people of British origin come here ; I should like to see a free flow of immigration. I remember when there were only 32,000 people in Queensland, but a policy encouraging immigration was instituted, and to-day in that great State—because it is a great State, and in time will be second to none in Australia—we have a population of half-a-million. Are the wages paid there now lower than they were in the days gone by?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—There were 30,000 Chinese on the Palmer River.

Senator WALKER.—I am sorry that an honorable senator who has recently travelled about Australia so much should hold such narrow views. I never expected to hear such nonsense from the Columbus of Australia. Each of the immigrants to Canada is submitted to a rigorous examination.

Senator PEARCE.—There is nothing to prevent their coming here.

Senator WALKER.—We in Australia are further from the old world than Canada is, and we should offer inducements to immigrants to come here. There is another question mentioned in the Governor-General's speech as to which I should like to make a remark. That is the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill. If that Bill is to be introduced I hope that it will be judged on its merits. At present I am a bit suspicious about it. I notice that amongst the modern "new unionists" there is a habit of calling people who are outside their ranks by such opprobrious terms as "scab" and "blackleg." I hope that if that Bill is brought in, it will make it a punishable offence for a person to call a man a "scab" or a "blackleg," who has the courage to leave a union. A man who leaves one shows that he has individuality, and I believe in individuality and freedom. In regard to this matter, I could refer, if necessary, to an honorable senator who at one time belonged to a labour organization, and if I were to repeat to the Senate what he has told me with regard to the way in which people were treated who had the courage to leave their unions, honorable senators would be very much surprised.

Senator PEARCE.—We are a dangerous lot.

Senator WALKER.—I have a considerable regard personally for the members of the labour party, but I cannot stand their politics. We have lately had in Victoria a conspicuous instance of what may happen. Look at the terrible state into which Victoria was plunged by the railway strike. I wonder if my honorable friends in the labour corner have ever thought of the terrible damage that might have been done to our credit by that strike. I have no hesitation in saying that, had that strike been successful, the fact would have struck such a dire blow at our constitutional rights that in the money markets of the world our public securities would have fallen in value, and the progress of Australia would have been retarded to an extent painful to contemplate. I am only surprised that believers in law and order, and other Governments, had not the courage to send messages of sympathy to Mr. Irvine, commending him for the noble stand he took. That is the view which nine out of every ten people in Australia take of the plucky stand he made. In regard to the mail contract I trust that we shall have the courage, if we have made a mistake, to go back and correct it. See what the British Government now think we intend doing. What can the British Government think of the latest idea of preventing lascars—British subjects—from manning our mail steamers? It will be interesting to notice what will follow in consequence of this legislation. After a time there will be a cry for a republic of Australia. I believe there are many persons inclined to support such a demand at the present time, and we must be careful not to play into their hands. There is another matter in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech which requires careful consideration. I refer to the paragraph relating to the consolidation of State debts. I know that my views are in consonance with those of the Colonial Treasurer and the Attorney-General on this subject, and I think we must be very careful in dealing with the matter. We must take care that we do not encourage extravagance. We must remember that under section 105 of the Constitution we are entitled to take over the debts only as they existed at the establishment of the Commonwealth. Any further debts will have to be a matter of arrangement with the States. If we ever do take over the State debts, there are three points to which we must pay special regard. We must be satisfied, first of all, as to the security; secondly, as to there being a sinking fund; and, thirdly, as to what provisions exist for further loans. If we wish to obtain the best price for our stocks, it would never do to have a variety of Australian stocks on the home market. I hope the time will come when the States will see the wisdom of having all their loans effected through the Commonwealth, and when that is done they will, no doubt, be able to obtain money on very favorable terms. The question is a very difficult one. At one time I was in favour of federalizing the State railways, but that proposal seems to be objected to. Next it seemed to me that we should have to go in for the hypothecation of portion of the railway revenue to supplement the customs income if we took over all the liabilities of the States.

Senator MILLEN.—How could we enforce payment if they decided to suspend the sinking fund for a year?

Senator WALKER.—That is a matter of detail. I am at present simply laying down general lines.

Senator DRAKE.—It could be done by means of trustees.

Senator WALKER.—I knew that a way out of the difficulty could readily be suggested.

Senator MILLEN.—But supposing they passed an Act repealing the first one for a year?

Senator WALKER.—We shall have to be very careful in regard to the proposed sinking fund, because there is a tendency to look upon these funds as mere book entries. The responsible authorities see that they have so much to the credit of such a fund, and they proceed to withdraw it. If there is to be a sinking fund it should be placed in the hands of non-political trustees, and they should have the control of it until such time as it is required. With regard to the Customs department it is unnecessary to repeat what has been said on the subject. I believe that the Minister for Trade and Customs is as honest as any one here, and that he is endeavouring to do what he believes to be his duty. But, unhappily, he is carrying out that duty in a most unfortunate manner. He takes it for granted that we are all rogues until we are proved to be honest.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No.

Senator WALKER.—The way in which the young man to whom reference has been made was treated in Sydney was simply disgraceful.

Senator HIGGS.—Then there was the case of the man in Brisbane.

Senator WALKER.—I am sure that every honorable senator would like to see the administration of the Customs department carried out in a courteous and gentlemanly way. The collectors of customs should be allowed more discretionary power in small matters. We all know that the Postmaster-General has power to settle little difficulties which occur in his department in a way which he thinks is reasonable. A case occurred the other day in which he fined the offender £1.

Senator DRAKE.—Unfortunately, cases of the kind are very numerous, and a little publicity might stop them.

Senator WALKER.—This is the first I have heard of it. I thought, when the Postal Bill was before us, that the Postmaster-General was very glad to have that provision included in it.

Senator DRAKE.—So I was.

Senator WALKER.—Coming to the question of the transcontinental railway, I think that the reference made to it in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech is perfectly permissible. At the same time it must be remembered that the people of South Australia are endeavouring to show us that they can secure the construction of a railway to the Northern Territory by means of a land grant system.

Senator PEARCE.—By giving away a large part of the State.

Senator WALKER.—If they are able to secure the construction of a railway in that way, is there any reason why the Western Australian and South Australian Governments should not be able to secure a transcontinental railway by means of the land grant system?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Who would take the land?

Senator WALKER.—If people will not take the land, let them say so. We should then know what to do. It is asserted—and I believe that Senator Pearce is the authority for the statement—that there is some very good land in Western Australia.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—But not along the proposed route.

Senator WALKER.—Why should there not be other Kalgoorlies, yet undiscovered, in Western Australia? I am sentimentally in favour of the railway, because it would be useful for the defence of Australia. What could assist more materially in the defence of Australia than the construction of railways from one end of the continent to the other? How would it be possible to send troops from Adelaide to Fremantle, or from Adelaide to Port Darwin, without the use of railways? It would certainly take a long time to send them round by steamer. In regard to the statement made by Senator Fraser, I must say that I am not aware that any of the steamers coming to Australia have a speed of 20 knots an hour. I believe it will be found that the best of them can do only 15 knots an hour.

Senator PEARCE.—The average is less than that.

Senator WALKER.—The only other matter to which I wish to refer is in regard to Mr. Chamberlain's remarks as to preferential trade with the Empire.

Senator HIGGS.—Protection?

Senator WALKER.—I quite agree with the honorable senator. I think it shows the thin end of the protectionist's wedge. I believe that Mr. Chamberlain is a second Disraeli with regard to political insight, but this is a proposal which I think is not altogether right. I believe Mr. Chamberlain in making it is actuated by the highest motives, but I do not think it is in accordance with what we believe as free-traders. I am a cosmopolitan free-trader, and I believe that if we could have free-trade throughout all lands we should have the best guarantee for the brotherhood of nations, and the peace of the world.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—We are face to face this evening with one of the disadvantages under which we labour in having only two members of the Ministry sitting in the Senate. Of course I take no exception to the absence of Senator O'Connor. Honorable senators, who know the amount of time which he devoted to the work of last session, will freely excuse his absence at the present time. I wish to make it quite clear that I am not in any sense drawing attention to his absence; but I contend that it is only fair, as illustrated by what is taking place now, that there should be another Minister in the Senate. We have a right to expect in the interests of the debate which is now taking place, and for the better elucidation of the various questions touched upon, that there should be a Minister in a position to reply to the speech just delivered by the leader of the Opposition.

Senator DRAKE.—If I had done so, all the other honorable senators would have followed me.

Senator MILLEN.—That is one of the privileges of the Minister who speaks. With another Minister in the Senate the Postmaster-General would have had a colleague to follow those who spoke after him, and to reply to their criticisms. That is a course which is usual in all parliamentary debates of this character, and I think it tends to the proper elucidation of public questions. Coming to the matters dealt with in the very voluminous and somewhat wonderful document with which we are confronted, I believe that other representatives of New South Wales like myself contemplated saying something upon the question of Customs administration which is a burning one to us. Fortunately, I feel that any obligation of that character is removed from me. The remarks made by Senator Downer represent criticism much more sweeping and stronger than anything which has been launched against the Customs administration by any honorable senator speaking from this side of the Senate. When we have an honorable senator who shows by his whole attitude in making his remarks that he desires to be as kind to the Government as he can, when he admits in a burst of candour, as perhaps the easiest way out of the difficulty, that in the position in which he finds himself he is entitled to the sympathy of the Senate, and when we hear him admitting that unjust acts have been done, that innocent persons have been punished, then I say the whole case against the Customs administration is proven, and there is nothing further to be said. I may add that as I listened to that speech, my sympathy, instead of going out to Senator Downer went out to Senator Drake.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator's sympathy was thrown away.

Senator MILLEN.—I assure the honorable and learned senator that he had it. The fact that Senator Downer spoke in this way enables me to condense my remarks into a very brief compass. I wish, however, to say a word or two as to the site of the federal capital. I want to make the position as clear as I can, and to place views of my State before the Senate, because this is a matter upon which there is some feeling, and, to be frank, some suspicion in the State of New South Wales. That suspicion arises very much from the utterances of representatives of other States. I do not mean for one moment to say that these utterances can by themselves be construed into any intention to evade that provision of the Constitution which declares that the federal territory shall be in New South Wales. But I do say that there are many things taking place now which suggest that the first object aimed at is delay, and that the object of that delay may be repudiation. I desire now, not to express my own view of the matter, but to convey to honorable senators some idea of the opinion which prevails in New South Wales, with a view to having this matter settled as early as possible. Some utterances have been made here this afternoon, and one by my esteemed friend, Senator Styles; and I repeat again that those utterances, by themselves, mean nothing. I rather think that they are idle expressions not meant to convey one-half as much as will be extracted from them by the people of New South Wales, who will read them. Senator Styles said this afternoon that the agreement that the site of the federal capital should be in New South Wales had been arrived at by six gentlemen without authority. That may be perfectly true. The honorable senator also told us that it was "Hobson's choice," and that the people of the Commonwealth had to accept it whether they liked it or not. The attack is first against the authority, and is it not possible to suppose that as there is now an inclination to attack the authority which arrived at that agreement, that sooner or later there will be an inclination to attack the agreement itself? That is only one of many little things which are going on. Then we have in Senator Dobson a staunch advocate for delay. We have the big metropolitan journals of Victoria now in the habit of scornfully referring to the federal territory as the "bush capital." All this goes in my State to form the opinion that the first object sought for is delay, and that ultimately it will be repudiation. We see the danger of delay. There is no provision of the Constitution that is one whit more sacred than any other provision. Each is equally open to amendment provided that the amendment is brought about in a constitutional way. The only thing that may tend to protect this one section of the Constitution from amendment is the moral obligation underlying it, and that moral obligation must necessarily be more strongly binding on the people who entered into the agreement than it will be on their successors. I refuse to believe that any public men who were parties to the Constitution—that any one in this Chamber or any one who in any way took part in the discussions on the Commonwealth Bill—would for one moment consent to the amendment of that provision. But I say that when ten, fifteen, or twenty years have gone by, and the men in whose minds that moral obligation is present have passed away, as they naturally must, and when we have a fresh race of legislators who may not be familiar with the circumstances in which that agreement was arrived at, there will be a strong probability of an effort being made to amend that provision of the Constitution. New South Wales in this matter recognises that "delays are dangerous," and that feeling is strongly accentuated by such utterances as those of Senator Styles, and by the attitude of the Age and Aryus, who have now got into the habit of jeering at the proposal for "a capital," as they term it, "in the bush." They did not adopt that attitude when the Constitution was in the balance in New South Wales. There was not a word of that kind said then, but they affirmed and admitted that it was a graceful concession in order to please New South Wales. Probably it was, but I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that had that provision not been there New South Wales would never have accepted the Commonwealth Bill. I have no personal want of faith in the good intentions of those who have to decide this matter, but having regard to the suspicion which is growing in my own State I do ask, in the interests of good federal feeling, that that question shall be settled as early as possible consistent with the requirements of public convenience. When I put the matter in that way I do not think any one can accuse me of advancing an unfair proposition. Now I come to the matter of the naval agreement. If Senator Downer felt called upon to differ in some particulars with the Government, of which he is a supporter; I feel that upon this occasion, in order to some extent to make things equal, I must quarrel with my leader, and in this matter I have to express a considerable measure of approval of the agreement which the Government have entered into. I fully indorse the sentimental aspect of the question so ably put by Senator Symon. I say at once that I desire to see an Australian navy, manned by Australians and under Australian control. But can any one tell me that, until at any rate the book-keeping period has passed, it is a reasonable or a sound financial proposition to consider the commencement, this year or next year, of a navy, the construction of which is going to involve an expenditure which is really too large for serious consideration? As for the time being the construction of a navy of our own must remain in abeyance, what, I ask myself, are we to do in the meantime? This agreement appears to me to fill in the gap. Though I in no way assent that it is a policy that should obtain here for any protracted period, but as a stop-gap, as something to meet our immediate requirements, and until we are financially in a position to take a bolder course, I propose to support the agreement when it is submitted. I come now to another matter upon which I have also to disagree with Senator Symon. That is as to the payment of the sugar bonus. If I understand the honorable and learned senator's proposition aright, it is this: that those States which were afflicted with the evil of coloured labour, as I regard it, are required to pay the whole cost of the policy of a white Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—Not the whole cost; the partial cost involved in the excise.

Senator MILLEN.—I am dealing with that portion given as a bonus apart from the protective incidence of the matter, and if I have stated Senator Symon's proposition correctly, it amounts to an affirmation that the democracy of the Southern States want an advantage at the expense of the other States. I decline to believe that Southern democracy is built that way. I know that this is a matter that concerns New South Wales as a sugar-producing State, but with the population we have the amount involved is so small that it will not be contended that it would influence us. I am perfectly certain that every man in New South Wales who voted for a white Australian policy was quite prepared to fairly share in the cost of securing it. For the reasons I have given, that is another point in which I have to give my support to the Government, although it will be in opposition to the leader of my own party. I assume, from the fact that there is a reference in the speech to the all-important subject of the State debts, that it is at any rate in contemplation to take some action with the view of effecting a transfer. I hold that any immediate—and I use the term in a comparative sense—transfer of these debts is extremely undesirable. I have not heard any reason advanced why we should transfer them, nor yet has any one to my mind shown that any advantage would result to the Federation from such a transfer. I assume that no one contemplates so serious an operation, and one of such magnitude, unless some advantage is to be obtained. What is that advantage? Is the Federation to be advantaged by assuming a responsibility of such magnitude? I cannot see that it in any way is to gain in the slightest degree from saddling itself with the heavy financial responsibility that would be represented by the acceptance of the liability of the several States. I can see that the States have something to gain. They, of course, will only be too happy to accommodate us if we will place them in a position to unload upon the shoulders of the Commonwealth a national debt which, in too many cases or to too great an extent, represents the result of financial extravagance.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Conversion.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not believe that any financial authority will be found to say that we should gain any immediate advantage from the conversion of the State debts at the present time. Anyone holding State bonds, if they are to be converted, will require to get an equivalent. The holders of State bonds are not philanthropists, and we must not approach them in that spirit. If we ask them to surrender bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest for a lower rate of interest they will want a higher face value on their bonds. For every £1,000 worth of 4 per cent. bonds that they hold to-day, if we convert them to 3 per cent. bonds they will possibly want a face value of £1,100 or £1,200.

Senator PEARCE.—Would there not be a better market for the stock as a result of the transfer?

Senator MILLEN.—Whom will that advantage? Of course it will advantage the owners of the stock. Supposing the stock of New South Wales, which are quoted to-day as low as they have been for many years, suddenly spring up four or five points. It will not put a single penny into the coffers of the Commonwealth.

Senator BEST.—Would not a scheme be desirable whereby if loans fall due they could be absorbed by the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth having control of the revenue?

Senator MILLEN.—I presume that the honorable and learned senator means that the Commonwealth might be able to renew on more advantageous terms than the State. That would be an advantage to the State, not to the Commonwealth.

Senator BEST.—We have control of the revenue.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned senator now anticipates a point I wish to come to. Practically, by that interjection he admits that there will be no advantage to the Commonwealth as distinct from the States. There is no advantage to the Commonwealth itself; but the Commonwealth may by this conversion be the instrument of conveying an advantage to the States. Now the States will still have to pay the interest upon the debts which we take over and convert. I see the possibility of very grave complications arising from that unless we also take over some substantial corresponding asset. That, of course, opens up the question of what the asset is to be. For the present I do not wish to deal with that matter. I merely wish to show the position that we shall be in if we become responsible for the conversion of the State debts.

Senator BEST.—It will be regulated by the revenue within our control.

Senator MILLEN.—Exactly. My honorable and learned friend brings me back to that point again. At the present time the Commonwealth is handing back the surplus revenue to the States. Let me imagine two States in different positions, one having an insufficient revenue even with the amount that the Commonwealth hands back. A bad year overtakes the State and it gets into financial difficulties in its administration. What happens then? Are we to practically force that State to borrow again or become insolvent, if you like, as we should do if we withheld from them the necessary amount of Customs' revenue. If we did not desire to do that we should have to pay their interest charges ourselves? I have always advocated that as far as possible State and Federal finance should be kept distinct. I can see that any number of complications may arise if we once proceed to mix them up, but I cannot see the possibility of very little difficulty and danger arising if we keep them distinct. Let me take the position of the State I referred to. A time might come when, through some radical alteration of the Tariff, the amount of the surplus to be handed back would become very small. We should then have to call upon the State to pay the Federal Treasury the amount which was required to pay the interest on the bonds for which we had become responsible. Supposing that it did not return a positive refusal to pay, but simply said—"We have not the money, and we are not in a position to impose fresh taxation." The only safe way I can see to take over State debts would be to take over with them a proportion of revenue-earning assets, such as the railways. When the Federal Government or any State or recognised authority is prepared to put forward a scheme for the simultaneous transfer of the debts on the one hand and an equal amount of revenue-producing assets on the other, then this matter will be within the region of practical politics, and I shall be prepared to give it careful consideration.

Senator BEST.—It will be many a long day before that takes place.

Senator MILLEN.—I hope it will be. I think it would be suicidal—I can use no other word—for us to seriously contemplate such a big financial operation as the taking over of the State debts until, at any rate, we are outside the bookkeeping period, and until we can see a little more clearly what is to happen, and how things are going to shape. If there is a general agreement that the matter is to be left over until the bookkeeping period has expired, what is the good of loading this speech with references to it, and, still more so, what is the use of these not altogether friendly exchanges of opinion between Federal Ministers and State Ministers? One great advantage—and the principal one so far as I can see—that would result from the transfer of the State debts would be the possibility of the States launching out into a fresh reign of extravagance. When some reference was made to that question in the early portion of the evening, an honorable senator interjected “Of course the transfer of the debts will be accompanied by a restriction on the State Governments.” How can we restrain a State Government? I know of no way by which it can be done, unless we are prepared to use the military forces, and even then I do not know that we should be successful in our effort. There is only one way in which the extravagance of the State Governments can be stopped, so far as my experience goes, and that is by resolution on the part of the electors to put a stop to it. In New South Wales we have a Government which has been carrying out what it terms a spirited public works policy.

Senator PEARCE.—There is a restriction in some of the American States, I believe.

Senator MILLEN.—There is a restriction on the amount which the State Government can borrow, but we cannot enforce that view. It would have to be embodied in the Constitution of a State, and with that we have nothing to do. I venture to say that any proposal submitted to the Parliament or the people of the State that the hands of the Government should be tied, would be scouted indignantly as an improper interference by the federal authorities with State rights. The extravagance, or to use a more euphonious term, the spirited public works policy, is, in my opinion, to be charged not so much against the Government of a State as against the electors. Only the other day I was confronted with this rather amusing paradox in a country town. I was invited to attend a meeting for the purpose of forming a branch of what is called there, the reform movement. It was being started by a number of persons to whom the word Kyabram is like the blessed word Mesopotamia. I said I was not quite clear as to whether what they meant by reform was what I meant by the term. I was for reform all the time, but I was not quite certain that my idea of reform would square with theirs, and therefore I did not attend the meeting at the hotel at which I was staying. When the reformers came out they told me that they were going to attend a meeting of the progress committee. I asked the purpose of the meeting, and I learned that it was to urge the Government to spend some money on what I regarded as an absolutely unnecessary culvert. That is an example of a great deal of the reform which is going on. I am prepared to charge nine-tenths of the extravagance which is taking place in that State to the action of the electors, and until they set the example of refraining from urging the Government on with its extravagance, there will be really nothing in the way of financial reform there. That, perhaps, is by the way. But it leads me to this conclusion, that for us to relieve the States of their financial burdens would simply be to open the road to them to continue a policy which I can only regard as bringing very undesirable, if not disastrous, results upon the commerce and industry of the State. I wish to say a word about the railway to Western Australia. I am not quite clear as to the object of the Government in introducing this subject into the speech. I do not like to suspect Ministers of any attempt to suggest things which they do not intend to carry out, especially if they are improper things, but with all my very kindly regards towards them, I am compelled to ask myself whether this paragraph has not been put into the speech in order to suit the electioneering purposes of certain members of the Government. That is the only conclusion I can arrive at. It is not strictly federal business to construct a railway anywhere. I am not speaking of the merits of this proposal, but certainly, before I consent to the Government undertaking to construct a single railway, I shall require a clear pronouncement as to what their position is to be in regard to the railways of the States generally. I am in very grave doubt as to whether the proposed transcontinental railway has sufficient merit to warrant even five minutes consideration of the project at the present moment.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Let the honorable senator talk about something he has some idea of.

Senator MILLEN.—I have a serious idea about this matter, and it is because I have that idea which takes the shape of a big doubt that I shall hesitate before I give a vote to help the project along until its advocates can bring forward some reasons more substantial than they have done given yet.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Is this the spirit of federation?

Senator MILLEN.—It does not ask me to hurry the Federation into an unfinancial business, and scattered over Australia to-day we have quite enough horrible examples of "wild-cat" railways without adding a federal one to the list.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The best paying lines in Australia runs through country such as you are talking about.

Senator MILLEN.—If it is to be such a good financial business, the only thing I am surprised at is that such a progressive Government as that of Western Australia has not already constructed the line. It would be a most unfriendly act for the Commonwealth to step in and build what is to be the most profitable line in the State, and leave the State to carry on the unprofitable ones.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The line is not to run all through our territory. Does the honorable senator expect a population of less than 250,000 to build it?

Senator MILLEN.—I do not. I admit at once that I do not know the country which it is to traverse. I do not know that there is any one here who can say that he knows it. In listening to the remarks of Senator Pearce, I was reminded of a very old story, to which, perhaps, I may be pardoned for referring. It is the story of a curate who was on one occasion the guest of his bishop. The curate, having breakfast with the bishop, was toying very suspiciously with an egg which was placed before him. The bishop, suspecting that the integrity of the egg was open to doubt, asked the curate whether there was anything wrong with it. The curate replied—"Oh, my lord, it is excellent in parts." That seems to me to be something like the route which this railway is to cross. It may be "excellent in parts," but taken as a whole it is rather doubtful. But apart from the objection which I have to the federal authorities attempting at the present moment to take up any railway enterprise, I want to lay it down as a proposition, which I think will commend itself to the majority of honorable senators, that the Federal Government ought not, at any rate for some years to come, to approach a proposal which is not, in the words of this speech, "on a sound financial basis." Will any one—will even Senator De Largie—contend that the financial prospects of this railway are such as to justify the Federation in dealing with it at the present time? I do not think that any one will venture to say that that railway will produce anything but a big loss for several years to come. If that be so, then so long as that section of the Constitution which is associated with the name of Sir Edward Braddon remains, what an utterly foolish thing it would be to enter upon such an enterprise. We should lay ourselves open to the obligation of taxing the people of Australia to the amount of £4 for every £1 of deficiency caused upon the line. For that reason alone, it stands condemned until, at any rate, the end of the book-keeping period.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What sort of an enterprise will the federal city be from the dividend-producing point of view?

Senator MILLEN.—I think there is something in the Constitution about the federal city, but there is nothing in the Constitution about the transcontinental railway. The two things can surely be considered as distinct and apart. And I must say here that it is a thing which strikes me very forcibly, that while there is such undue haste to rush on with something that is not federal business, we find these same gentlemen very slow to get on with a matter which the Constitution lays upon us distinctly as an obligation. One of the objections which I have to this railway is that it is likely to add to the list of non-productive lines in Australia, which represent to-day about the heaviest burden which our producers have to carry. Because every non-productive line in some way or other means keeping up the freights on the productive lines. If there is one political school in the community that, above all others, ought to be pledged to economy in the acts of government, it is that which holds the fiscal views that I do. We who are fighting for a low Tariff must be, above all others, careful that the Federation incurs no obligation which will compel us to raise through the Customs more than is absolutely necessary. That is an additional reason why I cannot entertain for one moment a proposal such as this, which must undoubtedly compel the raising by the Federal Government, through the Customs, of more money than is at present necessary for the government of the country. I pass from that to the paragraph of the Governor-General's speech which deals with the question of preferential trade. That paragraph reads in this way—

My Advisers observe with gratification recent utterances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies advocating the encouragement of trade relations between various parts of the Empire.

Senator Symon seemed to take exception to that paragraph being inserted in the speech. I think there was ample justification for it; because it appears to me, so far as reading this speech enlightens me, that it is the only thing which the Government has found to gratify it either in the recess or in the programme of legislation submitted to us. Surely my honorable and learned friend, Senator Symon, was not prepared to deprive the Government of that gratification, especially when they stand—as he will recognise, I am sure—within the shadow of that impending doom which must come upon them at the next election. I, for my part, do not wish to deprive them of that gratification. But at the same time I find considerable difficulty in reconciling the passage I have quoted with the following paragraph. We here have gratification expressed at the encouragement of trade relations between various parts of the Empire, and then, having expressed this gratification at something which is to bring the various parts of the Empire, including India, into closer relations with each other, we find the statement made that the Government are prepared to enter into new arrangements to give effect to a provision in the Post and Telegraph Act. We know what that means. If we are to be grateful on account of the prospect of closer relations with other parts of the Empire, including India, there is a want of consistency when they propose to go out of their way, and, by giving effect to that Act, do something which must tend to disturb trade between Australia and other parts of the Empire.

Senator Higgs.—Would the honorable senator exclude aliens, and admit alien goods?

Senator MILLEN.—Would Senator Higgs exclude aliens, and yet drink tea produced in other parts of the world by aliens? I think I saw the honorable senator drinking tea this evening. There is the position. I tell my honorable friends frankly that I am entirely with them in anything they can do to keep Australia white, and in anything that can be done to keep undesirable aliens, coloured or otherwise, out of Australia, I will go as far with them as they will go themselves. But it becomes a different thing when they push that principle to an absurd length like this. We are not at all concerned as to what is done outside Australia. There is a possibility of very seriously injuring the trade that has come to us in the past through certain lines of steam-ships which have done a great deal to develop the commerce of Australia, and do a great deal to-day to promote our trade with other portions of the world.

Senator PEARCE.—Would there be less trade with those ships if they were manned by white men?

Senator MILLEN.—But are we called upon, in our own interest, or for any other reason, to enforce a policy which we consider for the interest of Australia upon other portions of the world? We have quite enough to do here.

Senator PEARCE.—It is only our own trade that we interfere with.

Senator MILLEN.—You are cutting off your nose to spite your face. Does the honorable senator mean to say that for the amount which we now pay to the P. and O. and Orient Companies we are likely to get as good a service by means of any other line of ships? It is one thing to determine the internal and domestic affairs of Australia, and quite another thing to say that we will not take advantage of what is offered to us by a shipping company with which we have nothing to do except to pay for certain services which they render to us. To be consistent in this policy, we should absolutely decline to receive into Australia any goods that have been produced or handled by any coloured person whatever. That would be carrying out the principle to its logical extreme.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Has the honorable senator no interest in British seamen?

Senator MILLEN.—Undoubtedly I have. Whether I have an interest in him or not is quite outside the question, although I dare say that my interest is as keen and as genuine, and possibly as enlightened, as that of the honorable senator. But we are not going to benefit British seamen by enforcing the provision in the Post and Telegraph Act to which I have referred.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Give the British seaman an opportunity of earning his bread.

Senator MILLEN.—It strikes me that the honorable senator is not sincere in expressing that view. I think that we are pushing this principle a great deal too far when, not content with enforcing it within our own country, we are seeking to enforce upon the P. and O. and other steamship companies a policy which may mean that their trade with us will be diminished, or that we shall have to pay more for the same advantages as we already receive from them. I do not think that we can get other companies to do for us what the P. and O. and Orient Companies are doing for us to-day at the same price.

Senator GLASSEY.—There was no falling off of trade in Queensland when this policy was enforced upon the British India line.

Senator MILLEN.—I would ask Senator Glassey whether he means to affirm that we are going to get for the same price an equally efficient service as the P. and O. and Orient Companies are supplying us with now if we insist upon stipulating that they shall not employ coloured labour. Shall we, I ask again, get an equally good service at the same rate?

Senator GLASSEY.—If not, I shall be prepared to pay more.

Senator MILLEN.—At the present time, seeing that the companies do not in any way disturb the policy of a white Australia, it would be foolish for us to try and force our policy outside our borders. It looks to me like thrashing an excellent principle to death. As to the matter of the High Court of Australia I quite agree with Senator Symon—and I am glad to be able to agree with him in one respect—that it is extremely desirable that that Court should be constituted as soon as possible. I listened carefully to the remarks of Senator Fraser, who urged delay. He pointed out in support of a policy of delay that the present States Supreme Courts were giving satisfaction so far as concerned the matters submitted to them. None will doubt either the capacity or integrity of the States Supreme Courts; but what we have to consider is the possibility, which is becoming more and more imminent, of Inter-State disputes arising or of a conflict occurring between a State and the Federation. In such cases it must be admitted that the only competent tribunal to decide the issues will be the Federal High Court. Take the case that came before the Supreme Court of New South Wales the other day. It was the case of a dispute that arose between the Federal Government and the New South Wales State Government, as to whether State imports were dutiable under the Constitution or not. That matter has been by mutual agreement placed in such a position that it is merely held in abeyance for the present, and no decision has been arrived at. But it is important that a decision should be arrived at as early as possible in order that the States may know whether they have a certain revenue at their command, or only three-fourths of the revenue which they expected to receive. It is also desirable that we should know whether in calculating our Customs revenue we should take account of a lesser or greater amount being at our disposal. There is another matter also. I speak of the rivers question, which also is a subject that may have to be decided by the Federal High Court. It bristles with possibilities that will require legal intervention. Is there any State that would be prepared to accept the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of any other State on a matter like that? New South Wales could hardly be expected to accept the decision of the Supreme Court of South Australia, and on the other hand South Australia could not be expected in reason to accept the decision of the New South Wales Supreme Court. That is one case which renders it extremely desirable that the High Court should be constituted as early as possible, and I venture to affirm that it is to be hoped the court will be constituted before these cases arise. To wait until a case had arisen and then, when a discussion had taken place, and the matter had been advanced to the point of open disagreement, to appoint the judges and to have the court constituted would be a very bad policy indeed. I am entirely with those who go for economy. When the Bill is submitted I shall give every assistance in carrying it through, but I shall cast my vote on every occasion to limit the expense and to limit the number of Judges. Reference is made in the Governor-General's speech to the question of electoral divisions. With regard to that matter I wish only to say that as several of the States are large it must necessarily take a considerable time for the people interested to learn what are the proposed divisions. I hope the Government will table the plan of division as early as possible, so that every publicity may be given to enable different centres which have any objections to urge to make their views known, as provided for in the Act. I am extremely glad to learn from the Governor-General's speech that the position of our finances is sound, but I should have thought that in common gratitude the Government would have added to that declaration an expression of thanks and appreciation of the services rendered by honorable members on this side of the Senate. It is clearly due to our efforts in removing the restrictive barriers in the Tariff—those objectionable features with which it bristled when it came here—that imports have been flowing into the country to an extent which enables the Government to congratulate itself on a position of sound finance. In conclusion, I cordially join with the Government, as I am sure all honorable senators will do, in expressing the hope that with the return of good seasons that is now promised, although not yet assured, the prosperity of Australia, which in previous times has gone ahead by leaps and bounds will advance at an unprecedented rate under the Federation. We must recognise that, with justification or without it, there has been a certain amount of ill-feeling caused by the introduction of the new order of things. In New South Wales that feeling has been particularly pronounced. I would not go so far as to say that those who feel themselves aggrieved or who are smarting under the administration to-day would give a vote to undo the Constitution, but I do feel that if the position were open to them to-day, a great many of them would vote against its acceptance. I do not think they would undo what has been done, even if the opportunity presented itself. I hope that with a little more tactful administration, with a return to good seasons and prosperity and the creation of brighter and better times, all these difficulties will disappear, and that the citizens will regard federation in the way they have regarded their own State political edifices as something of which they may justly be proud.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—It is only because, as Senator Glassey says, I desire to save the situation, and because I feel that a number of honorable senators who, I am sure, are desirous of contributing to this debate, have not been able to get together their notes, that I am willing now to step into the breach. Consequently I shall try to follow the example of the mover and seconder of the address in reply by remembering that "brevity is the soul of wit." If my remarks have no other qualification to recommend them to the Senate, I hope they will at least have the virtue of brevity. Dealing first with the proposed constitution of the High Court, I have to say right here that my opinion on this important question has undergone a change. During last session I was one of those who, for reasons of economy, did not think it advisable that the High Court should be established for some time to come. But a number of events have transpired since then which make me believe that it will be to the best interests of the Commonwealth to have the High Court established as early a date as possible. I cannot forget that very recently one State in the Commonwealth contemplated legislation which would probably have created serious trouble amongst the people—legislation which a large section of the people of Australia believed would go so far as to endanger the liberties of which they have so long been proud. When it is possible for legislation of that kind to pass a State Parliament, I think it is a very good thing that the people of Australia should have behind them the safeguard of the Federal High Court. It is a good thing that they should have a Federal High Court to appeal to if their liberties are ever endangered by the action of a State Government. I wish to see the provisions of the Bill before dealing with the cost of establishing that court. I understand that it is intended to appoint five Judges. As a layman I am not in a position to say whether it is absolutely necessary that five Judges should be appointed, or whether three would be able to do the work ; but my vote shall be given every time in the direction of economy. If I can bring myself to believe that a lesser number than that proposed will be able to carry out the work I shall vote for the reduction. Until recently I held the opinion that probably the High Court could be constituted by appointing the Chief Justices of the various States to deal with every question as it arose, the Chief Justice of the State in which the cause of action arose standing aside during the hearing of that particular case. I have come to the conclusion, however, that it will be to the best interests of the people to establish an independent tribunal apart altogether from that method of procedure. I believe that the High Court is one of the cornerstones of the foundation of our Constitution, and I shall, therefore, support its establishment. The next paragraph in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech is that dealing with the federal capital. Here again I have to admit that my opinions have undergone a change since last session. I have taken all possible opportunities of ascertaining the opinions of the people of New South Wales, and I cannot get away from two serious facts. One of these is that the establishment of the federal capital—following, of course, the choice of a site, which I know we shall all agree to, at as early a date as possible—must involve tremendous expense, if we are not very careful how we go to work in erecting the federal buildings, and removing the seat of Parliament from Melbourne. I know that there is a strong feeling in the State I represent, and in all the other States against any expenditure being incurred which could possibly be avoided at the present juncture. But we have to remember, as it has been put very ably and eloquently to-day by two honorable senators, that there is an express provision in the Constitution in regard to the federal capital. Whilst I am sorry that that provision exists ; whilst I do not agree that it was wise to fetter the members of this Parliament by such a provision, the fact remains that it is in the Constitution, and that probably the people of New South Wales would not have voted for federation had they not been granted that concession. In these circumstances, unwise concession as I believe it to have been, I hope I possess sufficient of the federal spirit to recognise that this is a federal matter, and that if we wish to be true to the federal spirit we can do nothing but comply with the terms of the Constitution. Therefore I shall support any action in the direction of choosing a site for the capital as soon as we are in the possession of the necessary information, and I shall support reasonable expenditure up to a certain point in connexion with the establishment of the capital. The next paragraph in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech is one which I regard with particular interest. It deals with the proposed establishment of courts of conciliation and arbitration. Very little need exists to-day for any one to go into details to show the absolute necessity for the immediate establishment of these courts in the best interests of all sections of the people of Australia. We have recently been brought face to face with a terrible strike—a terrible disorganization of the whole arrangements of one State.

Senator LT.-COL. GOULD.—We could not deal with such a matter in a Federal Court of Conciliation and Arbitration.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We know perfectly well that we are bound by the Constitution, and we are aware that it limits us to industrial disputes which extend beyond one State. It is generally believed that it is only a shipping strike which would come within the purview of the Federal Court. But I hold the view that if a railway strike occurred in any one State, as it did the other day, there must be imminent danger of that strike spreading to other States, and surely the industrial legislation that we should pass would be competent to deal with cases of that kind. If the railway employes in all of the States belonged to one union, and, because of a grievance in one State, that union called out their men simultaneously, which is not a very remote contingency it seems to me, in view of the sympathy which was extended to the Victorian railway men by workers in the other States—it is quite possible that a railway strike would come within the purview of the legislation that we can pass. Another reason which I think should impel us to pass this legislation as soon as we can, is that it may have the effect of bringing local courts of conciliation and arbitration into force in States where there are no such tribunals to deal with matters which possibly could never come within our jurisdiction. I know that Tasmania has no legislation on the subject. I wish it had. On several occasions we have had instances in which the whole of the people of the State would have derived benefits from legislation of this kind. I hope that there will be no opposition to this proposal, and I feel satisfied that legislation providing for courts of conciliation and arbitration will pass through this Parliament without much serious opposition. I feel in somewhat of a dilemma as to the proposed naval agreement. I am satisfied that if we are ever to commence a proper system of national defence we cannot commence too early. While possibly we shall not be in a position for at least a few years to come to establish the nucleus of a new Australian navy, I do not think that I shall be able to support the proposal to increase the present subsidy to £200,000. I do not believe that that proposal meets with the approval of the majority of the people of Australia at the present time. Some very strong reasons will have to be advanced by the representative of the Government who will have charge of this proposal in the Senate to induce me to approve of it. I know that there is a strong feeling in the minds of Australians that there should be an Australian navy, as soon as it is possible for us to establish one. There is also a strong feeling that we are not at present financially in a position to do so; but there is again a strong feeling that we can very well go along as we are doing now for a few years to come, and I believe that the consensus of opinion amongst the people of Australia is in support of that feeling. I believe that if a vote were taken of the whole of the people of Australia to-morrow the new agreement proposed would not receive the assent of the majority. I approve of the proposal to establish uniform patent laws, and I hope it will be found possible to do so during the present session. I find the following paragraph in the Governor-General's speech:—

My Advisers feel that the distinct demand expressed by the people of Australia for the substitution of white for coloured labour in the sugar industry implies a readiness to share the financial burden imposed by this substitution.

I come from a State where we have never had anything to do with the kanaka trouble, and know nothing about it, but where, I am proud to say, the majority of the people believe in the principle of a white Australia. I believe a majority of the electors of Tasmania possess sufficient of the federal spirit to induce them to take up their share of any burdens which it may be necessary to impose on Australia for the furtherance of that principle, and they will be prepared to pay their share of any increase which may be found necessary in the price of sugar to meet the purpose. Personally, although I use sugar, I do not know whether I am paying any more for it now than I paid for it twelve months ago. I certainly do not think that I pay very much more. Although it has already been said, and probably will again be said, by representatives of Tasmania in this House, that the people of that State feel themselves hardly dealt with in this connexion, and think it unfair that they should be asked to bear any burden simply in order to rid Queensland of the kanaka traffic—although that has been said many times recently by distinguished gentlemen in stumping the country in Tasmania, I do not believe that such a statement represents the true feeling of the great body of the people of that State. I believe that the people there are prepared to pay a little more for the sugar they consume, for the purpose of keeping Australia for the white races, and ridding the Commonwealth of the kanaka traffic. I am therefore prepared to support the proposal that Tasmania, as well as the States other than Queensland and New South Wales, should bear their share of the necessary burden, and that it may not be imposed wholly upon those two States. I take it that the Inter-State Commission Bill is necessary for the proper conduct of trade between the States. Though it will not greatly affect my own State, I am willing to give my support to such a Bill if it is introduced during the present session. The suggested railway connexion between Western Australia and South Australia is a very big question involving an enormous expense. With the exception of our friends from Western Australia I think that none of us is in a position to state definitely his reasons either for agreeing to or dissenting from that proposal. I shall reserve my decision upon the matter until I have the reports of the experts in my hands. If I can satisfy myself from those reports that it will be in the interests of the people, and will not involve too great an expense or too great a loss to the Commonwealth, I shall support it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—All the reports so far are favorable.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If on the other hand it is shown that it is likely there will be a very big loss, I cannot agree to support it for the present. As has already been stated to-night, we are so tied up by the "Braddon blot" in the Constitution that I do not see where the money for this work is to come from in the immediate future. There is, however, one reason which might induce many of us to support the construction of the proposed line even before the expiration of the bookkeeping period, and induce us to find the money somehow. That reason would be based upon the question of defence. If our best authorities on defence matters assure us that it is absolutely necessary for the proper defence of Australia that that line should be constructed, and should be constructed soon, such an assurance would, in my opinion, justify any honorable senator in altering his opinion, and in supporting the construction of the line at an early date. If that cannot be shown, and if by the construction of the line we shall be faced with a heavy loss, I do not think any of us can assent to the proposal for some years to come. However, I shall reserve my opinion until I am in the possession of information which will enable me to come to an unbiased and impartial decision. I do not know that I have much more to add to the debate. No doubt now that the situation has been saved for them, there are a number of honorable senators who have collected their scattered thoughts, and are ready to give us the benefit of their views.

Senator HIGGS.—Has the honorable senator nothing to say about the six hatters?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I should say that the hats have been torn to shreds if the hatters have not. I do not think it necessary at this stage to say much about the six hatters. I think the matter was fairly put by a gentleman speaking in my own State the other day when he said that it was simply a question of administration. The Act was there and it was the duty of the Prime Minister to administer it. If the right honorable gentleman opposing the Prime Minister, and who would like to take his place as soon as he can, were in the same position and refused to administer the Act, he would have shown himself a traitor to the Australian laws. The honorable and learned senator who leads the Opposition in this Chamber, in referring to the matter this afternoon, answered my question as to whether he was here when this particular legislation was passed by saying that it did not matter whether he was or not, but I take it that every honorable senator who assented to that legislation is as responsible for it now as he was when he assisted to pass it.

Senator BARRETT.—The honorable and learned senator was not here.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If that is so, of course the honorable and learned senator had no opportunity of dissenting from it. But I believe that even if Senator Symon, who referred to the section this afternoon as a farcical piece of legislation, had been in the position of the Prime Minister he would not have refused to administer the Act as he found it. There was nothing left for the Prime Minister to do but to administer the Act. There have been so many absurd reports circulated in connexion with this matter that it must have become obnoxious to the people to hear any mention of the six hatters; but I think that even those who oppose the Prime Minister, and who condemn this particular section, will do him the credit of saying that he did not make or pass the law, that it was passed by the two Houses of the Federal Parliament, and that the gentleman in the honorable position of Prime Minister of the Commonwealth having a mandate from the people of Australia to administer the law as he found it, would have been false to the trust reposed in him if he had not administered the law properly and correctly as I contend he did. I have now performed the good natured task of filling in time and saving the situation, and if honorable senators who have not yet spoken allow the opportunity to be lost it will not be my fault. As each of the measures mentioned in the Governor-General's speech comes before the Senate, it will be competent for us to deal with it. I hope then to be able to deal with the measures referred to in a more connected way, and certainly with more preparation than I have had for what I have said to-night. In conclusion, I may be permitted to express the hope that any friction aroused in any of the States against the action of the Federal Government—friction absolutely inseparable from the situation, and absolutely unavoidable when we remember that the Federal Government had to weld six different systems into one harmonious whole—will rapidly be swept away. I believe that the people of Australia are now beginning to understand that what has been done by the Federal Parliament and by Federal Ministers has been done according to their convictions, and to the best of their ability, in the interests of the whole of the people of Australia.

Senator MACFARLANE (Tasmania).—I had no intention of speaking upon the address in reply; but there is one paragraph in the speech of the Governor-General which I think should have a little more criticism. I refer to the paragraph dealing with the carriage of mails between England and Australia. The trouble about the carriage of mails from Australia to Europe originally arose out of Senator Glassey's proposal that the crews of vessels carrying our mails should be white men.

Senator GLASSEY.—A sound proposal.

Senator MACFARLANE.—At the time the Government were strongly against the proposal, voted against it, and succeeded in throwing it out in the Senate.

Senator GLASSEY.—The Government made a very great mistake.

Senator MACFARLANE.—Nothing has happened since that time to justify us in reversing that opinion. We have quite recently had an official announcement from the Postmaster-General in London, Mr. Austin Chamberlain, that the Imperial postal authorities will not be parties to any such agreement, and that they will provide their own postal contracts on their own terms. Are we prepared to throw away any advantage we may get from the postal arrangements of England, and set ourselves up in the way proposed, to benefit—I do not know whom? It will not benefit ourselves to have only white crews on some of the steamers. No Australian will take up the stokers' business in these steamers simply for the sake of a white Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—They will take it up for £6 per week.

Senator MACFARLANE.—If the P. and O. Company were induced to do away with the employment of lascars it would not improve the position of the white people in England in the least. It is the poorer classes of the continental people who take stokers' positions—Dutch, Germans, Swedes, Italians, and Spaniards. How then would the proposal benefit Australia from a white Australia point of view? There is another point which we should consider when it is proposed that we shall make contracts for our own mail steamers. I find from Whitaker's Almanac that if we want a faster service as we say we do, we shall have great difficulty in getting the steamers. Perhaps there are not many honorable senators who are aware that on the British register of steam-ships there are only 47 that go over 16 knots, and 85 that go 16 knots. We have not a very large field of selection, and, therefore, we should have the greatest difficulty in getting a service, and if we got one we should have to pay a very large sum for that which would not benefit ourselves. I hope the Government will bring in a Bill to amend the Post and Telegraph Act.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—While the address in reply meets with my general commendation, I must admit that I do not agree altogether with some parts of it. For instance, I think that the establishment of the High Court might better be allowed to stand over for the next Parliament to deal with than any of the other matters which have been referred to. Senator Symon has said that there is a great outcry in the country for the establishment of the High Court. During my travels in the recess I found that very little interest was taken in this matter. Wherever I spoke, little or no interest was taken in the subject. The prevailing opinion seemed to be that we have as many courts as we can afford to maintain—that we are paying quite sufficient for our law, and that by certain alterations a federal court could be created without involving additional cost to the taxpayers. I am altogether opposed to the establishment of the High Court at the present time. I wish to say a few words in reference to the naval vote. During the last twelve months we have learned that the people of Australia generally are not docile persons, and that they are very much against the imposition of heavy taxation. That feeling has been made manifest in Victoria perhaps to a greater extent than in any other State, but, all over the Commonwealth, the prevailing sentiment is that heavy taxation should be avoided. If that feeling exists in every State how are we to increase the naval vote and the military vote? I think that if we increase those votes, create a High Court, and carry out certain other proposals, we shall have a Kyabram agitation started all over the Commonwealth. If the money were required for the construction of works that could not be done without, I could understand these proposals for extra expenditure. A great deal has been said to-night against the construction of the transcontinental railway. I believe that if there is one public work which the Commonwealth should undertake, it is the building of that line.

Senator CHARLESTON.—But that would mean extra taxation.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Certainly; but it is a national work, which would repay the Commonwealth for the expenditure it entailed. During the last eight or ten years there are no portions of the Commonwealth which have been so prosperous as the interior portions, more particularly the auriferous regions of Western Australia. The construction of this transcontinental railway would open up miles and miles of auriferous country. It is well known that for the last eight years that State has practically been the milch cow for the greater portion of the Commonwealth. Any money spent in opening up auriferous country of that kind would very well repay the Commonwealth. I can quite agree with the attitude which has been taken up by the Government. So far I think they have acted wisely in regard to this project. I believe that once the final report of the commission is received they will see their way to arrange for a flying survey and take whatever action is necessary to bring about the construction of the line. So far the Government have shown themselves to be very friendly to the project. Even if the Opposition were placed in power, they would find themselves in the same predicament as the Government. All those Members of Parliament who undertook the trip to Western Australia at the time when our great water scheme was opened, and who had never been there before, were very much surprised at the potentialities of the State. It was an eye-opener to most of them. They all admitted that they had not expected to see such a prosperous country as it undoubtedly is. They were more surprised at the agricultural country they saw than at anything else. They expected to see a great sandy desert, but they saw finer agricultural and pastoral country than they had seen in the States from which they had come. That was invariably the opinion expressed by those who did make the trip to Coolgardie. If more Members of Parliament had taken the trip any unfavorable impressions would have been removed from their minds. Senator Millen asked why the people of Western Australia do not build this railway if it is to be such a good speculation as we say it will be. He ought to remember that it will traverse South Australia as well as Western Australia. The population of our State is still less than 250,000, only half the population of Melbourne, and to ask that small population to undertake such a gigantic task as to build a railway that will cost between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 would be unreasonable. More desert country has been opened up in Western Australia than in any other State. Our best paying railways are those which traverse desert country. It is only natural to expect that similar results will flow from the construction of this great transcontinental railway. I cannot understand why the representatives of South Australia should be opposed to the project, because their State has as much to gain from its construction as has Western Australia. I believe that our State would not have entered the Federation if it had not been for the very explicit promises of support that we received from the leading public men and the Government of South Australia. We had a distinct promise from the Premier, and the present Minister for Trade and Customs.

Senator PLAYFORD.—What did the Premier say?

Senator DE LARGIE.—He said he would introduce an Enabling Bill for the purpose of having this railway built.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not to have the railway built, but to enable the Commonwealth to build the line if it liked.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I shall read the letter which Mr. Holder, the Premier of South Australia, wrote to Sir John Forrest, the then Premier of Western Australia, on the 1st February, 1900 :—

Following our conversation as to the possible blocking of the construction of a railway line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta by the Federal authority by South Australia refusing the consent rendered necessary by section XXXIV. of clause 51 of the Commonwealth Bill to the construction of the line through her territory, I regard the withholding of consent as a most improbable thing ; in fact, quite out of the question. To assure you of our attitude in the matter, I will undertake as soon as the Federation is established, West and South Australia, both being States of the Commonwealth, to introduce a Bill formally giving the assent of this province to the construction of the line by the Federal authority, and to pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill in your Parliament.

He was not the only public man in South Australia who spoke in that way.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is only the opinion of an individual man.

Senator DE LARGIE.—He was the Premier of the State.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He spoke for himself, and the Parliament was not bound by that statement.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Several prominent men in South Australia at that time approved of the project. I was then taking a leading part in the federation movement in Western Australia. One of the principal arguments we used there was that we were almost certain to get a trans-continental railway built if we accepted the Constitution, and if the people of that State had not believed that it would be done there would have been no federation so far as it was concerned. As a matter of fact there is no real federation without a railway to that State. We are as much isolated from the eastern portions of the Commonwealth as is New Zealand. We are practically in the position of an island.

Senator PLAYFORD.—South Australia could not give you the railway.

Senator DE LARGIE.—No ; but the Parliament of that State could pass an Enabling Bill.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Has the Parliament of Western Australia done so ?

Senator DE LARGIE.—No ; but it is only too anxious to do so. The Premier of Western Australia has informed the Premier of South Australia that a Bill is ready to be introduced, and asked when he intends to carry out the promise of South Australia. It is not a creditable attitude for South Australia to take up, after it promised to do a certain thing. The public men of South Australia led the people of Western Australia to think that they would do everything in their power to assist this great national project, and to-day they are repudiating their promise. Is that fair treatment to a State which I believe is doing more for the Federation than is any other State ? I am well pleased to see that the Government have allowed no grass to grow under their feet in furthering this project as far as any reasonable man could expect them to do. I hope that the final report of the commission will be of such a favorable character that it will justify the Government in authorizing a flying survey to be made. I wish to say a few words on the proposal to bring in a Compulsory Conciliation and Arbitration Bill for federal purposes.

Senator WALKER.—Compulsory ?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Certainly ; otherwise it would be of very little good to us. The man who is not in favour of compulsory arbitration is worse than an anarchist in the community ; he would like to see a state of anarchy introduced into the Commonwealth. I am satisfied that the principle of compulsory arbitration will stay in Australian politics. Wherever it has been tried it has been an unqualified success. We know how it has worked out in New Zealand for years. We know how it is working in New South Wales, and I can speak from personal experience of its operation in Western Australia. The very States where we have compulsory arbitration in force are the most prosperous States and the most peaceful so far as concerns industrialism. They are the States in which the danger of strikes and similar disputes is now past. I hold that the man who is opposed to this principle in the face of the experience which we have had is a dangerous member of society. He is only encouraging a state of unrest and lawlessness that may break out at any moment. To allow such things to occur in the face of past experience would be most ill-advised. I am satisfied that the proposed measure will tend to bring the whole of the States into line with regard to industrial legislation. We can all recognise the unfairness of having a Factories Act in one State, whilst another State has quite a different law. In these days of close competition we want to have the laws affecting industry as uniform as possible, in order that the States may come into line.

Senator DOBSON.—The Arbitration Bill will not do that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It will bring us towards that point, at all events; and it will be found that the operation of this measure will pretty well have the effect of solving the whole problem. I believe that even Tasmania, which is always lagging behind in social and industrial legislation, will, when this measure becomes law, be induced to pass a Bill bringing that State into line with Western Australia.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is talking of a uniform factories law.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is pretty well the same thing. I cannot very well separate conciliation and arbitration from factories legislation. I cannot resist the opportunity of saying a word on the old hackneyed subject of the six hatters. It strikes me as being a strange thing that those who have had so much to say in opposition to the Immigration Restriction Act have failed to note that in Canada and the United States similar laws exist. We do not hear a word of adverse comment in reference to those countries. All this cant about wanting to keep out our fellow Britishers and that sort of thing is so much nonsense. If honorable senators go down to the wharfs when mail steamers arrive they will any day see Britishers coming on shore without let or hindrance.

Senator WALKER.—Seven hundred and fifty men left New South Wales for New Zealand and other places last week.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Yes—they were going to a land where compulsory arbitration is the law. I am sorry to hear that such a state of things exists in New South Wales. If free-trade had continued to be the policy in New South Wales there would have been no need to import six hatters, or any other number. But compare the fuss which was made about these hatters with what occurred in Western Australia. The Government of that State required the services of certain boilermakers. They advertised all over the State for them, and finally, being unable to obtain the men they wanted in Australia, they brought them from the old country. They landed them in Western Australia, and no one objected to their landing, for the simple reason that the necessary application was made, and the men were permitted to land without any outcry or any delay. But no such application was made in the case of the six hatters. Instead of that there was an outcry of such a character that if it had gone on much longer we should have heard that they had not only been imprisoned, but executed by order of the Federal Government. As a matter of fact, they were never imprisoned at all. They were simply kept on board the ship until permission to land was given. I should like to say with regard to the proposed Navigation Bill that I am satisfied from what I have seen during the recess that such a measure is required. At the same time I am rather afraid, in view of the comprehensive character of the proposed measures, that we shall be unable to get it placed upon the statute-book during the present session. The necessity for a Bill of the kind was brought very strongly before me in Western Australia, where a coloured crew was working on the wharf loading goods into the very ships that were taking away labouring men who ought to have been able to find work in this country. It is reasonable to suppose that if it is a right and proper thing for coloured men to be allowed to do such work on our wharfs—if it is a proper thing for shipping companies to be able to put a black crew ashore to do labouring work—they should be able to take their coloured labour up to the mills where the timber comes from and work them there. It is only extending the same process and the same reasoning. Therefore there is a necessity for a navigation law for the Commonwealth, and I only wish there was more time to enable us to pass it this session. A great deal has been said as to the action of the Federal Government in objecting to the employment of black crews on board the mail steamers with whose owners the Commonwealth enters into contracts. I cannot understand a man who takes up a patriotic attitude—and by-the-way, I find it is those very men who make the greatest parade of their patriotism and love of country who make the greatest noise about this section in the Post and Telegraph Act—objecting to the manning of our mail boats with white crews. At the present time in the old country matters have reached such a stage that there are 60,000 lascars and coolies working on board vessels in the mercantile marine, having taken the place of so many Britishers.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Well, I suppose we may say that two lascars are equal to one British sailor, and that at that rate these coolies have taken the place of at least 30,000 Britishers. The British sailor is fast becoming a thing of the past. We find that the British Navy is undermanned to the extent of 30,000 men. Supposing Britain were to get into trouble with some great maritime power, what reserve of men would she have to fall back upon?

Senator DOBSON.—The lascars would be the saving of her.

Senator DE LARGIE.—God help the country if the lascars are to be the men who are to take the place of the blue jackets of England! We have this fact staring us in the face: that it is owing to the employment of these lascars and coolies that the old historical British seaman is fast disappearing. I will ask any one who has any patriotism in him whether that is to the advantage of the country?

Senator WALKER.—In the mercantile service there are thousands of Norwegians, Danes, and Dutchmen.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That does not improve the position a bit. I should like to see passed a Navigation Bill which would encourage the employment of British people. I notice in the Governor-General's speech a reference to the Royal Commission on Bonuses that has been sitting during the recess, and taking evidence on that all-important subject. Its report has not yet come to hand, and I hope that when it is produced it will be found to be favorable to the attitude taken up by myself and others who think that the iron industry is one that should be kept in the hands of the Government of the country. I think so, too, for the simple reason that the iron industry of Australia must of necessity be a monopoly. We have to choose whether it shall be a Government monopoly or a private monopoly. A monopoly it must be, because the requirements of the country will not enable us to have more than one, or at the very utmost two, up-to-date iron works in Australia. The market is not sufficiently large to require any more. Consequently, if the iron industry is to be started here it must either be in the hands of a private monopolist or be a State-owned institution. There need be no doubt as to what our choice should be. Furthermore, when it is remembered that the iron industry will supply the rails for the Government railways all over Australia, and that nine-tenths of its produce will be in the direction of the supply of those rails, we have another reason for not allowing it to get into the hands of a private company which will be in a position to screw out of the States Governments any price it likes to ask for the material which is required in the construction of railways. I trust that when the report comes along it will be of such a character as to justify the attitude taken up upon the Bill introduced by the Government last session. As far as concerns the speech as a whole, I am favorably impressed by it, and hope that the policy therein outlined will be carried into effect. If it is, the present session will end as did the last one, as being marked by a record of democratic legislation being put up in the first Federal Parliament.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—The Government may fairly be congratulated upon the prospect of a very quiet session, judging from the tenor of the speeches delivered both in this Chamber and in the other House. But while they may be congratulated upon having apparently a fair wind and a favorable passage ahead of them, they may be consoled with upon the unfortunate position in which they have been placed in regard to the proposer and seconder of the address in reply. It was stated in the press—I do not know whether with truth or not—that the Government were experiencing some difficulty in obtaining gentlemen to occupy these positions.

Senator DRAKE.—That is incorrect.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I accept the statement that it is incorrect, but it is an unfortunate thing that the Government was not able to find gentlemen who were prepared to bless their proposals instead of, to a great extent, cursing them. Both the proposer and the seconder of the adoption of the address in reply took exception to some important matters in connexion with the proposals of the Government. One would rather have seen gentlemen supporting whole-heartedly the proposals of the Government—at any rate those of principal importance touched upon in the speech.

Of course, I know that it is quite impossible to find men who are in accordance from beginning to end with the policy of any Government, but it should be possible to find those who are willing to accept the responsibility of proposing or seconding the address in reply who will, on the whole, justify the policy laid down by the Government in the speech from the Throne. However, that is by the way. We know that the honorable and learned senator who moved the adoption of the address in reply is a gentleman of very considerable parliamentary experience. He has held office frequently. He has had occasion to get gentlemen to act in a similar capacity to that in which he has officiated to-night, and he knows perfectly well how desirable it is that a Government should as far as possible to have the mover and seconder of the address in reply in accord with their policy. We are beginning also to experience some of the disadvantages of the legislation passed last session. Several matters have cropped up since last session relative to legislation then passed, and we are beginning to realize that there is a necessity for amending our laws, at any rate in some directions. One very noticeable matter in regard to which the Government themselves recognise the necessity for something of the kind relates to the rebate allowed in the excise paid upon sugar. When the Excise Bill was introduced I for one certainly understood that the idea of the Government was that the whole of Australia should contribute proportionately to the cost of securing a white Australia under the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Are we not doing so by paying the higher duty?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No; we find that the Government have ascertained that the operation of that measure has been to enable certain of the States to escape from the responsibility which they should be prepared to assume, and which a great many of their representatives, I am sure, are prepared to accept. We ought to have been clear, however, as to what our legislation was in that direction. Take the case of a State that does not consume any of the sugar which is produced in Australia. She can consume that produced in Mauritius or some other part of the world, and when it comes to a settlement in regard to the customs duties she receives three-fourths of the duty of £6 per ton paid. A direct incentive is given by that state of affairs—as far as the financial position is concerned—to accept the product of the foreign grower instead of the native-grown sugar. We do not want to put any State in that position. We want all the States to realize that if a white Australia is to be our policy, every State and every individual in the Commonwealth is required to contribute a fair proportion towards bringing about what the country looks upon as being in the interests of Australia as a whole.

Senator DAWSON.—A national policy.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Yes. Therefore I welcome the proposal of the Government that the matter should be dealt with in this way. Having adopted the policy of a white Australia, having laid down certain lines for the exclusion of the kanaka, and having said to the sugar-growers in Australia—"We are going to ease the difficulties you may experience in the early stages of getting rid of the kanaka;" it is only fair that we should all bear our proportion of the cost. His Excellency the Governor-General's speech makes allusion to the naval defence of Australia. I have the fullest possible sympathy with the aspirations of every honorable senator who desires to make our Commonwealth truly a national body. I sympathize entirely with the desire of those who wish to see a navy established wholly under our own control and direction, and to be used to defend our own shores from foreign aggression. But while I sympathize with that desire, while I fully believe in it as the ultimate destiny of our Commonwealth, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that we are not prepared at present to take upon ourselves the burden of a naval defence. When we have an opportunity, such as the one at present offered to us, it would be folly to refuse to take advantage of it. It is an opportunity to provide what I regard as an efficient defence of our shores.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable and learned senator is like a boy who is always behind his mother.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No, I am not. I like to look at these things from a prudent point of view, and I think I am doing so. I do not say there is any necessity for renewing an agreement of this kind, period after period. At the present time it would be highly undesirable to attempt to establish what may be termed a fully-fledged Australian navy. I know that there are objections to the present scheme. There is a feeling of insecurity on the part of honorable senators when they realize that if the Admiralty or other Imperial authorities think fit the whole of this navy can be sent away to China, America, India, or elsewhere to meet, and destroy, if possible, the enemy's fleet, but leaving us open to the attack of any hostile cruiser or marauder which may see fit to set out for our shores. We are told that no such ship could be despatched without notice of its departure being given to us. But still such a vessel might find an opportunity to make a descent on our shores and to do incalculable injury before we could get back any of the ships of the squadron. I hope it will not be part of the policy of the Government, while accepting the proposal to pay the subsidy of £200,000 a year to entirely deprive Australia of some local naval defence that might be useful at any rate to deal with a single ship attacking our ports. If some local naval defence is preserved, I do not think we shall be able to reasonably complain of any danger. We have our land forces established from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, and I very much regret the way in which the efficiency of those forces has been cut down. Nevertheless, I hope that the great bulk of our people will realize that whether we have a citizen soldiery, a militia, or a permanent force to defend us, we should endeavour to make it thoroughly efficient. I believe in relying to a great extent upon our citizens for the defence of the Commonwealth, but a state of dissatisfaction permeates the whole of the military forces. I allude not simply to the permanent, but to the partially-paid forces which, I take it, are the backbone of our land defences, and will have to bear the brunt of any fighting which occurs on Australian shores. When we find dissatisfaction permeating their ranks we may depend upon it that there is something very rotten in the administration of the Defence department. It has been stated that a policy of retrenchment has been thrust upon the Government which should not have been forced upon it. If that is so the Government should have allowed honorable members to realize that they could not assent to the demand to reduce the expenditure to a degree which would impair the efficiency of the forces. If, on the other hand, it can be shown, and is shown ultimately, that the amount within which the Government are bound to keep their expenditure is sufficient, well and good. I would gladly welcome the utmost reduction, but I do not welcome a reduction which means a want of efficiency on the part of the forces to which we look to defend us in a case of national emergency. If a man insures a property or a building, he does not go to a bankrupt office. He takes care that the office is one which he may reasonably expect will be able to protect him from loss in the case of his property being damaged by fire. And so with the defence forces. We must be reasonably satisfied that they are sufficient to meet all reasonable cases of emergency.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Shall we have any men at all?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That is a drawback which might arise in regard to naval defence. I have already said that I do not believe in absolutely cutting out the local naval defence, and relying entirely upon this agreement. I should like to see something in the way of an available local defence in a time of great emergency. It would very much assist the Imperial authorities if they knew that the whole of the ships in these waters might be spared without exposing Australia to any grievous danger from a sudden descent on our shores. We recognise that our land forces must remain in existence, and we must take care that we do not destroy their efficiency and that esprit de corps which should exist amongst them. If honorable senators will make inquiries they will hear in every direction of men who contemplate retiring from the forces because they do not think they are being treated fairly by the Federation.

Senator DAWSON.—If the proposed agreement were carried out what would become of our present naval forces?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I do not believe in destroying our local naval forces.

Senator DAWSON.—But the one must be consequent upon the other.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No; the present agreement will expire in two or three years' time. The Imperial authorities say to us—"We are prepared to make an agreement of a similar character if you will increase the subsidy. In return we will increase the number and improve the class of ships on the station."

Senator DAWSON.—That destroys all Australian reserves.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I do not think so, as one of the essential points of the scheme is that a large number of Australians shall be employed on the squadron if they are prepared to take service. Therefore, it will not destroy, but rather assist in building up our naval forces by training men who will be prepared to take service in an Australian navy whenever it is established. For these reasons, I join issue entirely with much that has been said by Senator Symon in connexion with this matter. I think we might very well support the Government scheme at the present time, although I believe that the day is not very far distant when a naval force should not only be established, but will actually be established, that will belong to and be under the control of the Commonwealth, subject to such power as it may be considered fit to give the Imperial authorities to take charge of a combined fleet for any special work.

Senator PEARCE.—Is it proposed to keep vessels like the Protector in commission?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I believe not, and that is where I think we are making a mistake. But I am not going to refuse to be a party to the granting of this subsidy because I believe our own people are making a mistake in another direction. I consider the subsidy will give us much greater results than would be obtained from the simple retention of our naval forces. It has been pointed out that, in any event, the Imperial naval authorities will require to have ships stationed here, because this is a naval base; but it is very much better to know that we are going to have ships of a certain class than that it should be left entirely to chance. We see by the papers that three of the third-class cruisers at present in Port Jackson are to be repaired at considerable expense. I take that to mean that if we decline to agree to this proposal, the Imperial authorities will probably leave these three vessels on the station instead of supplanting them by others double or treble their value for defence purposes. Even if it is not so, should we not be prepared as Australians to say that we recognise the great benefit we receive from this naval base—the great benefit which we receive from the ships placed in commission in Australia, and the value of it to our trade and commerce and to all our ports, and that, therefore, we are prepared to bear the expenditure?

Senator DAWSON.—Nineteen-twentieths was not our trade at all.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—We are vitally interested in the trade which British men-of-war protect. Our goods are being taken to the other end of the world, and they are receiving the protection of the Imperial fleet. Whilst speaking of naval matters, I come to the question of the carriage of our mails to the old country. I say that here again we are now seeing the result of legislation which was passed during the past session in the section of the Postal Act which prohibits the Government from subsidizing any company for the carriage of our mails unless they employ white labour only.

Senator GLASSEY.—That provision will be adhered to.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Whether it is adhered to or not, I would point out to the honorable senator that it is creating a good deal of difficulty for the Government at the present time. When the question of new contracts came under consideration, the Postmaster-General very naturally pointed out to the Imperial authorities what the state of our legislation was. But how much sympathy did he get? He simply had a reply that the Imperial authorities could not recognise that legislation in dealing with contracts for the carriage of mails. They pointed out that they had Indian subjects, and were bound to treat them on exactly the same terms as their white subjects, and they were not going to turn round and place those men at a disadvantage merely because Australia desired it.

Senator GLASSEY.—Why do they not give them votes in India and place them upon an equality with the white people there?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That is a different thing altogether. We have these men as British subjects, their services are readily available, and are regarded as valuable. While we believe in a white Australia, we are perfectly right in legislating in that direction as we see fit within the four corners of the country under our control, but when we are dealing with persons far away from our shores, we have no power over them whatever. I admit at once that we had the power to pass the law we did pass, but I say it is an unwise law, because it does not affect by one jot or tittle what was desired by the advocates of a white Australia. I suppose they are not going forth to set up a white world. If that is their desire, of course, they must go on and do the best they can, but I believe they will find that they have a difficult task to perform, and will require to go in for a great deal of white-wash before they will succeed in accomplishing it. We now find ourselves with mail contracts, under which we receive mails every week by a quick service of 28 or 29 days from one part of the world to the other—a 14-knot service. For that there is paid a subsidy of £170,000 a year, of which we pay £75,000, and the Imperial postal authorities £95,000. For that payment we have a weekly mail service guaranteed to us. It is, however, an open secret that the Orient Company do not find that the share of the subsidy which they are receiving puts them in a strong position financially. They are practically working at a loss under existing circumstances, and unless trade revives considerably, it is a question whether, with the subsidy being paid at the present time, they will be prepared to continue a trade which has been of very great value to Australia, and which certainly ought to be encouraged to a considerable extent. The proposal made now is that we should subsidize ships ourselves for the carriage of mails from Australia to Colombo. Have honorable senators realized the cost of such a service? We have not in Australia, at the present time, a company prepared to take up a contract of that magnitude without incurring very great additional expense in providing ships. The carriage of a mail every week each way would require the employment of a large number of ships, and such a contract as is proposed will involve the payment of a considerable subsidy for the carriage of mails to Colombo. In what position will we be then? Having carried our mails to Colombo under the proposed contract, they will be placed on board the very ships, manned partly by lascars, that we say shall not carry our mails from Fremantle. Will the cause of a white Australia be advanced one jot by any such means?

Senator GLASSEY.—Certainly; it is a part of the whole schema.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—We have already incurred considerable expenditure in getting rid of the kanaka to meet the demand for a white Australia, and now we are to be called upon to incur still greater expenditure to carry out what, after all, can only be part of a fad when we come to deal with places beyond the limit of Australia and Australian legislation.

Senator FRASER.—Are Australians never to secure any sea employment?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I hope they will. But an honorable senator who spoke some little time ago alluded to the fact that there are 60,000 lascars seamen employed in the British marine. Whether my honorable friend's figures are correct or not I do not know, but I assume that he made himself certain of their accuracy before quoting them, and yet assuming that they are accurate, I deny the conclusion which the honorable senator draws from them—that these men displace 60,000 or even 30,000 British seamen. All we need to do to find that there is no ground for such a conclusion is to look at the constitution of the mercantile navy of Great Britain at the present time. We shall find that more than half of the seamen manning that navy are white foreigners. When it is said that these men are displacing British sailors, it must be clear that they come in only to supply the places wanting for British sailors. It may in future be a part of the policy of the Admiralty to increase the pay of British seamen in the naval forces of the Empire, because we know quite well that something will have to be done in order to make the seamen's avocation much more attractive to Britishers than it appears at present to be.

Senator DAWSON.—And yet, when an attempt is made to do that, the honorable and learned senator is one of the very people who oppose the effort.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Not at all. No man would more gladly welcome the manning of the whole of the British ships by British seamen than I. But I say that if we cannot get British seamen, and can get men who, although they may have a little colour in their veins, are nevertheless British subjects, and are men who can man our ships as efficiently as foreigners, we should take advantage of the opportunity to secure the services of those men. By their employment blanks may be filled up in the British navy which we might not otherwise be able to fill up. I do not say that they are intentionally blind, but I do wish that some honorable senators could realize that they cannot carry any policy beyond certain limits. When this principle is taken beyond a certain limit ridicule is thrown upon what might otherwise be a very good national movement on the part of Australia. I hope that honorable senators will realize what is proposed, and that they understand that they are being asked to say that the Postmaster-General may spend £150,000 in order to provide a service for Australia which will be no more efficient than that for which we are now paying £75,000. I hope that, especially, they will bear in mind that it is proposed to allow the completion of that service to be carried out by the very men whom we will not allow to touch upon Australian shores. I say the proposal is a mistake, and no man saw it more clearly than did the Vice-President of the Executive Council when the matter was first raised in this Chamber and supported with all the vigour which our friends of the labour party put into everything they take up. The Vice-President of the Executive Council battled against the proposal, and gave strong reasons why it should not be accepted. Ultimately it was decided, in the other Chamber, that this legislation should be adopted, and it was subsequently accepted by ourselves. It is really a matter for congratulation to find that, as time has passed by, some honorable senators have begun to realize much more clearly than they did in earlier stages, the desirability of settling the question of the capital site. Although the Constitution specified no time within which the establishment of the federal capital was to be carried out, it was always regarded as a matter which would be dealt with without undue delay. The Customs Bill, for very obvious reasons, had to be passed within a limited period. But, although no limitation was placed upon the time within which other matters were to be dealt with by the Commonwealth, nevertheless this matter was regarded by the majority of the electors of the Commonwealth as one which should be carried into effect as early as possible. I have never been one of those who have girded at the Government, and charged them with neglecting the interests of New South Wales in connexion with this question. I know that some honorable senators have thought that the Government required an occasional spur or reminder to induce them to settle this matter as quickly as possible; but I realize that the Government have taken some steps, and have promised to have the matter settled within the present session. The people of New South Wales were satisfied that the people of the Commonwealth would be prepared to abide by the arrangement come to under the Constitution.

Senator GLASSEY.—New South Wales would never have accepted the Commonwealth Bill if it had not been for that.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It is perfectly certain that the people of New South Wales would never have entered into the Federation but for that. The other States did not ask New South Wales to enter into the Federation under false pretences, and they will abide by whatever was put into the Constitution. I believe that the people of Australia are perfectly willing that this matter should be dealt with as speedily as possible. The great bug-bear of expense is suggested by some honorable senators from time to time, but I am one of those who are quite prepared to recognise the fact that we must be satisfied with temporary buildings in the early stages. It is necessary that we should carry out the promise of the Constitution, but we are not called upon at the present time to put up the marble palaces to which some honorable senators referred.

Senator GLASSEY.—There is no necessity for marble palaces at any time.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—We shall have to be content with moderate accommodation, and I am satisfied that whatever expense it may be necessary to incur in a matter of this kind will be properly incurred. I welcome the proposal of the Government to settle the matter at an early date. We know that the report of the commission, if not already in the hands of the Government, will be in their hands very shortly, and we shall then have an opportunity of settling and of getting rid of a matter which, to a certain extent, is becoming a sore in the minds of a number of people. Some allusion is made to courts of conciliation and arbitration, and in that connexion, some honorable senators have referred to the recent unfortunate trouble with the railway men in the State of Victoria. I think that for those men to have gone out on strike was one of the most lamentable mistakes ever made. I do not blame the bulk of the men, but I do blame the leaders who were either very short-sighted or were disloyal to the Constitution under which they lived.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What about the Government who goaded them into striking?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I should not justify any Government in goading men into so unfortunate a position. But I regret that the men themselves did not realize the fact that there cannot be two Governments in a State—that there must be one Government which must be supreme, unless it is desired to bring about a revolution by some unconstitutional means. If the Government of a State made a mistake and acted unjustly towards any large section of their employés I believe that the people of the State would themselves be prepared to do justice to the men if it were shown that they had been unable to obtain justice from the Government. I recognise that these men have had troubles. I believe there have been troubles which ought never to have existed. I may perhaps go so far as to say that I believe some of the recent State legislation was undesirable in the interests of the men. I do not believe in the representation of any particular class or section in Parliament as a class or section. I believe in giving every man his own rights as an ordinary citizen of the community. But in any case the strike was a most deplorable one, and it would have been a still more deplorable one for the whole of Australia if it had been successful. I am glad to think that better and wiser counsels prevailed in the end, and that the men resumed their work. They will no doubt exercise the rights they hold in common with their fellow citizens to get fair justice meted out to them. When the Premier met the men and said he was prepared to deal with all their grievances if they would only obey an order given by the Government the whole ground was cut from beneath their feet to strike at that particular time even if there had been any justification to strike at all. I feel strongly that Government employés have no justification to go on strike and cause a dislocation of the whole trade and business of a community.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If the Premier had the law behind him, why did he not put it into operation and test the question in that way?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It was the duty of the men to obey the Premier's order at once, and to test its legality afterwards. On the contrary, the men said to the Government, "You can go and test the law. We shall not test the law, but we shall go on strike. We shall do an illegal and improper act in order to drive you to do a legal and a proper act." The men were misguided, and no doubt many a man went out on strike merely out of loyalty to his comrades.

Senator DAWSON.—Upon what is the honorable and learned senator founding his opinion?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Upon what I read in the press.

Senator DAWSON.—The press published the most villainous slanders that were ever issued to the public. Would the honorable senator like to be judged by the Age's opinion of him?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Perhaps not, but assuming for the sake of argument that the men were full of trouble and grievances; even then they had no right to throw the whole community into confusion. There was a constitutional course for them to adopt. It might have taken up a little more time, but they would have gained the respect and help of the community at large. An honorable senator urged one of the strongest possible reasons against this Parliament passing a Bill to establish a Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, when he said that if there were a strike in one State, we might depend upon it that it would be accentuated until it spread into other States, in order that it might come under this measure. If honorable members wish courts of conciliation and arbitration to deal with such matters, why do they not see that the States establish them? The Parliament of New South Wales has established a Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, and the law provides that in the event of the railway men feeling themselves aggrieved they shall have the right to take their grievance before the court. Why do not people agitate here, and urge the Parliament of Victoria to pass a similar measure?

Senator DAWSON.—They cannot, because they are press-ridden here.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It does not follow that if they cannot do it to-day they may not be able to do it to-morrow.

Senator BARRETT.—We have been agitating for a number of years.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No doubt it takes time to bring about a change in the law; but do not create a greater evil in order to meet a lesser one. I admit at once that originally it was considered that a Federal Act would deal with a great maritime strike such as that which occurred some years ago. It was recognised that it would be impossible for any one State to deal with a strike of the kind.

Senator PEARCE.—The railway strike could not have spread to any other State unless its Government took action similar to that of the Victorian Government.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I do not believe that the men in New South Wales would be mad or foolish enough, especially in view of existing legislation, to place themselves in such an unfortunate position.

Senator DAWSON.—They could not strike under their Act.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Under the provisions of the Act they cannot strike, but last season we had a strike of shearers that lasted a considerable time, and caused a good deal of loss, inconvenience, bloodshed, and litigation. Of course, the law was invoked, and the strike came to an end. But at the same time it did not prevent the occurrence of a strike, although it was intended to have that effect. I contend that courts of arbitration are still on their trial. I know that there is a large number of workers in the community who do not altogether believe in courts of arbitration. We know that so dissatisfied were the men with one or two decisions in New Zealand that they wished to have a Judge removed in order that somebody else might be placed on the Bench. We know that in New South Wales the labour party is urging an alteration in the constitution of the court, so that men will be selected to deal with each dispute and thus become pure partisans.

Senator DAWSON.—What does the honorable and learned senator believe in as a preventive of strikes if not of arbitration?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The honorable senator is putting to me a difficult conundrum.

Senator DAWSON.—Is it coercion?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No; I believe in men having the utmost possible liberty. I cannot see that the cause of labour will be advanced unless we have very careful and prudent men on the Bench. The success of this experiment will depend upon the way in which the law is administered. I can conceive of an administration which will cause universal discontent amongst employes. I can also conceive of an administration which will cause universal discontent amongst employers. It is a very difficult and delicate problem to deal with, and we must wait until we see the provisions of the Bill. The project to build a transcontinental railway must depend to a very great extent upon the result of the inquiries which are being made. We can all sympathize with the desire of Western Australia to be connected by rail with the eastern sea-board. We can all realize that it would have a tendency to cement those bonds of fraternity which we desire to see existing between the different States. Whether a transcontinental railway would ever provide grease for the wheels or not, it would be of great value for defence purposes. Whether it is desirable to deal with the question at the present time or not must depend largely upon the reports we have as to the possible paying character of the line, and as to how far we shall be justified in incurring the expenditure. When we find that neither Western Australia nor South Australia has attempted to build its portion of the line, we may reasonably conclude that the Governments of those States were afraid of incurring financial difficulties in building a railway which probably would not pay for many years.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We have just constructed a water scheme at a cost of £3,000,000.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Western Australia has shown great enterprise in carrying water to the gold-fields. I recognise that the State has advanced by leaps and bounds during the last few years, and long may it continue to so advance. I hope that the day is not far distant when we as prudent men can agree to the construction of such a railway as is desired by its representatives. But our decision must depend largely upon the reports which are obtained from time to time. I should not feel satisfied unless I made some allusion to the administration of the Customs department. In Sydney, and in Newcastle, it is held in universal execration by the merchants. We placed certain drastic powers in the hands of the Minister, after getting an assurance from the Vice-President of the Executive Council that they would not be wielded unless for a very good reason. We have the Minister for Trade and Customs saying that he is not going to judge between a mistake and a wilful infraction of the law. If a man does a certain thing, whether it is done wilfully or unwilfully, whether the mistake is made honestly or not, he is to be prosecuted and the magistrate is placed in this wretched position that while he may know that the person is quite innocent of the most remote idea of defrauding the Customs he must fine him £5.

Senator MCGREGOR.—For his carelessness.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No. In cases where men have found out before they completed their returns that they had made a mistake and asked that it should be rectified, they have been prosecuted and fined £5. It is enough to make a man's blood boil to think that such acts of manifest injustice can be perpetrated under a federal law. The Prime Minister spoke of a case in which he said he was satisfied that the man should not have been prosecuted and fined, and that the fine should be remitted. Another Minister said—"We will remit a portion of the fine," thereby showing that the man was properly prosecuted, but that the offence was a small one, and that therefore it could be condoned to a very great extent. I am speaking in general terms of the administration, and only mentioning one or two cases which occur to my mind at the moment. Of course, in those cases where fraud has been proved the prosecution has been perfectly right. Where the Minister has good reason to believe that it has been committed and cannot be proved he has a perfect right to order a prosecution. But where he knows that no fraud has been attempted or contemplated his administration is condemned in the eyes of the people, when he uses the law for the purpose of prosecuting a man under such circumstances merely for the sake of uniformity. I do not suggest that he is acting out of personal malice, but he is such a slave to the idea of uniformity that he cannot realize the fact that there must be some discretion exercised in these matters. We all recollect the prosecution that took place during last session in connexion with the firm of Sargood, Butler, Nichol, and Ewen. The prosecuting counsel said—"We attribute no fraud, and no desire to commit fraud, no dishonesty, and no desire to commit dishonesty, but we prosecute for a simple mistake." It caused no loss to the revenue, it was rectified before all the papers had gone through, and the magistrate took it upon himself to dismiss the case.

His decision was appealed against, and the Full Court said that he was bound to convict and fine. It is monstrous that we should place any portion of the community in such a position. The delays that have occurred time after time with regard to decisions have not helped at all to satisfy the people with regard to the administration of the department. Of course the Minister might have thought it was better that he should have sole control in his hands, but in a Commonwealth composed of States so widely scattered, it was a great mistake for him to throw any obstacle in the way of obtaining speedy decisions upon points that crop up from time to time. There was always the power of the Minister to review decisions if mistakes were made, and take care that no similar mistake was made again. Although I am an opponent, and shall always be, of any system of customs such as we have in existence, levied for purely protective purposes, nevertheless, I believe the administration could have been of such a kind that the people would have said—"We do not agree with the law, but are prepared to abide by it until we can get it altered." Australia is largely interested in her shipping affairs, and the more we can do to help the shipping industry in getting through its work in the different ports, the more we shall be assisting Australia. We want to induce shipping to come to our shores. We want to enable our people to send their produce to the other end of the world upon the most favorable terms. Every disadvantage placed upon shipping is a disadvantage placed upon our own people. They have to pay for it in the long run. If by restrictions we hamper and harass the shipping that comes to our ports, we may depend upon it—for time is money—that the people of Australia will have to pay for the delay. We do not benefit ourselves—we only harass ourselves by that policy. Whether we be free-traders or protectionists, or adopt the policy of the labour party, every man who is a true Australian wants to advance Australian interests as far as he possibly can. With a population of only four millions of people in Australia we are only in our infancy. We want to see 40,000,000 people here. The more people we have here the more work there will be for our men, and the better will our position be in the world. We do not want to make Australia a close reserve for the few individuals who are here at the present time. But I am afraid that much of our policy has that tendency. Canada is welcoming people into her territory. She realizes that population is wealth. Statisticians tell us that every individual in a country is worth a large sum of money to it.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Where would the honorable and learned senator put the people whom he would bring here?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Where did we put the people who came here after the gold rush of 1851? They got scattered in every direction. Only a handful stuck to gold digging; others went into various occupations. We want to offer inducements to people to come here, because every man who comes is of benefit to the country.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Give them a chance of getting on the land.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I wish that the legislation of the different States would give people every possible means of getting on to the land. So far from being favorable to shutting up the land, I would welcome every measure that would enable us to take large estates and enable people of smaller means to live upon them.

Senator O'KEEFE.—After you do that you can talk about more population.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—All the States need increased population. We need to go in for a good system of irrigation. That would help us to no mean extent. I hope that when we receive these various measures from the Government they will be in such a state that we shall be able to deal with them without great delay, and that they will realize that in the framing of our legislation all sections of the community have to be considered. We should legislate upon the principle of fair play to all. I hope, for instance, that the Inter-State Commission Bill will be shorn of the very objectionable features that existed in the measure introduced during last session. It was abandoned—and very properly abandoned—last year by the Government as a measure which was not suitable to the wants of our community. There are a few matters of great importance that will have to be dealt with in that Bill; but very few people were satisfied with the measure which originally came before us. Again, I am glad to know that the Government are going on with the Bill for the establishment of the High Court. As Senator Symon said to-day, that is one of the essentials of the Commonwealth itself.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Essential to the lawyers.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No, essential to the people not to the lawyers. Many points of importance will crop up from time to time which ought to be settled by the Full Court of Australia. There is, for instance, the question of taxing State imports. See the absurd position that occurs in New South Wales where the State is building railways. The Government imports railway material paid for with borrowed money. It is made to pay a heavy duty upon the iron thus imported, and it gets back three-fourths of the duty that it has paid upon the iron bought with borrowed money, and puts that sum into its pocket as revenue legitimately earned. There is a good reason why there should be no charge upon the imports of the State for material that is to be used for public purposes. An instance of the necessity of the establishment of the High Court occurred in Victoria recently. It was sought to establish the point that the Customs Bill was inoperative, because it was at variance with the terms of the Constitution as being a taxing measure. According to a decision given by the learned Chief Justice, it was held that in passing the Customs Act we had gone beyond the powers conferred by the Constitution. Very properly, another case of a similar kind went to the Full Court, where a different decision was given. Here, in the one State of Victoria, are the Judges divided on this one important question. When a similar case occurs in New South Wales, we do not know what the Judges may decide. If a case occurs in South Australia, we do not know what the result will be. The decisions may be all alike, or they may be different. We should have the law laid down by the High Court, so that lawyers may be able to advise their clients reliably, and merchants may know what to do. I therefore welcome the determination of the Ministry in this respect. Whether we shall have three or five Judges is a matter upon which I am not yet prepared to give an opinion. I am inclined to believe that when we establish a High Court if we start with three Judges it will be a very fair thing to do, and will enable us to deal properly with the very important questions which arise. We do not need at this stage to have sufficient Judges to send all over Australia. Three Judges will be sufficient to constitute the court, and we shall then have a tribunal that we have every reason to believe will be beyond all party consideration, above all passions and prejudices, and will decide questions that arise in connexion with the interpretation of the Constitution upon fair and legitimate grounds.

Debate (on motion by Senator DRAKE) adjourned.

Senate adjourned at 10.11 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 27 May, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. THOMSON presented a petition from the Colonial Sugar Refining Company Ltd., Sydney, praying the House to direct an inquiry into the practices and circumstances connected with an alleged unequal collection of excise upon sugar.

Petition received and read.

TRANSFER OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I wish to ask the Treasurer if there have been any negotiations with the State Premiers, especially since the Premiers' Conference, in regard to the transfer of State debts to the Commonwealth. If there have been such negotiations, how soon will he feel free to take the members of this House into his confidence upon the subject?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have had no negotiations with the Premiers of the States upon the subject.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Will the right honorable and learned gentleman, before entering into negotiations to take over any part of the debts of any State, obtain an absolute agreement from that State that it will not borrow any more money except through the Commonwealth?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I shall be glad to do what I can in that direction, but my honorable friend is asking me to perform a very hard task. My inclinations run in the direction he has indicated, and I shall be very glad to carry out his views if I have the opportunity.

SUBDIVISION OF ELECTORATES.

Mr. CONROY.—Will the Minister for Home Affairs lay upon the table a statement showing the number of electors in each of the new subdivisions of New South Wales?

Mr. REID.—Let us have the information for all the States of the Commonwealth.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I cannot obtain information in respect to all the States of the Commonwealth until the work of subdivision has been completed. With regard to the State of New South Wales, although I know what the number of electors in each electorate is, I have not received any official information upon the subject, and if the honorable and learned member for Werriwa will refer to the Electoral Act he will find that the Minister has no power to compel the Commissioner to give him information until after the expiration of the month which is allotted for the lodging and consideration of objections and suggestions. Directly the previous subdivision of New South Wales was completed, I gave the information to the press, but the law to which I refer was not then in existence. Under existing circumstances, I am powerless to compel the Commissioner to give me information until he supplies it to me officially.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Does the Minister know if the South Australian Commissioner has finished the subdivision of that State?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I saw a paragraph in one of the newspapers to the effect that the subdivision had been completed, and a report forwarded to my office.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was stated that the Commissioner was waiting for an intimation from the Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have not received any information from South Australia. A telegram was sent to the Commissioner there yesterday, to inquire if the work had been completed, but I have not yet had a reply to it. It is the Commissioner's duty to issue the necessary maps, and give all the information required by law, but I am powerless to compel him to do more than his commission instructs him to do.

Mr. CONROY.—Can the Minister inform us whether the figures which have been published in one of the Sydney newspapers are correct?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know what figures have been published, but I have not made any information public. I have not seen the figures referred to.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All the figures have been published.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have no information to that effect. If the honorable and learned member for Werriwa will supply me with a copy of the newspaper report to which he has referred, I will compare the figures contained in it with the figures which have been supplied to me.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The South Australian newspapers have published similar information.

ELECTORAL ACT ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I desire to know from the Minister for Home Affairs what provision is being made to meet the case of electors who have changed their residence since the names were collected for the federal electoral rolls? At present there are no electoral registrars to deal with the matter. Under the Act, if an elector has changed his place of residence, he will not be able to vote for the electorate on the roll of which his name appears. What provision is made for giving him a vote in the division to which he has removed?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I should like notice to be given of that question; but I think that special provision is made in the Act to meet cases of the kind referred to.

Mr. PAGE.—I desire to bring under the notice of the Minister for Home Affairs a letter which I have received from a friend of mine at Grafton, in New South Wales. The letter is as follows:—

I have qualified for a vote in New South Wales, but I am unable to find any one who is in a position to inform me how to get my name on the roll so that I can vote at the forthcoming election. I wish you would write and inform me at once who to apply to.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The writer has only to apply to the Chief Electoral Officer in order to have his name placed upon the roll.

Mr. BROWN.—I desire to know from the Minister for Home Affairs when the federal rolls will be prepared and exhibited for public information?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The names of all applicants and of those who have been placed upon the rolls are in the electoral office at present; the rolls are being prepared in accordance with the law. Each name has to be placed in the lists for one or the other of the polling places in the various divisions; and this cannot be done until this House has dealt with the subdivisions.

Mr. POYNTON.—I wish to ask the Minister if the Chief Electoral Officers have been appointed for each of the States, and, if so, what are the names of the gentlemen selected?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The acting Chief Electoral Officer is in Melbourne, and certain gentlemen have been engaged in the various States to carry out arrangements in connexion with the compilation of the rolls. No permanent officials have, however, yet been appointed. Following up the reply which I gave just now to the question asked by the honorable member for Maranoa, I desire to say that if any person wishes to have his name placed upon the roll he has only to write to the electoral officer in the State for which he has a vote, or to the central electoral office, or to myself. If he adopts either of these alternative methods, he will certainly have his name placed upon the roll.

PAPERS.

Sir EDMUND BARTON laid upon the table the following papers:—

Resolutions agreed to at the Conference of State Premiers held in Sydney on 15th April, 1903, and following days.

Papers relating to the admission of certain boilermakers into Western Australia.

Papers relating to the admission of certain Maoris into New South Wales.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CROUCH.—I desire to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that yesterday I gave notice that to-day I would move a motion which I now find is placed on the notice-paper for Friday. The Minister for Defence had informed me that the motion would be unopposed. It will be very inconvenient for me to attend the House at half-past 10 on Friday morning, and I fully relied upon the usual practice being followed, namely, that of placing a motion on the notice-paper for the date specified in the notice.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The practice is that no business of the character to which the honorable and learned member's notice refers—nothing except purely formal business—shall be entered upon until the address in reply is adopted. I therefore propose to allow the honorable and learned member's notice of motion to stand on the paper in such position as he may prefer until the time to which I have referred arrives.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH: ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 26th May (vide page 66) on motion by Mr. L. E. Groom—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia, in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the Speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—The leader of the Opposition has exhausted entirely the full measure of compliment that it is expedient or desirable for the Opposition to lavish upon the Government, and therefore I do not presume to add anything in that direction. Indeed, I do not know that I could conscientiously add very much, or suggest anything that could be construed as being of the nature of flattery. A cynical Frenchman once said that, provided meals were served regularly, and the trains ran to time, it did not very much signify under what form of government one lived. That was a philosophical view of the case that I should possibly entertain, but for the fact that it could hardly apply, even in the case of the cynical Frenchman, to the Barton Government. I think the gentleman referred to would have found that something better than that might be looked for, even though meals were served regularly and trains were punctual. The Prime Minister has made some kind of answer to the speech of the leader of the Opposition. He began by saying that, except as to the matter of the six hatters, my right honorable friend had touched upon no measures of the Government, past or present.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. I did not say that. I said that the right honorable gentleman did not find fault with the measures of legislation already passed, or those proposed for this session, and that his notice as to the results of legislation was confined to the case of the six hatters.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Well, if there was nothing whatever in the attack made by the leader of the Opposition, it seems extraordinary that the Prime Minister should have occupied two hours and a quarter in answering nothing—because that is the unfortunate position in which the Prime Minister finds himself. I shall now proceed to deal with some of the replies that the Prime Minister has made to the points raised by my right honorable friend. These points, according to the Prime Minister, were of no consequence; but I wish to point out that his answers were of no consequence, and were in some cases hardly in keeping with ordinary common sense. The Prime Minister found fault with the leader of the Opposition for having given three different reasons why the Judiciary Bill was not passed during last session, and according to him, these three reasons absolutely contradict each other. The first of these reasons, in the order in which the Prime Minister gave them, was that the Opposition had prevented the passing of the Bill because of the fear of the appointments being made in recess; the second was, that the Government neglected to push on with the measure; and the third was that the Government did not wish to pass the Bill because they could not spare Senator O'Connor from another place. If we only reverse the order of these reasons, we shall find that there is nothing contradictory in them. The Government did not push on with the Bill primarily, because they did not wish to lose Senator O'Connor. Having thus neglected to push on with it, they brought it to the end of the session, when the sense of the Opposition, as expressed by its leader, was that it was undesirable that the Bill should be passed at that particular time, so that the appointments would be made during the recess, when the eyes and the voice of Parliament could not be brought to bear upon them. A fourth reason might have been adduced by the leader of the Opposition had he thought of it, namely, that the Government did not push the Bill through because they had very serious apprehensions as to whether they would succeed. Now, the Prime Minister was charged by the leader of the Opposition with having, whilst in Tasmania, made certain statements about him which were wholly untrue. That is the briefest way of putting it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The point, also.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Yes, the politest ; because true politeness consists in expressing in parliamentary language exactly what one means. One of these charges was that the Prime Minister had declared that the right honorable and learned member for East Sydney and his party combined with the labor party to procure the defeat of the tea and kerosene duties, to the great loss of Tasmania. This is how the Prime Minister is quoted in a Tasmanian paper :—

The party of which Mr. Reid was the leader, who was always accusing him of being under the thumb of the labour party, absolutely combined with that party to take off the duties on tea and kerosene, which for Tasmania were the most necessary in the Tariff.

Of course, all through the speeches made in Tasmania, there was a strong bid for the Tasmanian vote, and that bid is being made from the Tasmanian platform to-day—it is to be made to-morrow even. As a matter of fact, as the leader of the Opposition has explained, when the tea and kerosene duties were before the House, he was not present, and he was no party whatever to the debate or to the division which took place. As a fact, the tea duty was thrown out, not as a consequence of the votes cast against it by the Opposition, but because of the defection of eight of the Government supporters.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The right honorable member for East Sydney was paired against the Government.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Yes ; but that does not affect the statement that Mr. Reid acted in combination with the labour party, because he was never in combination or in conference with them on the subject. When it is said that the rejection of the tea duty was the work of the Opposition, it may be pointed out that twelve members of the Opposition voted with the Government for the retention of the duty, and I do not think, therefore, that it can be fairly charged against the Opposition that they were the cause of the duty being thrown out. A large number of members of the Opposition voted in favour of the duty.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The majority of the Opposition voted with the Government.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. — Yes. The majority of those present. Surely it was incumbent upon the Treasurer, who knew how important this duty was to one of the States, to do what he could to secure the support of his own followers in having it recommitted. There was another point as to which the leader of the Opposition was misrepresented in Tasmania by the Prime Minister, and as to which the Prime Minister has offered no answer whatever. I refer to the statement that the leader of the Opposition and the free-trade party desired to force direct taxation upon the States. I have here a report of what occurred at the Devonport meeting. The Prime Minister, having made this statement, Mr. John Henry asked—

Will you quote where the free-traders say that ?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have no quotations with me, but I believe I have heard Mr. G. H. Reid say so.

That is all. "I believe I have heard Mr. G. H. Reid say so." Sir Philip Fysh said—

Sir William McMillan had said that they would require to raise £2,000,000 by direct taxation.

That is an old figment which was thoroughly swept away by the honorable member for Wentworth two years ago. "At any rate," said Mr. Barton, "I am not in the habit of making incorrect statements." But the statement to which I have drawn attention was an incorrect one. Whether it is the habit of the Prime Minister to make such statements I do not know. I do not think it is.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I should have to change from my side of the House if it were.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—However, the fact remains that the statement which the Prime Minister made was an utterly incorrect one, and the right honorable gentleman, when questioned in regard to it, could only say that "he thought he had heard Mr. G. H. Reid say so." In replying to the leader of the Opposition yesterday the Prime Minister pointed out, with considerable emphasis, the importance of this particular measure to Tasmania. Tasmania, he said, now obtains very much less revenue from customs than she did under her old State Tariff. That is so. She obtains a great deal less owing to the very low excise duties upon tobacco and spirits, the absence of any excise whatever upon wine, and the high duty imposed upon made-up woollen goods. Upon the last-named class of goods alone Tasmania has sustained a loss of £30,000 per annum, a loss which is far greater than that occasioned by the remission of the tea duty, which the Prime Minister stated was so precious to the people of that State. The right honorable gentleman also charged the leader of the Opposition with having entered into an unholy combination with some mysterious body which desired to secure the introduction of cheap labour by opposition to the passage of the Immigration Restriction Bill—a statement which is absolutely opposed to facts and to common sense. What is the unholy combination into which the leader of the Opposition entered for the purpose of carrying out the scheme suggested? With whom did he make the combination? Those who voted for the Act in its present form included the members of the labour party and all save six members of the Opposition. Are they the special representatives of capital? I was one of the six who voted with the Government for the Bill in its original form, because I held that I was pledged by my utterances in London in 1897, when the matter was being discussed with the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I agreed then that we should legislate on the lines of the Natal Act, and upon my return to Tasmania I introduced and passed through the State Parliament a measure framed upon those lines. Accordingly, it was only consistent that I should take the same stand last session. That, however, does not justify the charge made against the leader of the Opposition of entering into an unholy combination in an endeavour to defeat the passage of the Immigration Restriction Bill. What did he do? He endeavoured to make that measure effect what it was intended to accomplish according to all the opinions expressed throughout Australia. He endeavoured to introduce the colour line in order to secure a white Australia by a straight-out policy of exclusion.

MR. REID.—“A white Australia” is an expression to trade upon.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—Of course there is a cry for a white Australia, and it is only reasonable to insist that we should have that term clearly defined by providing a test which will exclude all coloured aliens. Regarding that measure it seems a little extraordinary that whereas on 10th May, 1901—the day after the opening of Parliament—Senator O'Connor made a mistake in saying that the colour line would be applicable to all coloured aliens except British subjects, to whom an educational test would be applied, and that the Bill had already been drafted and presumably discussed by the Cabinet, that remark—a remark of the most striking character—escaped the attention of the Prime Minister until a day or two ago. This seems to indicate that the method of drafting a Bill of that great importance was, at any rate, a very haphazard one, which does not reflect particular credit upon the administrative capacity of the Government. The Bill was amended in committee at the instance of the honorable member for Bland, and as a result of that amendment the notorious case of the six hatters has arisen. I maintain that both this House and the Senate were clearly led to understand that the amendment—qualified as it was by other portions of the Bill—could not be interpreted as it has been since.

MR. WATSON.—The Opposition are very innocent.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—The honorable member for Bland is one of the innocent, unless, indeed, he be deeper in craft than I have hitherto assumed him to be.

MR. WATSON.—I think they all understood what was meant.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—I certainly did not understand what it now appears was intended. If we consult Hansard we shall find that, in the debate upon the measure in question, the honorable member for Kooyong said—

But I have had a knowledge of the necessity of introducing considerable numbers of men for particular industries, because they have had special training and experience.

The Attorney-General here injected—

That is provided for.

The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said—

There is no desire to exclude men who voluntarily seek to make their homes here.

MR. BATCHELOR.—As free men.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—I suppose that they come to Australia voluntarily if they come under an agreement. They might not come voluntarily if they did not come under an agreement. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said—

There is no desire to exclude men who voluntarily seek to make their homes here for the purpose of engaging in manual labour or anything else, so long as they belong to civilized white races, and are themselves desirable immigrants. As I understand it, we have never in Australia taken up that narrow view of saying that we must keep Australia for ourselves and our children.

Mr. WATSON.—Oh no.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is well that that should be generally understood.

What happened in the Senate? Senator Sargood said—

Such a paragraph as this is, so far as I know, contrary to the wishes of the general public.

It will allow the Minister to stifle industries that may require the importation of specially-skilled men, and the consequence will be that capital which might profitably be employed in developing industries will be unable to be so utilized.

In replying to that contention, the Postmaster-General said—

There is a special exemption for skilled men, so that the honorable senator has no ground to stand upon in his objection to the paragraph.

The doubts and fears of members of both Houses were thus lulled to rest, and a section was passed which has been interpreted by the Prime Minister, who declared that he had no discretion in the matter, in a way that is calculated to prove most disastrous to Australia. Some honorable members may regard this as a matter of little moment; but let them recall what has already been its effect, and let them imagine what it is calculated to be if the law be allowed to remain upon the statute-book in its present form. We have heard some expressions of opinion concerning this legislation both in England and out here. From England the Agent-General for New South Wales found it incumbent upon him to cable to his Government that the effect of the exclusion of the six hatters had been to damage the credit of Australia in the English money market. That is not an unreasonable result. The Prime Minister has stated that the despatch of the cable in question was the result of promptings from Australia—the outcome of some conspiracy, I do not know what, and on the part of some conspirator, I do not know who.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I hope that our credit is too strong for that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Our credit is not so good that it cannot be destroyed if we defy the Imperial sentiment and out-range our association with the mother country and the Empire by actions such as that.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But the six hatters are not Imperial sentiment.

Mr. REID.—There have been many wars concerning the rights of one Englishman.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—To my mind there is an object lesson in the way in which the Act has been interpreted. The Prime Minister states that he made due inquiry into the case of the six hatters, and that, after satisfying himself that they were experts in their business, he allowed them to enter the Commonwealth. Is the right honorable gentleman to satisfy himself that everybody who is imported under an agreement is an expert in this, that, or some other branch of industry in which his manual labour may be required? If I desired to enjoy good living, and accordingly imported a trained cook, possibly the Prime Minister might be able to express an opinion as to his qualifications—after trial. But all through the range of employments, who is to be the judge whether a man imported by a vigneron, a manufacturer, or a manufacturing interest, or by an individual for his own particular service, is an expert: whom we may admit under this Act?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The statute makes the Minister the judge, but the Minister, like every other judge, will have to go by evidence.

Mr. REID.—What a nice occupation for the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—How would the Prime Minister set about obtaining evidence as to an imported cook? It was clearly incumbent on the Government to as little as possible outrage the sentiment of any State. And what has passed in the Legislative Assembly in Sydney is in itself a very severe stigma upon the Government. I find that the Premier of that State, Sir John See, who is not particularly in alliance with the leader of the Federal Opposition, expressed the opinion at a very early stage of the contretemps that the Federal Government was entirely in the wrong in preventing the hatters from landing. In his place in Parliament, Sir John See said that if he acted from personal feeling he would be prepared to break the law even if he had to go to gaol. That is not a nice thing to have said of the Federal Legislature by the Premier of the mother State. Mr. Hawken, a member of the New South Wales Legislative Council, said that this was a matter in which every true Britisher would feel indignation such as it was almost impossible to express. Mr. Hawken further said it was difficult to imagine that, in a place like Australia, with our liberal legislation, six Englishmen, who were as much denizens of the Empire as were the members of that House themselves, should be prevented by a federal law, passed without the knowledge of the people, from landing. Mr. B. R. Wise, the New South Wales Attorney-General, who is no special ally of the leader of the Federal Opposition, said he was sure every member of the New South Wales Legislative Council must sympathize with the sentiments expressed by Mr. Hawken. Mr. Wise admitted the sentiment that was properly entertained by members of the House; but he appealed to honorable members not to bring forward in that Chamber a matter over which as a Parliament they had no control, and with which they had no concern.

Mr. MAUGER.—And he might have added that it was a matter about which they knew very little.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Of course Mr. B. R. Wise would not pretend to know as much about this matter, or perhaps any other matter, as the honorable member for Melbourne Ports; but still that was the view which Mr. Wise took, and it was a view largely taken in England. On this latter point, the honorable member for Wentworth will no doubt be able to give us some information. It is a view natural enough, surely, in a case in which six of our fellow Britishers, our fellow countrymen, free men and unionists—

Mr. WATSON.—Not free men.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Yes, free men.

Mr. WATSON.—No; bond slaves.

Mr. REID.—Then no workman is a free man who is under a contract.

Mr. WATSON.—In this case the men were bond slaves.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Does a man sacrifice his freedom when he agrees to take a certain wage for a certain work?

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly he does.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Then we are none of us free men.

Mr. WATSON.—Very likely we are not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—How can the honorable member for Bland speak about free men when he is himself paid under a contract?

Mr. WATSON.—I can retire at any moment.

Mr. REID.—So can these men, because the contract ceases to be in force.

Mr. WATSON.—Excuse me, that is not so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The only extenuating plea I have heard for this policy is that there is a similar enactment in America. But the Americans do not exclude Americans; they exclude aliens.

Mr. WATSON.—The Canadians exclude Britishers.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—We exclude fellow Britishers.

Mr. WATSON.—So do the Canadians.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Will the honorable member for Bland suffer a few moments in patience. The point is that America carries out this policy with justification possibly, because she excludes, not fellow countrymen, but people who do not belong to her. But, in spite of the fact that America has over 80,000,000 of people, the immigration to the United States to-day is hundreds of thousands in the year, and it is admitted that, but for this immigration, the naturalized and born Americans would, in the course of some years, deteriorate to a very considerable extent. The influx of new blood in America is a physiological necessity, owing to the climate of a great part of the country, as it will be found to be a physiological necessity in Australia, where we try to shut out immigration. Is Australia fully populated? Have we the number of citizens within the Commonwealth we ought to have to push our industries and develop all our wonderful resources? Ought we to suffer any law to remain on our statute-book that excludes any immigrant who is a desirable man to have amongst us? I think not. I suppose the Prime Minister referred to me when he spoke of the duty on potatoes and oats being maintained on a high principle. There is something in that reference, and I did say something to that effect, and I did so advisedly. I was apologizing to my audience for what might appear to be a lapse from the path of the free-trader, the audience being free-traders for the most part; and my explanation was, I think, thoroughly justifiable. I said that seeing that Tasmania made large sacrifices to enter the Commonwealth, and to purchase her way into the five ports of Australia, New Zealand, which had every opportunity of coming in, and which was courted and entreated to come in, should not, as a matter of justice, have the same rights as Tasmania. That was not because Tasmania imports one bushel of oats or one ton of potatoes from New Zealand, or is ever likely to do so.

When I was Premier of Tasmania I proposed to strike the duties off potatoes, oats, and cereals of all sorts, for the very simple reason that the duties were there for no particular purpose, inasmuch as we collected no revenue in the absence of any importation. But when it became a question of our being federated, and making considerable sacrifices for federation, then I thought it right and fair that, so long as New Zealand stood out, that colony should not have accorded to it all the privileges that Tasmania had bought. We have lately had an invasion of Tasmania by Ministers. We have had the Prime Minister, and also the Secretary for Home Affairs—the latter of whom is going over again—and we have the honorary Minister, Sir Philip Fysh, there now. Sir Philip Fysh has to address a meeting in Launceston to-morrow; that is his parliamentary business at the present time. If one were an evil-minded critic it might be supposed that Sir Philip Fysh was there, and that his colleagues had gone there, in view of the impending elections; but if so, I think they are very much wasting their time. I do not think that their being there will have any particular effect on the electors of Tasmania, or banish from their minds the bitterly hostile feeling that Ministers engendered early in their career. The Prime Minister yesterday spoke about my unkindness towards my ex-colleague, the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh. There is no unkindness of mine; the unkindness is that of the Government in having placed the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh, in the position in which he now finds himself. Ministers went to Tasmania and said—"We are the men who want to secure to you a proper revenue from the customs and to save you from an income tax." The income tax at the time was very unpopular in Tasmania, and Ministers played on that fact when they said—"Do not listen to the Opposition, who will force an income tax on you; listen to us, who will save you from it." That is a good card to play if only the Government do not get found out, and the people do not discover that the cards are marked. I have no feeling of hostility towards the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh. He was my colleague; and I hope I was loyal to him so long as he and I were of the same political complexion. The honorable member was a free-trader, and I was a free-trader; but after 65 years' experience he has become a protectionist. It is said that a man who never changes his mind is a fool, but a man who goes on for 65 years a fool in being of any political complexion, and then changes his mind so late in the day, does no good for himself. I want to show how extremely false is the position in which the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh, has been placed. The other day at Hobart, speaking after the Prime Minister, and echoing what had fallen from the right honorable gentleman, he said—

This high Tariff is therefore a revenue Tariff, and not a destructive Tariff. Boots and hats would yield a little more at 10 per cent., but in connexion with almost everything else, I am in a position to say that the duties are not destructive, even if they do enable the manufacturers of these States to supply a certain number of Australian people. It is not a fact that a lower Tariff produces more revenue. When Mr. Reid says that he will secure the same amount of revenue from a lower Tariff, I say that he does not know what he is talking about.

That is the honorable gentleman as a protectionist, who, while he says that low duties do not secure a larger amount of revenue than high duties, tells his audience in almost the same breath that if the duties upon boots and hats had been reduced from 30 to 10 per cent. they would have yielded a greater return. He goes on to say—

So far as Tasmania is concerned, I will tell you this: That I strove to get the highest Tariff I possibly could, because I wanted to save you from direct taxation. There was give and take on both sides, and we secured a Tariff which is about as reasonable as we can expect. You have no business to pay a higher Tariff.

I ask honorable members to mark that statement. No doubt the electors of Tasmania will do so. Although he told them that they had no business to pay a higher Tariff, he again and again voted during the consideration of the Tariff for duties much higher than those which were agreed to. The Tariff which is now in force is not the Tariff which was brought down by the Government. It bears only a very faint likeness to it, and is incomparably superior to it, in that it is infinitely more moderate.

Mr. REID.—It bears the same relation to it as a half-caste bears to a blackfellow.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. — I will now ask the House to listen to what the honorable member, Sir Philip Fysh, said—with my complete concurrence, and knowing that I should indorse every word he uttered—when Treasurer of my Administration in 1897-8. In a Budget speech which he delivered upon 14th October, 1897, he said—

In 1882 ad valorem duties of 10 per cent. and minimum specific duties, added to a beer duty of 3d. per gallon, produced on a population of 102,834, a revenue of £302,954. In 1896 a maximum ad valorem duty of 20 per cent., and maximum specific duties, plus 4d. excise on beer, produced on a population of 166,113, £347,925. The difference is £44,971. The increase of population, without any increase of duty should, and probably would, have yielded £113,523. If that can be fairly assumed, then the increased Tariff is a loss and not a gain to the revenue. Can any facts more forcibly convince that our Tariff is baneful to the people without securing the revenue intended?

In his next Budget speech he said—

We admit that our experience of high Tariffs is that they too often defeat their primary object, and revenue is not gained.

That is a fairly explicit statement in favour of low duties. Now, as to direct taxation. Speaking in 1897, the honorable gentleman said—

In 1882 Parliament was influenced to give relief to the taxpayer through the Customs, which the Treasurer of the day said then bore the relation of 70 per cent. to the total taxation of the country. I find that it was nearer 81 per cent., and I believe that policy of relief to be sound in principle. In 1896 the relation is nearly 75 per cent., and in 1897 it will be much higher. That policy of 1882 was directed on principles which called to the aid of the revenue the land tax and the dividend tax of 1880. It finds its origin in the policy of the British House of Commons, and if we are unable to adopt the Imperial fiscal policy in its entirety, we may accept it as a guide in regard to general principles. The Parliament of 1882 and 1892 accepted the necessities and equities of these proposals, and the people have been loyal to the compact. Yet a cry of repeal rises from the few who pay income tax, in disregard of the many who bear without a murmur all the other extra burdens I have named. The total repeal of the income tax would be a sin against the people, a breach of the canons of political economy, and a repudiation of an equitable adjustment to which all classes of the taxpayers have been parties.

In conclusion, he said—

Necessity and a statesmanlike policy of fiscal reform alike brought into existence the income tax.

I am showing what a complete change of front in regard to direct taxation by means of income tax there has been on the part of the honorable gentleman. We can all take the opportunity now afforded us to point out the grievances, more or less heavy, from which the people suffer as a consequence of maladministration. If I thought there was any hope of improvement I would once more urge the absolute necessity for a larger measure of economy in administration than is now apparent. Here is one instance which to my mind shows utterly uncalled-for expenditure—the appointment of an Inspector-General of Works at a salary of £1,000 a year, and of six assistants at a salary of £600 a year each—a total yearly expenditure of £4,600 upon officers whose duties for a considerable time to come might very well have been performed by public servants of the States for a mere trifle in comparison with the sum I have named.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That statement is not correct. The charges made by the Governments of the States exceed by many times the amount the right honorable gentleman has named.

Mr. REID.—That is due to mismanagement. The Minister could have come to better terms.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Does the Minister say that he could not make an arrangement with the States?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. It was not possible.

Mr. REID.—Any other man in the position could have done so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I think that any one else could have done so, and that it would have been an exceedingly simple matter to arrange, inasmuch as in the services of the States there are men who are fully competent to do the work, and who are more familiar with the buildings which have to be attended to, and the requirements of our service, than a newly-appointed staff can be. A man who could not make a more economical arrangement with the States has no right to be a Minister. Then there are little pinpricks of administration which might very well be removed by the exercise of more consideration and expedition. I have two complaints which I specially desire to bring under the notice of the Minister for Trade and Customs. One is in regard to the extravagant bonding rents which are now exacted, and which have been heavily increased since federation; and the second is in regard to the delay which exists in getting complaints heard. The Minister is expedition itself in seizing upon all he can lay hold of to obtain revenue, and I applaud him for his vigilance, where it has been properly directed, and for his determination that all revenue actually due should be collected.

But, even as to that, I think there are ways of doing things strictly which would not have brought him into so much antagonism with the people of the country. He must know how bitter the feeling is throughout the trading world in regard to the administration of the Customs department.

MR. KINGSTON.—I have not found such a feeling to exist.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—Then the right honorable gentleman has not looked far for a manifestation of it. There is considerable delay in obtaining replies to communications pointing out cases calling for redress. I do not complain about the Minister being quick to collect duty where it ought to be collected; but I think that he should be quicker in refunding duties which ought not to have been collected. I brought such a case under his notice many weeks ago, but, up to the present time, I have received no sort of answer to my letter. I was a little amused the other day to see how the Minister held himself up for public admiration as the Customs Minister who has received more conscience money than any other. I did not know that there was so much childlike and bland innocence in his composition. He appears not to see that, even if the fact is as stated, he does not receive all the revenue which might be expected. If a merchant make a mistake in his entries now, he dare not own up to it. If he is an ultra-honest man, he has to send an anonymous letter to the Commissioner.

MR. KINGSTON.—That is not a fact.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—How can the Minister know that it is not a fact that conscience money is sent in under these circumstances?

MR. KINGSTON.—What I mean is that if a man points out a slip that would otherwise pass our notice, he is certainly not punishable for it.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—A good many persons have had a contrary experience.

MR. KINGSTON.—No; they have not, although it has been so stated for political purposes.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—I am not making these statements for any political purpose, but I am pointing out what is a popular belief, namely, that it is dangerous to point out mistakes in entries, because those mistakes are seized upon by the Customs authorities, and fines are inflicted.

MR. KINGSTON.—That is a pious belief that is wrongly entertained.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—What I have stated is laid down in the Customs Act as it is administered.

MR. KINGSTON.—There is nothing of the kind in the Act.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—It seems to me that the Minister does not know the Act which he has to administer. I wish to direct attention to one or two matters relating to the Post and Telegraph department, which I presume is represented here to-day by the Prime Minister. Although these are small matters they should be remedied as soon as possible. In the first place, a surcharge of 1d. is now made upon letters which are posted in trains. In civilized countries which have developed their Postal departments to the fullest extent the trains afford the principal means of distribution, and the common practice is to post letters in trains, have them sorted on the journey, and delivered at their several destinations along the road. This surcharge of 1d. has been imposed upon letters posted in trains which are, therefore, now subject to a postage rate of 3d. I also wish to call attention to the rate for the delivery of private mail bags. These bags had previously been treated as private letter-boxes, and recently the fee charged has been increased for no apparent reason, except that it will probably offer some inducement to people who now have private mail bags to discontinue them, and thus cause loss to the revenue. In Launceston there is no delivery of letters received by the Inter-State mails arriving at that place on Saturday at noon until the following Monday. This may involve very considerable trouble and anxiety to people other than those who can afford to have their private letter-boxes. Letters addressed to private individuals are, as a whole, of greater immediate concern than are business communications, and I am glad to be informed that the Postmaster-General has the matter under his consideration. I should like to say a few words with regard to the Speech from the Throne. It states—

You will be asked to establish by statute a uniform defence system for Australia.

One cannot help thinking how strange, to say the least, it is that for two years and more we should have been conducting our defence affairs without any Act whatever to sanction the existence of our forces, or to enable them to be dealt with by law in cases of emergency.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The trouble has been the other way. We have six Acts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I thought that uniformity was desired.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—So it is.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I understood that the Government desired to pass a Defence Act that would enable our forces in all the States to act together.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—So we do.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—At present we have no legislation which will enable a defence force in one State to be called upon to act in another.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is a very good reason why the right honorable member should support us in passing the proposed Bill.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I am not talking about reasons for supporting the Government. I did support the Government when the last Bill was introduced, but what is the use of supporting those who do not support themselves. I supported the tea duty proposed by the Government, but what did they do—they blocked it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Because the right honorable member's friends of the Opposition took such a course that the duty was knocked out.

Mr. REID.—The duty was defeated because some of the Government followers voted against it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Opposition had more support from our side than we obtained from theirs.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The Government had the support of twelve Oppositionists compared to ten who voted against the duty, and there is no reason, therefore, why it should be stated that the Opposition knocked out the Government proposal.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We cannot control the members of the Opposition.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The Government cannot control their own supporters.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Opposition cannot control theirs.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The leader of the Opposition was not present in the House on the occasion referred to.

Mr. REID.—No, I was trying to do something better.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I hope that we shall not see any repetition of the blunders committed by the Government in connexion with previous Defence Estimates. The Estimates first brought down were, upon a motion tabled by myself, reduced by £131,000. It was originally proposed that they should be reduced by £1, as an indication of the feeling of the House that the total expenditure upon defences should be curtailed by £200,000; but Ministers compromised matters and promised to effect reductions amounting to at least £131,000. Honorable members, however, did not listen to the promise of Ministers who have the confidence of the House to such a full extent, and divided on the motion, which was carried. Ministers did not occupy a dignified position when their plighted word was put aside, and a division was taken in order to embody the feeling of the House in a mandate. The next Estimates which were brought down were reduced by £131,000, and the honorable member for Bland, a potent factor in the House, moved their further reduction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Estimates were reduced by £175,000 in the first instance, and then by £62,000 afterwards.

Mr. WATSON.—The House passed the motion proposed by the honorable member reducing the Estimates by £131,000, and the Government made a further reduction of £40,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then the House followed that with a further reduction of the next Estimates by £60,000.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I cannot congratulate Ministers upon such episodes. The honorable member for Bland said he wanted the Estimates reduced, and the Minister for Defence being away, the Minister for Home Affairs consented. Apparently the expenditure was further reduced after that compliance with the demand of the leader of the labour party. What kind of Estimates were they in the first instance? Upon what were they based? How was it that Ministers accepted the proposal of the honorable member for Bland—even admitting the potent influence he has with them—without saying anything about the effect the reduction would have upon the efficiency of the defence forces or anything else. By their conduct they admitted one of two things: either that their Estimates were in excess of actual requirements, or that they accepted votes for less than the amount sufficient to maintain the defence forces in a state of efficiency. I notice from the Governor-General's speech that we are to have a bonus in connexion with the sugar industry. The Minister for Customs has had some experience of bonuses, and, no doubt encouraged by this, wishes to extend the principle. The time is not yet ripe for discussing the proposal, but when it comes before the House and we know what it is, no doubt a good deal will be said about it. A great deal will have to be said to some of us to induce us to cast our votes in its favour. Then there is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which tells us that—

The urgency of questions of domestic importance prevents Ministers from asking you to give immediate consideration to the question of preferential trade.

Oh ! that unfortunate preferential trade—how it has suffered. We have always had it dangled before us. It was fully understood that it was to have been brought before the House and decided this session, but now we are told that something shuts it out from our present consideration. Cannot Ministers make up their minds six months before the actual work of the session commences? If they believe in preferential trade, as we have been led to understand, could they not have been ready to bring down some measure to give effect to it? No, they could not do this, although we are told that—

My advisers observe with gratification the recent utterances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies advocating the encouragement of trade relations between the various parts of the Empire.

I hope that none of us will feel any gratification at these utterances, if they can be construed into anything like what Ministers think they mean. I trust that we shall withhold our opinion until we have the whole context of what has passed, and know what the Secretary of State for the Colonies had in his mind when he delivered the utterances referred to. It seems absolutely impossible—unbelievable—that England, which has prospered through all these years with her open ports and her free-trade, will go back upon that policy for the purpose of fomenting trade relations with any part of the world.

Mr. CONROY.—That is only a little political cheap-jack business.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. — Mr. Chamberlain is not a political cheap-jack. He is an eminently able statesman, who has seen England through one of the greatest crises which she has ever been called upon to face.

Mr. CONROY.—He is nothing like an able statesman now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. — The honorable and learned member cannot know yet what Mr. Chamberlain means, and I decline to believe that the man who has followed Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone in their fiscal policy will come down to protection. Does it look like it when at the very moment of these utterances, over which there has been so much chuckling, the English corn duties were repealed? If the free-trade position in England is to be yielded up, how is it that when the Government had secured the corn duties they did not hold on to them? I cannot believe that the nation will go back upon itself, not even for 50 statesmen of the calibre of the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain. We are told that we are to have a Navigation Bill, and I should like to know whether it is in print.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—A draft Bill is in print.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Is the Bill to be brought down to the House?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member can see for himself by reference to the speech.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I see that—

A number of other important measures are in preparation.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—That does not tell us that the Bill is coming down. We have heard that statement before. The Governor-General's speech continues—Amongst these is a Bill to provide a uniform navigation and shipping law.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Read on.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I think I have gone far enough.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The right honorable member will find at the end of the paragraph an intimation regarding the intentions of the Government in respect of that and other measures. It is there stated that probably we shall not have time to deal with a uniform Navigation and Shipping Bill this session, and as the first draft of it contains over 500 clauses, I think there is justification for the statement.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. — The cryptic utterances of this paragraph may mean anything. I suppose they do mean that we shall not see the Bill during the life of the present Parliament. I hope that when it is submitted it will not be in anything like the form which has been outlined by the public press. I trust that it will not contain an invasion of the rights of British steam-ship companies trading to these ports, which would be unjustifiable—which could hardly be justified by any process of reasoning whatever. It has been hinted that it will contain a provision declaring that the sailors of these vessels while in Australian waters shall be paid at the Australian rate of wages. What right have we to prescribe the rate of wage which these great shipping companies shall pay to their men? Their vessels enter our ports for a week, ten days, or a fortnight, but they do not belong to us, and are we to discourage them from coming here? To my mind, it is evident that we should encourage their presence as much as possible.

MR. TUDOR.—What would the right honorable member do if they remained trading upon our coast for months?

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—I would treat them exactly the same as if they remained here only for a week.

MR. TUDOR.—And if they remained for twelve months, I suppose the same treatment would be meted out to them?

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—The steamers of the P. and O. and Orient Companies are very likely to remain here twelve months at a time, are they not? The course suggested would not only be prejudicial to our interests, and constitute an interference on our part with the conduct of business by the great ocean-going steam-ship companies; but it would also be against the interests of the sailors who come here, and still more against those of our own seamen, who might count upon it as a fact that if such a provision were enacted there would be an influx of sailors to enjoy the higher wages in comparison with which the entry of the six hatters would be something utterly trivial and unimportant.

MR. MAUGER.—Our own sailors do not say so.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—They will say so by-and-by. We have had a brilliant example set to us by the mother country in regard to her navigation laws. There anything of this tyrannical or restrictive character has happily been abolished for the past 50 years, and I hope we are not going back to a system of barbarism which existed half-a-century ago, and which would be to so large a degree injurious to our own people and to our relations with the British Empire. Gratifying mention is made in the Vice-Regal speech to the State debts. We find that Ministers have not forgotten that there are State debts, and have even given consideration to the subject of taking them over. The speech states—

They will gladly take advantage of any opportunity that may offer of bringing these subjects before you, but they are not sanguine of being able to do so in the course of this session.

Here is a matter which has been a most urgently pressing one with the great bulk of the people of the different States ever since we federated. Indeed, one of the great reasons for federating was a desire that the State debts should be taken over by the Commonwealth together with the customs duties out of which the interest is paid. We have already been waiting for two years to witness some step made in this very desirable direction, and we are now told that Ministers have been considering it, but see no chance of doing anything in connexion with the matter during this session. Together with the consideration of the Bill to provide for old-age pensions, it has been relegated to the limbo of the past. It has been set aside for some indefinite period. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything about the selection of the federal capital. It is stated in the Governor-General's speech that we are to have information laid before us showing what the proposed capital sites really are, and, it is added, that it is expected the information which has been collected upon this subject will enable us to come to a satisfactory conclusion. Are we to arrive at a conclusion upon the matter this session?

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I hope so. Honorable members will be given every chance to arrive at a conclusion. An early opportunity will be afforded them of considering the report.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—But will it lead to business?

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—I am always in doubt as to whether the right honorable member means business. If he does, he will have an opportunity of transacting it in connexion with that report.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—I do mean business.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes ; business of a sort. The right honorable gentleman would rather make a malign attack than assist in the business of the country.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I have not made a malign attack.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have no objection, if the right honorable member does so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—But I have an objection. I do not desire to make such an attack—I leave that to the Prime Minister. I think I have said all that it is incumbent upon me to say, and I can only express the hope that we shall do business, and that at any rate some of these important matters for which the Commonwealth is waiting will see the light of day, and become the law of the land before the close of this Parliament.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I think the right honorable member who has just resumed his seat was a little unfair to his former colleague, Sir Philip Fysh, seeing that the latter is not present to defend himself. The right honorable member laboured very hard to prove inconsistency on the part of his colleague, inasmuch, as on some occasions, that gentleman declared that low duties produced more revenue than high duties, whilst on others he contended that high duties were the more productive. When we accuse our friends of inconsistency, I think it is unfortunate for us that there is such an institution as Hansard, in which all our own sins are recorded. I have in my hand a copy of the Hansard of last session in which is reported a very able speech upon the fiscal question by my right honorable friend, in the course of which he told the House—indeed, during almost the whole of the session he contended that low duties were more productive of revenue than high duties—that the Government of which he was Premier increased the duties under the Tasmanian Tariff from 12½ per cent. to 20 per cent. for the express purpose of obtaining more revenue on account of the straightened condition of the finances. However, these are little lapses to which I suppose we are all more or less liable. When we are engaged in the very important work of laying the foundations of a new nation, it is most desirable that we should tread cautiously, in order that we may make no serious mistakes. I think, if we discover that we have made any mistakes, we should rectify them as soon as possible, in order that the nation we are endeavouring to build up may rest on a sound and solid foundation. It is not my intention to enter into anything like a general review of our past work, but there are one or two matters to which I wish briefly to refer, because I feel very strongly in connexion with them, and therefore—however unpopular my views may be with perhaps the majority of honorable members—it is my duty to express them fearlessly, and I intend doing so. Before referring to past acts of administration, however, there is just one matter, which was referred to by the leader of the Opposition last night, and to which I desire to make a passing reference. It is in connexion with the Tariff. The Tariff was undoubtedly the most important work performed last session. It occupied, I think, about a year of continuous work on the part of this Parliament. The Tariff is exactly what a thoughtful man might have foreseen from the commencement. We had to reconcile and assimilate the Tariffs of six different States. The two largest of the States, New South Wales and Victoria, were at the extremes of Australian Tariffs, the former having a free-trade policy and the latter having the highest protective duties in the Commonwealth. The other States had all more or less protective duties ranging between the free-trade of New South Wales and the high protection of Victoria. What was more natural than that the Tariff should be a fair compromise between these two extremes ? I think any impartial judge will say that that is exactly what our Tariff is. It is a Tariff of very moderate duties which are protective in their incidence, but nothing like to the extent that prevailed in Victoria. If we had wrangled for another two years, the result would not, in my opinion, have been very different. This is not the time to refer to our fiscal views or to urge the merits of one fiscal policy or the other ; we are not now dealing with those views, and no arguments could have any effect. That being the case, we should all agree to give the present Tariff a full and fair trial ; and if we have faith in our fiscal views we should not be afraid. We can compare in New South Wales the effects of a moderate protectionist Tariff with the effects of a free-trade Tariff, while in Victoria we can compare the effects of lower protective duties with the effects of the higher duties in the former Tariff of that State. With that knowledge and experience, we should in the course of a few years have an excellent opportunity of framing a Tariff suited to the permanent requirements of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID.—It would be the same old cry after three years—"Do not disturb these infantile industries."

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I may be wrong, but those are my views. No one in this chamber respects the leader of the Opposition more highly than I do, and I am very sorry that he is determined to plunge the Commonwealth into another Tariff struggle. That would be done without any information other than we have at present, and it would only mean the disarrangement and paralysis of Australian trade, commerce, and manufactures for another two or three years. I venture to say that Australia is not in a position to stand anything of the kind. We have suffered sufficiently from the disarrangement of trade in the last year or two, and also from the effects of the disastrous drought. I sincerely hope that the leader of the Opposition will reconsider this matter. I venture to say that almost every person who has the interests of the Commonwealth at heart, whether he favours a free-trade or a protectionist policy, will agree that we ought to have a little commercial rest for a time, and give the present Tariff—although I admit it does not satisfy either party—a fair trial before attempting to disturb it. There was one other matter to which the leader of the Opposition referred, and about which I desire to say a word or two. I should be the last to say anything at this stage against the project which our friends from Western Australia have so much at heart—the Inter-State Railway. The leader of the Opposition last night urged the Government to proceed with a survey.

Mr. REID.—A trial survey.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—There has been a trial survey.

Mr. REID.—No; I ascertained that there had not been a trial survey. If there had been I should not have made the observation.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I have been told over and over again that the State Government of Western Australia have made a trial survey.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There has been a survey made by two engineers, Messrs. Muir and Stewart, who have reported to some extent in favour of the practicability of the line.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I hope that a full investigation may justify me in supporting this project, but at the present time the only salient features that stand out in connexion with it are that it is estimated to cost over £5,000,000 sterling; that the line runs for the greater portion of its length through a desert—though I am almost afraid to say so in the presence of the Minister for Defence—and that when completed it will have to compete with water carriage, which can almost always undercut railway carriage. Before we do anything in the way of committing the Commonwealth to the expenditure of £5,000,000—which is no trifling sum—we should have the fullest information that could be obtained. I listened very carefully to the Prime Minister last night, and I think I can say without flattery that I never heard him in better form. Most of the statements he made were extremely effective, and I agreed very largely with what he said. But as there are spots on the face of the sun, so I think there were some weak points in the Prime Minister's arguments. In referring to the case of the six hatters who were denied admission to the Commonwealth, until the intelligence had been cabled not only over the British Empire, but over the whole civilized world, the Prime Minister waxed indignant at any person attempting to criticise the Immigration Restriction Act. If the Prime Minister had confined himself to a defence of his own administration of the Act, he would have been on sound ground, but when he went on to defend the Act itself, he was on anything but a firm basis. I know that the Prime Minister did no more than administer the Act in accordance with its strict letter, and I am not one to evade my share of the responsibility as a private member for having permitted such an Act to get on the statute-book. But I say in extenuation that when this particular section was proposed by the honorable member for Bland, and accepted so readily by the Government, and when I asked the meaning of it, I was told that it was only intended to prevent an employer during the progress of an industrial dispute from adopting a means of terminating that dispute without regard to its merits. There was some semblance of justification for that—though I do not say that even such an object was absolutely right—and I did not see my way to offer any strenuous opposition if that was all that was intended. I fully believed, from what we had been previously told by several members of the Government, that the Act would be administered in that spirit. It will be remembered that when the Bill containing the education test for immigrants was under consideration, it was pointed out over and over again that the provision, if strictly enforced, would shut out, not only numbers of reputable Europeans who would make most excellent colonists, but might also shut out hundreds and thousands of British subjects. There are numbers of British subjects who could not pass an educational test, and who nevertheless might be industrious, reputable, honest people, and would make desirable colonists. When these facts were pointed out we were told over and over again that if this power were given to the Government they would undertake that it would be applied only in the case of coloured aliens or objectionable immigrants. With that assurance, I for one took it for granted that the Prime Minister would administer the provision in regard to contract labour in the same spirit, and that it would be resorted to only during the progress of an industrial dispute.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did not say that.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—No; the Prime Minister did not say that it would be only so applied.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—What I said was that I would not apply the education test to reputable Europeans.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—When the Prime Minister accepted the provision in regard to contract labour, I thought he would see his way to administer it in the same way as the provision for an educational test. Had I thought it would be used for the purpose of shutting out the most desirable class of immigrants that could possibly come to Australia, I should have opposed it to the very utmost of my power, and I believe a great number of honorable members would have done the same. The Prime Minister seemed very much surprised last night that Mr. Copeland, the Agent-General for New South Wales, had dared to say that the exclusion of the six hatters would affect our credit in the mother country. I must certainly express my surprise that it was necessary for the Prime Minister or any other member of the House to go to Mr. Copeland for that information, which was as patent as the noonday to every business man in Australia. What are the facts of the case? We know perfectly well, and every man whose opinion is worth having will tell us, that Australia can never become a prosperous nation without a large increase of our present population, and a very large expansion of our present industries. Where is the population to come from? We have already shut out aliens and objectionable immigrants of every kind, and I supported every measure to that end—not that I am afraid of a small sprinkling of industrious, frugal people such as we sometimes have amongst us, but because of our close proximity to the teeming millions of the East, by whom, unless we adopt drastic legislation of the kind, our continent might be overrun, and the question arise as to which race should dominate. I consider it was absolutely necessary in the interests of the future of Australia that we should go that far, and I did all I could to support measures with that object. But, having shut the door to every undesirable class of immigrant, surely it was our duty to open it all the more widely to every class of reputable immigrants who would be a desirable acquisition to our population. What did the Prime Minister tell us last night? He told us that free men from Great Britain are welcome, but that bondsmen are not welcome—that men who come under agreement are not welcome. I can only say I never heard a greater desecration—I never heard a greater prostitution of the terms, “bondsmen” and “free men,” than to assert that men who can get work and who will not leave work for which they are well qualified, unless assured of employment here, are bondsmen; while a member of the unemployed in England is quite welcome to leave the old world and to swell the ranks of the unemployed in the new world and perhaps become a burden on the people. That is a doctrine entirely new to me, and one which I think will never have my adhesion. I consider that the man who establishes a valuable industry in our midst, and who at his own expense brings out labour to make the industry a success, thus furnishing employment, is a public benefactor. At any rate such a man would be so regarded in any other country in the world except Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—Even if he is doing it to defeat local labour?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Do the friends of the honorable member adopt that policy themselves in their own affairs? When they want a professional agitator, do they take the local article, or do they bring a man from the old country and pay him £600 a year?

Mr. MAUGER.—The person to whom the honorable member refers did not make the contract under which he is working until he came here.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—A man would not be likely to come out here until he knew what he was likely to get for his services.

Mr. MAUGER.—He came out as a free man, and the contract was made after he reached Australia.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Is it any wonder that, in spite of our magnificent resources, we have only a small population scattered round the fringe of the coast line, and that that population, instead of increasing by leaps and bounds is, like Joshua's sun, standing still? I regret that I may appear to speak with some heat on this subject, but I feel very strongly upon it. I feel that we are making a serious blunder, and that if we persevere in it, as the Prime Minister said last night the Government intend to do, we shall strike a blow at the very root and foundation of our national life. Contrast our condition with that of Canada.

Mr. MAUGER.—Canada has the same law on the subject as we have.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The other day Canada received 1,800 immigrants as the result of public lectures which were delivered in the old world to induce them to go there. Here, however, we are placing every barrier in the way of an influx of population.

Mr. FISHER.—In what way?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—By doing all we can to shut out classes of people whom we should attract. We should offer every inducement to useful immigrants to settle amongst us. It will be a fatal blunder to build a Chinese wall round the continent, but that is what we are doing. And while we are trying to keep out our countrymen from the old world, we are taxing our own people to such an extent that we are driving them out of the Commonwealth. It is a very easy thing to keep out reputable immigrants who would like to come here, but we cannot compel our own people to remain if they are not content with their conditions. Therefore, we find that while there is very little immigration to Australia, our own people are leaving us by the thousand. What else could we expect from our manner of treating them? We are piling up taxation.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member helped to do that by supporting the Tariff introduced by the Government. He supported high duties whose effect must be to drive population out of the interior.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I did not help to place upon the people the burdens to which I am about to allude. We are driving people away by encumbering them with taxation which they should never have been asked to bear. Take two of the subjects referred to in the Governor-General's speech—the High Court Bill and the Inter-State Commission Bill. If those measures are passed, their administration will, when in full swing, cost the Commonwealth not less than £50,000 a year, and probably much more. Now, when the people of Australia were asked to enter into this union, the leading statesmen and writers on the press who advocated it told them that £300,000 a year would be the maximum cost incurred by federating.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Financial Committee of the Convention reported during the Adelaide Session that to put the Commonwealth into motion, with certain attributes which they provided for, would cost £300,000 a year, but it was not conceded by the advocates of federation that the cost of administration would afterwards increase.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Those whom I heard to advocate federation in Victoria asserted over and over again that £300,000 a year would be the high-water mark of the Commonwealth expenditure.

Mr. REID.—For some short time. For three years at least.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—We were told that over and over again.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is perfectly correct. The statement he has referred to was prepared to be placed before the electors.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I will show the House how the expense of the Commonwealth has grown. In the first six months after the inauguration of federation, the expenditure by the department of the Minister for Home Affairs was £441, but during the financial year which began on the 1st July, 1901, it rose to £8,870, and during the first nine months of the present financial year it has been as much as £19,249. Those figures do not include the expense of Parliament, which for the first two years and three months of federation amounted to £291,078, which seems an extraordinarily large sum. I fail to see why the expenditure of the Department of Defence should have increased since the administration of the separate departments of the States was amalgamated under the Commonwealth. I admit that it was necessary to spend a large sum of money upon the celebrations consequent upon the Royal visit, but I find that in the first two years and three months of federation the total expenditure of the department has been increased by £83,292.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where did the honorable member get those figures?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—From the Treasury. They were supplied by the Under-Treasurer. For the first six months of federation the increased expenditure of the department was £44,147.

Mr. McCAY.—The bulk of that amount was spent in connexion with the Royal visit.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—A good deal of it was. During the financial year which commenced on the 1st July, 1901, the expenditure of the department was £24,433 more than under the administration of the States, and during the first nine months of the present financial year it was £14,712 in excess. I am not allowing for any saving in the cutting down of troops, because I take it that that could have been done equally well while the military were under the control of the Governments of the various States. The total additional expenditure of the Commonwealth last year, as shown by the Treasury figures, was £275,861. That was the expenditure for a full financial year, and I would rather deal with those figures than take the figures for the present financial year, which has not wholly expired. Those figures, however, do not show anything like the whole of the expenditure which the people have been called upon to meet. One Act alone—that which provides for the creation of a white Australia—and which I supported, but of which I think the people should know the cost, has led to the paying away in the shape of rebates for the last nine months of no less a sum than £61,266, which is at the rate of £81,688 per annum.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That period of nine months includes the season in which the cane is delivered at the mill, and the amount paid in rebates is consequently the total amount that will be required for the year.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I am willing to accept that correction, but I wish to point out that the expenditure must go on increasing. The Act does not provide for the total abolition of kanakas until 1906. Last year only a little over 30,000 tons of sugar were produced by white labour. But if we take the total production for the Commonwealth at 150,000 tons—

Mr. FISHER.—It is more than that.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It would be about 170,000 tons.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I accept those figures. That means that this Act alone will involve an expenditure of £340,000, or £40,000 more than the total outlay foreshadowed by the advocates of federation. In addition to that, we inserted one section in the Public Service Act relating to the payment of the minimum wage, which will also involve a heavy expenditure. That was distinctly an Act of the Federal Parliament, and I am not saying one word against it, but I am only showing what our legislation is costing the taxpayers. We have paid under this section during the last nine months £21,894, or at the rate of £28,658 a year, and this cause of expense, like the other to which I have referred, is in its infancy only. It is estimated by the Treasurer that it will cost very much more. Whilst referring to these matters I cannot refrain from saying a word or two about the department of my honorable friend the Attorney-General. I think that that stands out as a shining example to all others, owing to the small amount of expenditure incurred and the great amount of work performed by it. I think we shall all admit that the Attorney-General has been unremitting in his devotion to his work. We have known him to work until his health has become seriously impaired. The total cost of his department to the Commonwealth for two years and three months has been only £5,037. If the other departments were administered with anything like the same regard to economy, we possibly might not be afraid to launch out into expense such as will be involved in the establishment of the High Court or the Interstate Commission. What I desire to impress upon honorable members, however, is that the drought which has afflicted the Australian States, has decimated our flocks and herds, has injured our agricultural industry, and inflicted loss upon the Commonwealth to an extent which I would not attempt to estimate, but which we know will run into tens of millions. We know that the Commonwealth is now suffering a recovery from that drought. We hope that the drought is broken—there is every appearance of it—and if that be so we may rely upon the recuperative powers of the Commonwealth to bring us back to normal conditions in the course of three or four average good seasons. If we had recovered from the effects of the drought, I should not hesitate to sanction expenditure upon the establishment of the High Court, but at the present time I do not think we should be justified in incurring it. The Commonwealth is not in a position to stand any additional taxation at the present time, and I contend, moreover, that there is no pressing necessity for it. I know perfectly well that the Commonwealth Constitution provides for the creation of a High Court, and also for an Inter-State Commission, but the framers of that Constitution very wisely refrained from saying when these departments should be brought into existence, leaving it to the judgment and good sense of the Federal Parliament to act when the necessity arose. I submit that the necessity has not yet arisen. The Constitution gives us power to vest any of our present courts with federal jurisdiction, and if our courts were so invested, they could deal with questions such as have arisen up to the present as effectively in every way as could the High Court if it were created to-morrow. We know that we have the best talent available upon the Supreme Court benches of Australia. The Bar in every State has been carefully culled in order to find gentlemen to occupy seats upon the Supreme Court benches, and I have never known a gentleman who was selected as suitable refuse the offer of such a position in the State of Victoria. Could we reasonably expect it to be otherwise?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know of half-a-dozen cases in New South Wales.

Mr. CROUCH.—There have also been some in Victoria.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Perhaps they felt that they were not qualified for the positions. At any rate, I never knew any person selected for such a position in Victoria to refuse it.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is wrong so far as New South Wales is concerned.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—That may be. I speak subject to correction.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member is also wrong in regard to South Australia.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Perhaps so; but nothing like such large salaries are paid in South Australia as in Victoria and New South Wales, and I think my right honorable friend will admit that South Australia has no legal luminary better qualified to adorn the Bench than the present Chief Justice of that State. I think that he would be an ornament to the High Court if it were created to-morrow. A few years ago some of the gentlemen who are listening to me used to speak about Supreme Court Judges as if they were little deities. I always used to feel inclined to bow my head when I heard the Attorney-General speak with bated breath of the Judges of the Victorian Supreme Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They are excellent men for Victoria.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Yet if I understood my honorable friend aright, in that magnificent speech which he delivered last year—I do not think that I ever listened to a better or more able deliverance—he took a somewhat different view. When listening to that speech I could not help thinking that if my honorable friend had tried he could have thrown an attractive halo of romance around Hades itself. I understood him to say that the only objection to our present Judges was that if they were called upon to adjudicate between the Federal and the State Governments, they might be considered by the people of the Commonwealth to resemble the famous tower of Pisa—they might be regarded as leaning towards the Governments that paid them. I know that my honorable friend did not mean his remarks to be taken in that sense, but he did say that the Judges might be suspected of unconscious bias. If, however, that applies to the Judges of our Supreme Courts, will not the same objection hold good in the case of the Judges of the High Court, and will not the same people suffer in either case? The people of the States are the people of the Commonwealth, and the taxpayers of the States are the taxpayers of the Commonwealth ; therefore, it matters little whether the bias is to be found in the present courts or in the High Court. I have the highest confidence in our Judges, and I believe that no paltry considerations with regard to the paymaster who doles out the salaries contributed by the whole of the taxpayers will enter their minds. I do not think they will be so narrow-minded. There is no country on the face of the globe that is so well served by its judiciary as is ours. Moreover, no country pays such high salaries to its Judges. The United States, with 80,000,000 population, pay nearly one-third less than we do in Victoria, and the Canadian Judges are paid less than half the salaries received by ours. Therefore we may reasonably expect to be well served.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member does not refer to the total, but to the individual salaries ?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I mean that the salaries paid to individual Judges in the United States and Canada are lower to the extent I have mentioned than those paid by us.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes ; but they have three times as many Judges as we have.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—That would not affect the individual, and the class of men the salary would attract to the position. In view of all the facts I have mentioned, I have no hesitation in saying that there is no pressing necessity for heaping these additional burdens upon the people of the Commonwealth at the present time. The arguments which I have used with regard to the High Court will apply with equal force to the Inter-State Commission. That tribunal will no doubt be required in the course of time, but there is no pressing necessity for it, and in view of the degree to which the Commonwealth is suffering from the effects of the recent drought, it would be unjustifiable on our part to impose one shilling of taxation more than is absolutely necessary. Therefore I must continue to oppose these proposals, as contained in the Governor-General's speech.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). — I do not think that after the excellent speeches we have heard from the leader of the Opposition and others, it is necessary for me to contribute at any great length to a debate which is generally regarded as being devoid of practical result. We must acknowledge the excellence of the reply made by the Prime Minister, although he may not have succeeded in rebutting what was said by the leader of the Opposition. We can understand the desire of Ministers, who have had a free hand during the recess, to get to work at once, and to thus avoid listening to further criticism, but we must all recognise that a little wholesome criticism, in fact a strong remonstrance, such as we have heard from the honorable member for Gippsland, or, perhaps, a friendly suggestion from an honorable member situated like myself, may not be altogether thrown away upon gentlemen who have on all occasions shown themselves especially susceptible to the force of numbers and to the pressure of new ideas. I must congratulate the honorable member for Gippsland upon his honest speech. Any remarks which come from the honorable member are always characterized by considerable force—not only by force of character, but by real strength of eloquence. And on the present occasion he has shown that he does not consider himself too much bound by the ties of party allegiance to stand by the Government when he considers that the course they propose is open to strong exception. Although I had intended to refer to the extraordinary and irritating act of administration connected with the episode of the six hatters, I do not consider it necessary for me now to take up the time of the House, because I indorse everything that has been said by the honorable member for Gippsland. The honorable member referred to some extent to the speech of the leader of the Opposition, in which he is alleged to have stated that he intended, if possible, to effect a complete and radical change in the Tariff. I did not understand the speech of the right honorable gentleman as indicating that. No doubt if an opportunity arose for making a radical change in our fiscal system, such a reform would be acceptable to the free-traders, but the immediate policy for the coming election, as indicated by the leader of the Opposition, I understood to be the cleansing of the existing Tariff, the conversion of losing lines to revenue-producing imposts, and the alteration of the incidence of the Tariff, so that it should bear as lightly as possible upon the producers.

Mr. HUME COOK.—How can the issues be confined to those lines ?

Mr. GLYNN.—If opportunity arose, no doubt the right honorable gentleman would enter upon a radical revolution of the Tariff; but I understood him to indicate that where certain lines involved a loss to the revenue, they must be abolished; but where duties were too onerous, even from a moderate protectionist point of view, they should be reduced, and that, at all events, a stand should be made upon the whole question of oppressive and wasteful duties at this time rather than five or ten years hence, so that industries established under the Tariff may not in their opposition to revision rely upon the guarantee of acquiescence in their continuance, and so that we may not have to beat down vested interests created in large centres, such as Sydney, by the operation of inequitable imposts. It is fully understood that if protection is once allowed to develop in any country, it is hopeless to abolish it. I was also exceedingly glad to hear the remarks of the honorable member for Gippsland in reference to the establishment of the High Court. I have previously expressed the opinion—and I repeat it now—that the immediate creation of a High Court, manned by new Judges, is premature. I do not think that it is really required by our Constitution. It was absolutely necessary in connexion with the American Constitution, because there was no Privy Council to which to appeal for the reconciliation of the conflicting decisions of the States courts. In the next place, some of the States courts had, in confederal days, point-blank refused to carry out the federal laws.

Mr. REID.—Does the honorable and learned member think that the provision in the Constitution which enables us to refer matters to the State courts covers all the ground that is covered by the High Court, excepting that court as a court of appeal?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do. I think that the means I suggest will be all that is necessary for the next generation to reconcile the divergent decisions of the States courts. In pursuing the reference which I was making to America, I may mention that the Executive had complete control over the judiciaries of the several States. The Judges had a tenure of office in some cases at will, and in other cases from year to year, and as a necessary consequence the State courts really followed the trend of State politics, which for fifteen or twenty years was too often antipathetic to federal power. The dependence of the Judges upon the Executive impelled the federalists of America, in the very first session of Congress, to constitute a federal court. It goes without saying that no such necessity exists here. Our Judges hold their office during good behaviour, and, apart from that consideration, we have in the Privy Council one of the greatest tribunals that the world has ever seen, despite its occasional eccentricities—a tribunal which is free from all political bias, free from all preconception which political Judges must have as regards the construction which should be placed upon the Constitution—preconceptions it may be taken from the Convention in which some members who may be promoted to the bench were particularly active. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, who made a very good speech in opening the debate, referred to the small business which the Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to do during the first fifteen or twenty years of its existence. It is somewhat significant that between 1790 and 1801–2, there were only six constitutional cases decided by that tribunal. Of course, a good deal of other business came before it, but the decisions upon the particular matters which in Australia call for the creation of a High Court did not amount to more than six in the first twelve or thirteen years of the American Federation. As a matter of fact, during the period in which Chief Justice Marshall held office, namely, from 1803 to 1835, the constitutional appeals averaged only two each year. They amounted altogether to 62. Of course, I am dealing with the period referred to by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, who, on the question of business, took up a position which he thought strengthened the case for the establishment of the High Court, but which I think really militates against its creation. Some time ago I called for a report upon the number of appeals made to the Privy Council during the twenty years ended 1901. Honorable members may have seen that report, which was furnished last year. It showed that the total number of appeals during the period indicated was 223—an average of less than 12 a year. Our conditions of appeal to the Privy Council are almost identical with those which operate in the case of Canada. We have not abolished the appeal to the Privy Council. Had we done so, I should say that the High Court ought at once to be created. But we have to deal with circumstances as they are. The High Court of Australia, if established, will not, at its own option, be the court of final appeal except in very rare instances—perhaps once in fifteen or twenty years. It can only prevent an appeal when a question of constitutionality arises between States and the Federation. It is substantially true, therefore, that we have not abolished the appeal to the Privy Council, and that the High Court will still be only an intermediate court of appeal. In Canada, where the conditions are somewhat similar to those prevailing here, two-thirds of the appeals from the State courts go direct to the Privy Council. Owing to the respect in which that tribunal is held, and the greater expense of taking them into the Supreme Court, where there is no resident bar, and where the judges are actually compelled to reside, the bulk of the appeals go direct to the Privy Council. If honorable members care to look at the appeal cases, they will see that what I am stating is absolutely correct. If we establish the High Court, though there may be an average of twelve appeals a year—taking as a basis the experience of the last twenty years—probably not more than half of them will go to the High Court of Australia. I have already mentioned the number of constitutional cases which arose in America; and we must not expect that the States are going to be constantly wrangling as to moot points of constitutional law. If we allow that there will be only half-a-dozen appeal cases a year, I fail to see the necessity for creating the High Court immediately. The Bill introduced last year by the Attorney-General, in the very excellent speech to which everybody has referred in terms of admiration, proposed to create a very large original jurisdiction, which can be given only by centralization and by ousting the jurisdiction of the State courts in matters with which they are competent to deal. I do not wish, at this stage, to amplify the objections to the creation of the High Court, but I do think that they should give honorable members pause. We ought to bow to the prejudice—if one may be permitted to use that term—of the electors of Australia against the creation of huge machinery before the circumstances clearly justify the necessity for its creation.

Mr. REID.—The main point is that the public should have some tribunal to which they can appeal.

Mr. GLYNN.—I quite agree with the right honorable and learned member's reference, but if we were to vest original jurisdiction with the State courts, and use that highly respected and justly revered body, the Privy Council, for the purpose of correcting divergent decisions, all that is necessary during the first twenty years of our national existence would be accomplished, and we should effect a saving of £30,000 a year, according to the convention estimates, and possibly of £50,000. The Inter-State Commission Bill need never have been introduced if the Minister for Home Affairs had displayed a little energy in attempting to induce the Premiers to come to some arrangement in regard to competitive rates at the borders. I pressed this matter upon his attention last year, when he promised to endeavour to see if some such arrangement could not be arrived at. Later on he informed the House that the Premiers of New South Wales and Victoria had acknowledged the communications which had been forwarded to them, but that the Premier of South Australia had replied asking for further particulars. Letters were written by the Acting Prime Minister to the Premiers of the three States concerned, asking them to come to some arrangement similar to that which was entered into in 1895 for the voluntary abolition of these competitive rates. But, if the Acting Prime Minister had really wished that the States should do nothing, he could not have drafted a letter which was better adapted to attain that end than the one which he sent to South Australia. He practically accused that State of being the only sinner in the matter. The wording of the communication was so unhappy that the South Australian Premier had to ask in what respect that State had sinned, what were the particular rates objected to, and consequently the correspondence stopped, and nothing has been done since. I firmly believe, from what I know of the temper of South Australia and the apparent inclination of other States, that if an agreement similar to that which was entered into in 1895, for the abolition of these competitive rates, had been adopted, the matter might have been settled without the intervention of an Inter-State Commission. Besides, section 117 of the Constitution, which prevents discrimination between the States, makes the border rates absolutely unconstitutional. It requires only the act of the Executive to see that the provisions of the Constitution are carried out. I notice that the Government are now considering the question of taking over the State debts. Some of us strongly advocated the adoption of that course in the convention. It is only right that the primary liability as to the payment of interest on the debts should rest upon those who have the control of the Customs, which was the mainstay of the States' revenues. But I believe that if the debts are to be taken over, the power of the States to borrow further ought to cease. It is impossible to have seven different bodies dealing with the one set of assets. At the present time the States are mutually interested in each other's securities. All their assets are jointly taxable through the Federal Parliament, and it is ridiculous to have six States capable, without mutual control, of dealing with one set of assets, and the Commonwealth capable of imposing burdens upon the very same assets. The sooner we obtain the power of checking the States in their borrowing the better. The result also would be consolidation. Instead of having six or seven classes of debts, we should have one only, and greater solvency would arise from the fact that the money lender in the old country would at once be able to understand what Australian securities really were.

Mr. FISHER.—How does the honorable and learned member suggest that the borrowing of the States should be checked?

Mr. GLYNN.—I was about, with a certain amount of whispering humbleness, to make a suggestion to the Treasurer, not that there is much in it, but merely for consideration, and I do so because in the Federal Convention I suggested an amendment which was not gone on with, in the direction of taking away the power of the States to borrow. If a State with less than the average indebtedness of the States were allowed to demand a loan through the Federal Parliament, no harm would be done. If a State has been economical—if by the conversion of its debts and increase of population, the indebtedness per head is less than the present average of all the States—I should allow that State to borrow, as a right, through the Commonwealth. In Queensland I find that the indebtedness exceeds by £20 11s. 2d.

per head, the average indebtedness of the States, while in South Australia there is an excess of £19 5s. 6d. per head. Under the circumstances such States ought to show cause why an application for a loan through the Federation should be granted; because the other States, as I have already said, have an interest in the solvency of the two States.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But have not interest and other matters to be considered?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not wish to go into detail, but the honorable and learned member is quite right. When I mentioned the average indebtedness I ought to have said the true indebtedness, because terms and interest must be taken into account, and the true indebtedness is easily enough obtained by reducing all the loans on paper to one common denominator. Having got the true average relative indebtedness of the various States after eliminating differences of terms and rates of interest, a State, when its indebtedness exceeds the present average, ought not to be allowed to borrow as a matter of course. In Victoria the indebtedness is apparently under the average by the amount of £11 9s. 10d. per head, and under the circumstances Victoria ought to be allowed to borrow according to its own desire.

Mr. FISHER.—Then the honorable and learned member does not take assets into account.

Mr. GLYNN.—One cannot take everything into account. I am merely making a general suggestion; and, whilst various factors have to be taken into account, I do not desire to deal with particulars on an occasion like this. It may be, for instance, that the indebtedness of Victoria is higher than it appears. It has been said, though I do not know with what truth, that many of the municipal debts of Victoria are really State debts; that, however, is a matter on which I do not desire to say anything. These are minor matters of adjustment, and my only object at present is to indicate, possibly, some suggestion which may impose a check on State borrowing, and yet be satisfactory to the States. I very much regret that there is no reference in the speech to the question of river navigation, seeing that the Federation, as well as the States, has an interest in the much vexed and important question of the rivers. The Minister for Home Affairs, when questioned by the honorable member for North Sydney last year, in regard to non-interference with diversions in the rivers, stated—

It may be that no action can be taken until a law is passed dealing with navigation, or the High Court is established.

Apparently we are to have no law this session on the navigation question. There is a huge Bill of about 600 clauses, to consider which might occupy two years, and the greater part of which is probably borrowed from the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act; but the Government ought to have at once placed beyond doubt federal jurisdiction over the rivers by passing a short Navigation Act. Personally, I think we have jurisdiction without an Act, but on this point I remember that in the celebrated case of the Queen v. Keyne—the Franconia case—it was decided that though the civil and municipal jurisdiction of England, by the acquiescence of other nations, extended to the 3-mile limit, that jurisdiction was only effective for the purposes of belligerency—that it was dormant for other purposes, until an Act of Parliament, exercising it had been passed. Legal members of the House will remember that in that case, owing to no Act having exercised jurisdiction, the captain of the Norwegian vessel, who was arraigned for manslaughter through carelessness, outside low-water mark was acquitted, and that the year following, an Act was passed, exercising jurisdiction within the 3-mile limit. Following the analogy of that case, it is more than doubtful whether federal jurisdiction exists until an Act is passed; and that seemed to be the opinion of the Attorney-General, as expressed in the answer given through the Minister for Home Affairs. I again express my regret that, under the circumstances, nothing has been done by the Government. I would appeal, on the question of the rivers, to the good sense of Australian representatives. I am bound to refer to this matter shortly, because we have, as federal members, a direct duty and responsibility in connexion with the rivers, just as much as have the members of the States Legislatures. I hold it would be a poor outcome of the loud-voiced enthusiasm which led to federation being carried, if on the first occasion when an appeal is made to Australian sentiment and national spirit on such a question as that of the rivers, that spirit is found wanting. It is in matters of great difficulty, and not in matters of petty parochial politics, that real statesmanship is tested. Minor matters can be dealt with by men of moderate intelligence and a little luck if they have a complaisant majority behind them; but it requires men of high calibre to deal with questions of great difficulty which do not, perhaps, bring immediate benefit, from a party point of view, to those who advocate them. There is no doubt that the relative rights of the riparian States in the rivers, and the best use and just apportionment of the waters, is one of the biggest questions that Australian statesmanship can face. The difficulty and complication are not inherent in the question itself. The trouble arises from the mutual misunderstanding and suspicions of the States concerned, from the relative extravagance of their respective demands, from the idea which has been formed on an imperfect knowledge of the details that it is impossible to reconcile the interests of navigation and irrigation, and that all concessions to one interest or method of utilization must be altogether at the expense of the other. But I hold that if honorable members approached this question with a full knowledge of all its bearings, and in a spirit which would actuate them if the Commonwealth were really a consolidation, a solution of the river question satisfactory and just to the States and the Commonwealth could readily be found. All that is really necessary is that we should get rid at once of the futile idea that it is impossible to reconcile the interests of irrigation and navigation, and that one must be given supremacy at the expense of the other. On that point I would recall the statements made by the Attorney-General and by the Minister for Home Affairs at the Melbourne Federal Convention. These honorable members then pointed out that, although the question was very hotly discussed, there was a possibility of a method of reconciling the two interests being hit on by the Federal Parliament, which they asked the Convention to trust in the matter. I should like to place before honorable members the position from a South Australian point of view. I may have to weary honorable members with a few figures which I feel it my duty to submit for consideration, although the significance of those figures may not perhaps be capable of immediate apprehension. The Royal commission appointed by the three interested States reported that there was an irrigable area of 50,000,000 acres in Australia—that is, an area capable of being irrigated if water were obtainable. The total irrigable area in New South Wales is given as 43,500,000 acres, in Victoria as 4,000,000 acres, and in South Australia as 2,500,000 acres.

Mr. REID.—Is that in connexion with the Murray system?

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is, the Murray flats?

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes; the land was within a certain distance of the river. Many persons reading the report of the Royal commission, or a newspaper synopsis of that report, would rush to the conclusion that there are tremendous opportunities for irrigation from this river system; but as a matter of fact the effective irrigable area is much less than that I have just stated. I do not know what the real area is in New South Wales; but the area in Victoria was reduced by experts to 2,000,000 acres as a maximum, and in that State there are not altogether more than 276,000 acres under irrigation. A very small proportion of even that area is under intense cultivation, the greater part being under irrigation by flooding, which is the least profitable and most wasteful method. I am speaking now purely on the evidence taken by the Royal commission.

Mr. FISHER.—The Royal commission did not touch Queensland.

Mr. GLYNN.—Queensland is not very much interested in the matter except in one way.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Queensland supplies the water.

Mr. GLYNN.—The opportunities for irrigation are not so great in Queensland as elsewhere, although that State really acts as a benefactor to the other States. The catchment area in Queensland which supplies the river systems is far greater than in any other State, and we hope that Queensland will join in the Inter-State locking system. According to experts, rivers for a considerable distance into Queensland are capable of being made permanently navigable by a proper system of locking, and I hope that we shall have the co-operation of our Queensland friends in the federal policy. America shows what extravagant views are entertained as regards opportunities for irrigation, when I state that in the arid region of the United States there are not more than about 3,500,000 acres irrigated.

Mr. McCOLL.—There are 8,000,000 acres commanded by irrigation channels.

Mr. GLYNN.—I rely on Kinney on Irrigation, which is, perhaps, one of the greatest authorities in America, and on another book, the name of which I forget.

Mr. REID.—Not McKinney?

Mr. GLYNN.—That is also a good man, to whom I am much indebted for information on the question. The two States which are regarded as the leading States in America, from the irrigation point of view, are California and Colorado, but in the former State there are only 1,500,000 acres under irrigation, and in the latter 1·2 per cent. of the total area of the State, or about a million acres. That does not show a very large capacity for irrigation. In Egypt irrigation has been in existence from the time of the Trojan war, and there are not now more than 5,000,000 acres commanded by the Nile.

Mr. WATSON.—That area carries a big population.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt it is irrigation which keeps the population there, but if in Egypt, which is the greatest country in the world for irrigation, there are not more than 5,000,000 acres—

Mr. McCOLL.—Does the honorable and learned member know the reason why the area is not larger?

Mr. GLYNN.—The impossibility of getting the water.

Mr. McCOLL.—No; it is because there never have been constructed conservation works to steady the flow and keep the water available.

Mr. GLYNN.—I anticipated that would be urged as an objection; but in India there is not a very much larger area regularly under irrigation than there is in Egypt. In South Australia there is a very great navigation interest which is imperilled by an extravagant view of the possibilities of irrigation. There are something like 90 vessels, representing an invested capital of £250,000, engaged in the navigation of the South Australian rivers. £250,000 is the Victorian estimate of the value of the vessels. I believe that the figures were supplied by the firm of Permewan, Wright, and Co., but that Captain King's estimate is, I think in excess of that sum.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable and learned member cannot speak of those vessels as engaged in navigation when they are lying at the mouth of the river.

Mr. GLYNN.—They are the vessels which trade throughout the river system when the rivers are navigable. The Murray is navigable as far as Wentworth for, on the average, nine months of the year, but the apportionment which was recently suggested would destroy its navigability for the greater part of that time. The commission recommended that in any apportionment the navigation interests of the river which already exist shall be respected. On page 50 of their report the commissioners say—

It has been already shown that no apportionment of water can be made between the States for irrigation and water conservation without regard to the requirements of navigation. Sufficient water must be allowed to pass down the rivers to maintain navigability as heretofore, and as some time must elapse before the construction of locks and weirs, it is important to decide what are the conditions which will secure this meanwhile.

That is, the same natural discharge for the purposes of navigation as previously existed. I say at once that we in South Australia do not ask for that, and that it cannot be granted except at the expense of the demands of Victoria and New South Wales. But we ask that compensation in the way of conservation to render our share effective should be given to us if we are to yield to the needs of the other States. What do the commissioners and the Premiers recommend? The commissioners divide the year into two periods, that from July to January, which are considered the high-water months, and that from February to June, which are considered the low-water months. For the first period the upper States—New South Wales and Victoria—are to have a diverting power of 440,000 cubic feet per minute, and all the surplus over the navigable discharge at Morgan, and South Australia a discharge of 170,000 cubic feet per minute. That is, if the Murray at Morgan has a discharge of over 337,000 cubic feet per minute, the navigable discharge taken by the commission, any surplus is to go to the upper States. The compromise of the Premiers was this: The quantity to be diverted by the upper States was left at 440,000 cubic feet per minute, but that was subject to a condition which in some cases would be an impossible one. The diverting power of the upper States was made conditional upon there being a navigable discharge at Morgan. Now, during some of the high water months you cannot give a diversion of 440,000 cubic feet per minute to the upper States, and leave a navigable discharge at Morgan. I will show honorable members what would be the effect upon the existing discharge of carrying this suggestion into operation, and for this purpose I will deal first with the period from July to January, and afterwards with the period from February to June, taking the discharge for the year 1900, which is adopted by the commissioners as a mean year, and for the year 1896, which was regarded as a typically low year, though I think, as I shall afterwards show, that it really was not so. The average discharge at Morgan for the period from July to January, 1900, was about 1,100,000 cubic feet per minute. A depth of 4 feet upon the gauge there, which is accepted by the Premiers as a navigable discharge, and which is the discharge to be submitted to the State Parliaments for approval, is equal to a discharge of 460,000 cubic feet per minute. South Australia, therefore, gives up during the high-water months of a mean year a surplus of 640,000 cubic feet per minute.

Mr. McCOLL.—How can the honorable and learned member say that South Australia gives up that surplus, because not a drop of the water which is measured falls in her territory?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not wish to go into that question. It is a matter of morality, and may be a matter of law. Honorable members may challenge my position, and say that South Australia is not entitled to the rights she claims. That is a matter of opinion. But, assuming that there is something in our claim, and that our rights may be recognised by the courts, then the effect of the compromise of our lawful claims which is suggested by the Premiers is as I have pointed out. I am not going to object to it, but I intend to ask for compensation when we grant it—a compensation which I am sure the good sense of honorable members will recognise. Let me now take the typical low year of the commissioners. In 1896 the average discharge at Morgan, during the period from July to January, was 649,429 cubic feet per minute. A navigable discharge, according to the Premiers, would be 460,000 cubic feet per minute, so that the surplus given up in that year would have been 189,429 cubic feet per minute. Besides that, there would have been given up the 440,000 cubic feet per minute which is to be the primary diversion, because South Australia is asked to allow a diversion of 440,000 cubic feet per minute, and all excess over the navigable discharge at Morgan. Now let me take the low water months of those years. The commissioners recommended that the apportionment during that period should be 370,000 cubic feet per minute for the upper States, and 70,000 cubic feet per minute for South Australia, and that any excess should be shared between the three riparian States in the proportion of those quantities. The Premiers recommend that 370,000 cubic feet per minute shall still be the primary diversion right of the upper States, and that the compensation water to South Australia shall be raised from 70,000 feet per minute to 150,000 cubic feet per minute, which is to be made the absolutely irreducible minimum.

Mr. McCOLL. — At the expense of the other States.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, to some extent, as it cannot always be obtained, and to some extent, as it is often exceeded now, at the expense of South Australia. In addition, if there is any surplus, ten-eightieths of it is to go to New South Wales, five-eightieths to Victoria, and three-eightieths to South Australia. The effect of that distribution would be this: In 1900 the average discharge during these months at Morgan was 257,000 cubic feet per minute. The minimum suggested by the Premiers' Conference was 150,000 cubic feet per minute, which would give up an excess of 107,000 cubic feet per minute. In the typical low year—1896—the average discharge was 430,000 cubic feet per minute, so that the surplus would have been 280,000 cubic feet per minute. It will be seen that the figures for the typical low year are higher than those for what is regarded as a mean year. But I have already said that I consider the figures do not justify it being called a typical low year. The fact is, however, that you cannot always give a minimum of 150,000 cubic feet per minute to South Australia.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Where does South Australia get her surplus water?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not now wish to go into that question. I acknowledge that the water comes from the other States, though two-thirds of it falls in Queensland. Do not let us now enter upon a discussion of the legal rights of the States. In some months it is impossible to get a minimum discharge of 150,000 cubic feet per minute. In March of last year the discharge at Morgan was only 119,000 cubic feet per minute, in April 69,000, and in May 78,000 cubic feet per minute, so that in those months the irreducible minimum would have existed only upon paper. In any case it is useless to South Australia without a system of locking, because it is about 200,000 cubic feet per minute less than the navigable discharge of the river. Honorable members may object that boats can be built to suit any stream. That has been tried, but it has been found that very light draught boats will not pay. The conditions of our rivers are different from those of the American rivers which are of more equable flows. Those rivers, though shallow, are of an even depth. But even very shallow craft navigating our rivers have to meander here and there to obtain a navigable channel, so that boats of light draft have to make such long journeys and to travel so often to get the cargoes up that they do not pay. Thus the minimum proposed would be ineffective for us, and it is to be given in exchange for the surrender of a large part of the navigable discharge of the stream. Therefore I ask honorable members to come to our assistance in making the proposed compromise effective. We are asked to give up the quantities of water I have named, and, in addition, any claim—and I acknowledge that our claim is open to dispute—to the waters of the Lachlan, the Bogan, the Macquarie, the Castlereagh, the Namoi, and the Gwydir in New South Wales; and of the Campaspe, the Loddon, the Broken River, and the Broken Creek in Victoria, as being outside the range of any apportionment. Besides that, we are to surrender all right to test the question of riparian rights for five years to come. Under the circumstances, I think that the recommendation of the commissioners that there shall be a federal system of locking as far as Wentworth as a commencement should be carried out.

Mr. McCOLL.—Now the honorable and learned member is speaking upon right lines.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is what I was endeavouring to lead up to. I should be the last to obstruct a final solution of the wrangles over the rivers question. It has been my desire for many years past that a just apportionment should take place, but I ask honorable members to enable us to adopt the recommendations of the Premiers' Conference by giving us the compensation which is beneficial to all but essential to us, of a joint system of locking suggested by the commissioners.

Mr. McCOLL.—The people of Victoria will never accept the agreement of the Premiers' Conference when they know what it really means.

Mr. GLYNN.—I know what some Victorians would like, and I know what ought to be done. Let us look at the present position of Victoria. Very little diversion of water is made by New South Wales, but in March of this year Victoria had a total diversion of 50,000 cubic feet per minute, the diversion in that month from the Goulburn alone being 20,000 cubic feet per minute. A channel is now being constructed, and is very near completion, which will have a capacity of 103,000 cubic feet per minute, and which will enable the whole of the waters of the Goulburn to be diverted into Victoria.

Mr. McCOLL.—No.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is the report of the commission.

Mr. McCOLL.—The discharge of the Goulburn is sometimes as much as 1,500,000 cubic feet per minute.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, but what we have to go by is the discharge in low years. It is in low years, not in years of flood, that the diversion of water matters. In March, 1903, 21,000 cubic feet per minute was being diverted from the River Goulburn; 18,000 cubic feet was being pumped from the River Murray between Echuca and Swan Hill; and at Mildura 13,000 cubic feet was pumped in March, the total being 51,000 cubic feet, although the discharge at Echuca at that time was only 40,000 cubic feet per minute, and the discharge at Renmark had fallen to 24,000 cubic feet per minute, and the water in the river there was not sufficient to permit of navigation by ordinary boats propelled by oars.

Mr. McCOLL.—But consider what a dry year it has been.

Mr. GLYNN.—Still, it is in such years that the river question becomes most important to every one; and within a few years it will be a difficult matter for Victoria to get what she wants unless she joins hands with South Australia.

Mr. SALMON.—Navigation is not so necessary in the lean years as in the fat years.

Mr. GLYNN.—That depends upon the settlement.

Mr. SALMON.—It depends upon the production.

Mr. GLYNN.—Supplies are more necessary in bad years than in good years. It has cost as much as £6 per ton to carry goods by road for a distance of 76 miles from Morgan to Renmark.

Mr. SALMON.—But the idea of settlement is not to consume supplies. We ought to expect production from settlement.

Mr. GLYNN.—The two things have to be taken in conjunction. The period of production in many cases is followed by a number of months when the river is very low, and if the river is not navigable the produce cannot be carried to market. We know, for instance, that wool is kept on the upper rivers for twelve months and more because it cannot be removed to the markets. The cost of the proposed locking to Wentworth is put down at £760,000, or about £200,000 more than the amount which was proposed to be borrowed by the Government under the Loan Bill of last session. It may be that this work will not directly pay for some years, but it must be remembered that our railways do not at once pay the full amount of interest upon the capital expended. I would ask also whether ordinary water supply systems pay. Victoria went in very largely for the creation of water trusts, and for carrying out irrigation works. In 1900 she had to wipe off over £1,750,000 which had been invested in irrigation works.

Mr. McCOLL.—That is quite a mistake.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Act of Parliament dealing with the matter shows that the interest and capital which had to be wiped off amounted to the sum I have mentioned.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable and learned member is confusing irrigation works with ordinary water supply undertakings. A great deal of that sum was expended for domestic water supplies and for watering stock.

Mr. GLYNN.—It does not matter with what special object the money was spent, so long as the capital expended on waterworks had to be wiped off to the extent of £1,750,000.

Mr. McCAY.—That is quite true.

Mr. GLYNN.—Then, again, the Coliban scheme does not pay 2 per cent. interest on the outlay.

Mr. McCAY.—But that is not an irrigation work.

Mr. GLYNN.—No ; but I am speaking of the outlay upon waterworks.

Mr. McCAY.—As a matter of fact, the Coliban scheme does pay 2 per cent., and more.

Mr. GLYNN.—The official reports do not show it. I have taken my figures from the Victorian statistics. The Geelong waterworks, also, do not pay 2 per cent. ; and if we turn to South Australia, we find that the Beltaloo waterworks do not return $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest upon the capital outlay. Therefore it would be unfair to judge a navigation scheme by the consideration whether it is likely to be an immediate and direct success from a financial point of view. I am sorry to weary the House with all these figures, but the matter is one of great importance to all the States, and is kindling an agitation which, so far as the electors of South Australia are concerned, will, I hope, be conducted in a friendly spirit. I still hold the opinion that I had previously expressed, that the proposal to build a new federal capital is premature. It will involve very great expense, and will not realize the objects of those who wish to have a federal city apart from the present centres of population. Ottawa and Washington are neither of them models of political purity. The tone of politics at the former city is very largely influenced by the civil service, and the capital is run by third-rate pressmen, politicians, and civil servants.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Where does the honorable member suggest that the federal capital should be ?

Mr. GLYNN.—I should prefer that it should be located in Sydney rather than that it should be planted away somewhere in the Australian bush. I do not think that the removal of the seat of government from the present centres of population is likely to lead to any improved tone in federal politics, or to exert any beneficial influence upon the legislation passed by the Commonwealth Parliament, and I should not hesitate to support a proposal for an amendment of the Constitution, even if the change involved the location of the federal capital in Sydney.

Mr. McCAY.—I should not object to that.

Mr. GLYNN.—I believe there are many Victorians who would prefer to see Sydney made the federal capital, rather than have it planted somewhere in the back-blocks of New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Does the honorable and learned member think that it would be a good thing if the federal capital were located at one of the present large centres of population ?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do, and I will further answer the question by quoting from the English press remarks made in condemnation of the arrangement entered into at the time the Constitution was finally framed. I think that the whole matter was put in a nutshell by the Saturday Review of 19th May, 1900. It was pointed out that we were merely following the wretched precedent of the United States and Canada, whose capitals, state and federal, had no claim to recognition either as centres of intellectual, social, or business life. They asked how much of the interest taken by the best class of minds in the country would evaporate if the political centre of Great Britain were transferred from London to some provincial town, and concluded by remarking—

It may be hoped that common sense may in time cause Australian political activity to gravitate towards some acknowledged centre of national life.

I think that puts the matter very fairly, and I hope that this question will receive, from a wider point of view than a merely parochial one, further consideration at the hands of Parliament. I am sorry that I have to differ from the leader of the Opposition upon the question of the naval vote. I believe that if we increase our contribution from £106,000 to £200,000 per annum we shall be affirming a principle, the developments of which we shall subsequently have to acknowledge. This vote is being asked for only as an instalment.

Mr. THOMSON.—We are already contributing towards the navy.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, we are contributing £106,000 a year, but we must remember that the British politicians are becoming most importunate in their requests for a larger proportional contribution by the colonies towards the expenditure upon the British Navy. Mr. Chamberlain, in introducing the question to the recent Conference of Premiers, said—

The colonies have enjoyed great advantages from being part of a great empire, but the privileges which we enjoy involve corresponding obligations. The responsibilities must be reciprocal and be shared in common.

Speaking later on, and being apparently affected by the inadequacy of the promise to contribute £200,000, Mr. Chamberlain addressed the Cape Chamber of Commerce in these terms—

The colonies must be prepared to abandon the idea of forming part of the Imperial confederation, or be prepared to take their full share of the responsibilities which world-wide dominion entailed. He wished to impress upon them the necessity of realizing their position and obligation.

That was after the promise of the £2 0,000 per annum as an initial step. We must remember that Great Britain can make out a very strong case for a large contribution. We saw it stated in the press recently that the total trade of the United Kingdom amounted to £934,000,000. That is a very large trade for any country to reach under a free-trade régime.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is the total foreign trade.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes. The internal trade is much larger. Of the foreign trade, British possessions outside the United Kingdom are directly interested in about one-eighth. We send about 80 per cent. of our exports to England, and if there is any protection to be obtained from the navy, we are interested as exporters to that extent in the trade of England.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think that our exports to England include the goods sent by us to Germany and other continental countries.

Mr. GLYNN.—Not to a very large extent. That opens up the whole question of the preferential duties, because the amount of wool that is sent direct to foreign ports is now much larger than before. A few years ago over 97 per cent. of our wool intended for foreign consumption was sent through London; but now only 72 per cent. is forwarded to the United Kingdom, because Antwerp is challenging the position of London as the port for the reception of wool intended for continental use. What I wish to point out, however, is that trade amounting to £254,000,000 is represented by commerce between British possessions and foreign countries, or between one British possession and another. This trade, which never touches the shores of the United Kingdom, receives the protection of the British Navy.

Mr. HUME COOK.—How does the honorable and learned member arrive at those figures?

Mr. GLYNN.—I have the whole of the figures taken from the blue-books, but the cable which was sent from England recently corrected some of these, and it is, of course, upon the corrected figures that I have spoken.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The trade to which the honorable and learned member last referred includes that of all British possessions.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes. The figures I have quoted represent the trade of the Empire in which England has no direct interest, because it never touches her shores.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That would include the Indian trade?

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, undoubtedly. If we calculate the white population of the Empire at 56,000,000, and the naval expenditure at £32,000,000—that being the amount appropriated for the year 1901–2—the contribution would be 11s. 5d. per head of the white population throughout the Empire. The actual contribution to the navy by the people of the United Kingdom is 15s. 2d. per head, whilst the white inhabitants of the rest of the Empire contribute 4d. per head, and Australia's share represents between 6d. and 7d. per head. I say, therefore, that a very strong case can be made out by the United Kingdom when the time arrives for discussing the proportionate contributions. By increasing our present contribution, we shall begin to recognise a principle which will be pushed to its logical conclusion. The suggestion of the British Government was that we should contribute not £200,000 but £387,000 per annum. Even writers like "Calchas" in the Fortnightly Review state that Canada should contribute £4,000,000 and Australia £3,000,000 towards the expenditure upon the army and navy. We find even the Cobden Club—whose authority I am sorry to have to look to in this matter—condemning the colonies for not making a larger contribution, and pointing out that our true proportional contribution, combined with that of Canada, should be £6,000,000.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Cobden Club has always condemned the colonies.

Mr. GLYNN.—If it has condemned the colonies it has acted for their benefit. It may have condemned their fiscal arrangements, but it has never condemned their aspirations. If honorable members seek for English opinion in this matter, I would direct their attention to the correspondence which has been published in the London Times during the last twelve months. This affords many instances of writers actually advocating what might involve the cutting of the painter unless we are prepared to acknowledge our responsibilities. Mr. L. H. Horden, writing to the Times in answer to a very strong letter by Mr. Loring, says—

All that I advocate, and all that I understand Mr. Loring to advocate, is that we should inform the colonies we shall decline, after a certain date, to recognise their claims; that we will protect them as far as we can, having regard to the interests of the rest of the Empire, but that we will not accept it as an axiom any longer that they shall be relieved of all responsibility for their own defence, or from damage by war.

Then the Times puts the case very strongly. It pointed out a few months ago that a Zollverein or customs union was out of the question for the present—although it has changed its front with Mr. Chamberlain during the last few weeks—but told us that a system of Imperial defence was possible, and ought to be adopted as a beginning. It remarked that it was—... a necessary consequence of self-government which, to their great advantage and ours, we have long ago conferred on the colonies in question, and, perhaps from these modest beginnings an adequate and equitable system of Imperial defence may some day be evolved.

That is, the very modest beginning of Lord Selborne's recommendation of a contribution of £387,000 a year from Australia, not the modest beginning of £200,000 annually which has been accepted by the Prime Minister. In this connexion I may point to the evidence of the various Imperial Defence Leagues. Twenty years ago their cry was—"Imperial federation first, and afterwards a contribution through it for the purposes of defence." Now, they have shifted their ground and ask first for proper colonial contributions to the navy, and afterwards, as a reward, Imperial federation, for which we do not ask.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Victorian League has a different system.

Mr. GLYNN.—Mr. Chamberlain, in referring to this matter, says that we ought to start with an advisory council, which would meet in London every four years. He declares that in his opinion the political federation of the Empire is within the bounds of possibility; that they ought not to force the hands of the colonies too quickly in this matter, but that the latter should commence with an advisory council and contributions to the navy. He continues—

If you are prepared at any time to take any share, any proportionate share, in the burdens of the Empire, we are prepared to meet you with any proposal for giving you a corresponding voice in the councils of the Empire.

I do not believe that the States ask for such a corresponding voice. What position should we occupy with proportional representation in the Imperial Council? Our full contribution to the naval expenditure of last year, which, according to the Estimates, aggregated £34,000,000, would, leaving other possessions out of account, as Canada requires to contribute, have been about £3,500,000, and thus our share of Imperial representation would be about 60 or 70 members out of 670 members. Why, we should have a regular pyramid of Members of Parliament in Australia. First, we should have the members of the States Parliaments—the most numerous class—then we should have the members of the Commonwealth Legislature, and on the top of all there would be the representatives in the Imperial Parliament, all of whom would be endeavouring by means of the peculiar methods which we have recently witnessed to help each other by mutual recrimination. Unless we accepted this proportional representation, it is said there would be a loss of local dignity and the power of influence in Council. Personally, I think that the true bond of Empire is not to be found in these artificial arrangements. The real bond of Empire is that which is reflected in the memory of our mutual traditions, and that splendid feeling for the old country to which we always refer as "home." The matter has been beautifully put by that great statesman Burke. If I remember aright, he declared that the affection of the colonies really depends upon common names, kindred blood, similar privileges, and equal protection. These are ties which, though light as air, are strong as links of iron. It may be said that we cannot, and do not wish to, escape from our liabilities. But we can recognise them by another means than that suggested by the Premiers' Conference. Surely it is not impossible to do what the people in America in the early days did, and acquire the beginnings of a local navy! That course is recommended by experts. I suppose that all of us have read the recommendations of the Commandant of Queensland.

Mr. McCAY.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that his remarks instituting an analogy between the circumstances surrounding the establishment of the High Court in America and the need for setting up a similar tribunal in Australia are equally applicable here?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not think so. Recently I read a report of an excellent paper by Lieutenant Biddlecombe, whom the honorable member may know. Judging by that report, he must be a man of, in naval matters, considerable capacity. In that paper the writer pointed out that for interest on an expenditure of about £1,000,000 we can borrow ships which, combined with the Imperial navy, would be adequate for our local defence. The outlay upon these would represent £40,000 or £50,000 a year by way of interest. What we want, as has been pointed out by Captain Creswell, is not ocean-going ships, but coastal ships—local defence ships—with tremendous gun power and small steaming capacity. The little South Australian vessel known as the Protector, which is only about one-third of the bulk of the Wallaroo, one of the Imperial ships here, has actually a gun capacity 70 per cent. greater. The former vessel was particularly praised for the service which she rendered in China, and, as evidencing her steaming power, I may mention that on the voyage from Sydney to the Gulf of Pi-Chi-li she actually reached her destination only one day after the so-called much faster ship of the Imperial squadron. I would further point out that the proposal to establish the nucleus of an Australian navy is supported by some of the leading journals in England. For example, The Spectator of the 12th May, 1902, writing on the aspirations of the colonies in this direction, says—

To any scheme under which the colonies would be pledged to a definite contribution in men and money we greatly prefer the autonomous and localized system which has already grown up and which has served us so splendidly in the past three years.

In May, 1902, The Monthly Review, a journal which I think is established purely for the purpose of cultivating the Imperial instinct, said—

Self Government, equal rights, and freedom from interference are indeed the pre-requisites of loyalty in the sense that they leave little or nothing for disloyalty to take hold of.

The Edinburgh Review completely indorses our local aspirations. It writes—

A strong movement exists in Australia in favour of obtaining control of the navy, and it found expression, we believe, at the colonial Conference. This tendency is inevitable. State sovereignty is inextricably bound up with military power. No colony can really be self-governing which has not also control of its own forces.

These quotations evidence that a strong case may be capably made out from the point of view of those who advocate the establishment of an Australian navy. As regards any preferential arrangement, I think that the sooner we knock the recent suggestion of Mr. Chamberlain on the head the better. The gyrations which he has displayed upon this question during the last three or four years are simply extraordinary. At the Premiers' Conference, he would not tolerate any reciprocation in trade matters between parts of the empire except upon purely free-trade lines. He further explained that he meant by revenue lines, not the protective system in vogue here, but a revenue tariff under which the import duties would fall upon articles not capable of local manufacture, and would therefore yield the whole of the revenue to the State. He declared that where articles were capable of being manufactured locally the import duties should be met by a corresponding excise duty. His idea, therefore, was in favour of a revenue Tariff upon purely free-trade lines.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—He said that that was what he would like to see, but that he would be grateful for any preference which he could receive.

Mr. GLYNN. — I am sorry that I have to contradict the Prime Minister.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is very easy for the honorable and learned member to do that, seeing that he was not present at the conference.

Mr. GLYNN.—But I have the blue-book record of its proceedings, and I have read it.

Mr. BARTON.—In his opening speech Mr. Chamberlain indicated what he would prefer, but it would be a total mistake to imagine that he did not say he would be very glad of any preference that could be afforded.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Prime Minister gives only parts of Mr. Chamberlain's statement and not the whole of it. He pointed out that our Tariff, even after rebates, would still be practically prohibitive as far as some English imports were concerned.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That remark was directed solely to the high Tariff of Canada. I am speaking of the whole drift of the conference.

Mr GLYNN.—I have read the whole of the report.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable and learned member could not have done so.

Mr. GLYNN.—I assure the Prime Minister that I have carefully read all the speeches. I sent home and obtained a blue-book for the purpose. I do not trust to the newspaper reports, because their accuracy is so often challenged. In his opening speech at the Imperial Conference, Mr. Chamberlain stated that he wanted any preference which might be afforded to British goods to be upon free-trade lines, and, in a letter to a constituent on the 21st May, 1903, he defined his position as follows :—

I am fully convinced that the prosperity of this country depends largely upon her trade with the colonies which, with a wise system of mutual concession, would increase by leaps and bounds. We have been apt in the past to consider too much the advantage which results from buying cheaply, and have not devoted sufficient attention to methods whereby we have the means to pay at all.

But at the conference Mr. Chamberlain said—

Whilst we most greatly acknowledge from you any preference you may be willing to voluntarily afford us we cannot bargain with you for it; we cannot pay for it unless you go much further and enable us to enter your home markets on terms of greater equality.

He then proceeded to show that even if the specific rebates were made that were promised by other parts of the Empire, but not by our Prime Minister, there would still be a very high wall of protection against English imports, and in his final speech I think he really gave a quietus to the proposals of the Premiers. I should like to point out that it is impossible to adopt any commercial union of that kind which is not open to the very strongest objection. There were two suggestions, one of which I believe originated with Sir John Macdonald, and proposed an all-round duty of 5 per cent. on foreign imports. The suggested duty has recently been raised in some places to 10 per cent., but Sir Robert Giffen, the statistician of the Board of Trade, points out that that solution is absolutely impossible, because it would mean that almost the whole of the revenue would be paid by England. Our contribution would be a little over 1·1 per cent., while England would have to pay 41 per cent. of the total, and Canada and Newfoundland 2·4 per cent. Look at how English trade is likely to be affected. If we take 40 of the raw materials which are imported into England, £110,000,000 worth are exported from foreign countries, and only £49,000,000 worth from other parts of the Empire. Of foods, the imports into the United Kingdom from foreign countries are valued at £180,000,000, while those from various parts of the Empire represent only £41,000,000. Of the total export and import trade of the United Kingdom, 75 per cent. is with foreign countries, and it is that trade we are asking England to tax.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is Mr. Chamberlain who asks that.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not believe that England is asking that that trade should be taxed, but Mr. Chamberlain may be asking it with a view to carrying out that branch of his Imperial idea. The Canadian policy is an utter failure, and I speak here on the evidence presented at the Imperial Conference.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Has the honorable and learned member read a speech made by Mr. Patterson at the Imperial Conference?

Mr. GLYNN.—I read the report down to the appendices.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Pardon me; I have a real reason for asking the question. Has the honorable and learned member read the speech made by Mr. Patterson, or the speech made by Mr. Feilding? If the honorable and learned member has not read those speeches, he has not got the speeches which were made at the conference. There were two books published—one, a blue-book, published to the world, and another, a white-book, which was a record of the speeches made at the conference beyond that of Mr. Chamberlain. These speeches, however, were not allowed to be published, because of an objection on the part of one of the members of the conference.

Mr. GLYNN.—I read only the speeches which were available.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That shows I was right in saying that the honorable and learned member had not read the speeches made at the conference. Google

Mr. GLYNN.—I may not have read the whole of the discussion ; but surely the Prime Minister will not say that I cannot form a reasonable opinion from the perusal of the official blue-book which is published? Surely the Prime Minister does not say that the Executive would deceive the Empire by publishing an unreliable blue-book?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not say so. All I say is that the honorable and learned member cannot say that he has read the debate at the conference unless he has got that which is not yet allowed to be published.

Mr. GLYNN.—I can give the Prime Minister quotations from speeches of Canadian Ministers, and from the speech of Mr. Chamberlain in reply to Canadian Ministers.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If the honorable and learned member will show me the document on which he relies I will tell him whether it is the one to which I refer.

Mr. GLYNN.—The document is Mr. Chamberlain's reply to Sir Wilfred Laurier as to the failure of the Canadian Tariff. There is ample material on which to form an opinion, because the special report presented to the Imperial Conference on the Canadian Tariff and rebates is presented with the published blue-book. From that report I find that in 1886 and in 1888, 40 per cent. of the Canadian imports were from the United Kingdom, and that in 1895-7, the proportion had sunk to 28 per cent. Then the Canadians, in order to check the decline of English imports, offered the rebate, which in 1900 reached 33½ per cent. What was the effect? In 1901 the proportion had sunk to 23½ per cent., so that the policy absolutely failed in regard to the proportion of imports.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—All that has been blown to the winds.

Mr. GLYNN.—The report shows what I have stated.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The facts were shown by the Canadian Ministers. A white-book contains speeches in which the facts are shown.

Mr. GLYNN.—Surely the Prime Minister does not allege that the figures in the published blue-book are contradicted by figures in another book not published?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—But the light thrown on the matter by those who were concerned in the very collection of the duties shows that, in the immediate object of giving a preference, England has very largely gained.

Mr. GLYNN.—I read about a column and three-quarters in the Times, contributed, I believe, by the Canadian High Commissioner, on this question.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I applied for leave to publish the speeches I have mentioned, but permission was not given because one objector prevented it being done.

Mr. GLYNN.—I did not read what was said by the Canadian representatives, but I do not see that that could change my opinion one bit if what is expressed in the blue-book is correct. At all events, Mr. Chamberlain, in reply to Sir Wilfred Laurier, said—

Though British trade with Canada since 1897 had increased 49 per cent., general imports had increased 62 per cent. . . . The increase was due only to the prosperity of Canada.

Sir WILFRED LAURIER.—Well, that is probably substantially true.

There is a total increase in the total trade, but the comparative proportion of imports from Great Britain shrank since 1886-8 from 40 per cent. to 23 per cent.

Mr. REID.—And there was a three times greater increase of foreign imports at the same time, an increase of £11,000,000 in foreign imports as against an increase of £3,000,000 in British imports.

Mr. GLYNN.—However that may be, I believe that the conclusion drawn by statisticians like Sir Robert Giffen and Mr. Mulhall are probably correct, namely, that the adoption of this policy would eventually involve the disintegration of the Empire rather than preserve its integrity. I am sorry to have detained members at an undue length, but this is really the only occasion on which matters of great importance can be ventilated in the House. I thoroughly agree with the remarks of the honorable member for Darling Downs as to the better federal spirit which seems to be arising. We must all recognise an uneasiness in the public mind as to the probable outcome of federation. I do not believe that real disaffection exists, but there is just a little of that doubt, arising from a sense of the unknown, which sometimes affects the efforts of men at the commencement of great undertakings. That is due, I believe, to a combination of causes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Bad government.

Mr. GLYNN.—We are all, when not completely stumped, none the less conservative and inclined to kick against changes which do any violence to longstanding habits. The period of pure enthusiasm seldom outlasts the honeymoon, though, if Mr. Coghlan will allow me to say so, national and vital statistics generally establish the beneficence of the bond. Again, it is hard for the public to closely watch the working of the federal machine, and local criticisms in this grumbling age are not always marked—to use Swift's phrase—by sweetness and light. As to bad government, I doubt that the occupants of the Treasury benches were, at a time when the Federal Constitution was so much run down, the best men to minister to a mind diseased. They seem rather partial to irritating remedies, of attempting to cure the disease by developing it. However, most other federations have had their days of diminished enthusiasm and State antipathy, but the time came when they gave place to acceptance, co-operation, and, eventually, when the new order of things had come to be regarded as the natural one, devotion to the federal power. The experience and success of other federations, when observed, should silence carping and inspire confidence, for there are no indications here of weakening in those racial characteristics which have made the United States of America, in some respects, the envy of the world.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—As a private member I do not feel justified in taking up the time of the House at any length when no adverse amendment has been moved upon the motion for the adoption of an address in reply to His Excellency's speech, but I feel that I may do good service to some small extent by indicating as shortly as I can a few of the opinions which I hold. In dealing with the conduct of the Government during the recess, and with their programme, we ought to regard not only what they have done and promised to do, but what they have refused to do. It is only fair to recognise that in regard to some of the gravest problems which they have had to face they have refused to act in the manner in which they might have been tempted to act. I refer to the extraordinary proposals made by the Premiers' Conference with reference to the transfer of the debts of the States, and for compensation for the transferred property, and also to the determination of the Government not to wink at the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act, but to administer the law as it stands, without regard to consequences. As to the transfer of the debts of the States, if anything would injure our credit, no proposal could do more in that direction than that unanimously and seriously put forward by the Premiers as the result of their Conference in Sydney. If Mr. Micawber, his wife, and children had each incurred debts, and borrowed all the money they could get, and the brilliant idea had seized Mr. Micawber of forming the family into a company under the title of "Micawber and Co.," and transferring all obligations to it, so as to leave each member free to begin borrowing again, we should have had a position analogous to that which the Premiers of the States seem anxious to bring about. I do not know anything more humiliating than the idea that the Federal Government should take over all the liabilities of the States, and that the Governments of the States should then wipe their hands of all responsibility, and go on borrowing as before. Such an arrangement is utterly impracticable. Then, as to the payment for transferred properties, I understand that it has been estimated that from £12,000,000 to £14,000,000 are required to pay for them. The Premiers have suggested that they are entitled to obtain bonds or money for these properties. In making these remarks, I have to depend entirely upon the newspaper reports, because, for, I have no doubt, very good reasons, the Treasurer has not yet taken the House into his confidence about the matter; but if the newspaper reports are correct, he is taking the only safe course in the matter. He says in effect to the Premiers of the States—"I will not pay you in bonds or in cash. These properties represent borrowed money. It would be absurd for the Commonwealth to take over a property worth, say, £10,000, and paid for out of borrowed money, and let you buy it back from us, and borrow another £10,000 for it, thus charging it with a debt of £20,000."

Mr. HUME COOK.—That is not an unknown principle in State financing.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I hope that we have turned over a new leaf, and that if that is an old device of the States the Commonwealth will not repeat it. A matter which has been referred to at some length by several speakers in this debate, and which, I think, has been misunderstood, is the application of the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act to the six hatters who were refused permission to land in Sydney. I cannot help thinking that the indignation of the honorable member for Gippsland was directed not so much against the Government—the Administration—as against the Act. I do not think that any one has asserted that the Government did more than administer the Act as they found it, and if there is anything for which I should commend a responsible Ministry, it is for administering the law, so long as it is the law, whether they like it or not. If there is anything which has marked the course of British liberty, it is the insistence of the people that governments shall administer the law as it stands. Briefly the facts were these :—There is in existence an Act which says that no person who comes to Australia under contract to perform manual labour shall be allowed to enter unless he obtains an exemption from the Government because of the possession of special skill required here, and any one so prohibited is liable to imprisonment if he lands. The Government, when they found that the six hatters were coming to Sydney in defiance of the law, saved the men from the ignominy of being locked up in gaol, and said to them, "We will wait before taking action until you show that you are entitled to land." The person who brought the men out had made no application for exemption, and until such an application was made, no exemption could be given. When the application was very tardily sent in, the Minister looked into the case, and found that the men should be allowed to land, and they landed accordingly. I adhere absolutely to the words which were quoted by the right honorable member for Tasmania this afternoon. In my opinion it is not the policy of any Australian to exclude from this country white men who come here free to accept or refuse engagements. The Government carried out the law. As for the Act itself, until I see further reason to change my opinions, I shall continue to consider it a right one. I see nothing unreasonable in saying that we welcome to our shores honest white men, but only such as come here free to accept Australian conditions and rates of wages. A man cannot be said to come here free who comes with a chain round his leg. If there were no such law, and a strike or industrial difficulty occurred, and there were men in Italy obtaining £1 a week for work for which £3 a week was being paid here, hundreds of them could be brought out under contract to do it for £1 10s. or £2 a week. But such a contract would really be made under constraint, and the men entering into it would be accepting conditions and rates of wages which were not Australian. There is nothing unreasonable in saying to people that if they come here they must not come under contract for three, ten, twenty, or any period of years. I listened carefully to the dialectical duel between the right honorable gentlemen who lead the opposing parties in this Chamber, and I was rather disappointed with it. It was a brilliant pyrotechnical display, but it failed to give the steady illumination which the country is entitled to expect at this very critical stage of its history. I do not think that the electors are much concerned in finding out the discrepancies between the Prime Minister's statement at Maitland and his subsequent actions, or between the speeches delivered by the leader of the Opposition at Sydney and at Perth. I did not hear the speeches which that right honorable gentleman delivered in Sydney, but I heard some of those he made in Perth, and I could a tale unfold if I were to tell tales out of school, which I am not going to do. If there is one thing which all Australians are anxious about, it is that the Federal Government shall not incur expenditure which is not absolutely necessary, and that there shall be no waste of industrial resources through strikes and lockouts, which have done so much damage to us in the past. I understand that Ministers wish to use the powers of the Constitution to introduce a measure providing for conciliation and arbitration, and I shall welcome the introduction of such a measure, as I think all other moderate men will. After grave reflection, however, I cannot agree to three of the proposals of the Government—to those to create immediately the Inter-State Commission and the High Court, and to that to pay £200,000 under a naval agreement. I should like to say something in regard to the expenditure upon the federal capital, but I cannot feel myself wholly free to refuse to give effect to the provision in the Constitution in respect to that matter, as it is part of a special stipulation upon the faith of which New South Wales entered the Union. I am, however, free from responsibility for that provision. I opposed the acceptance of the Bill, and I thought the provision an unwise one; but as a bargain has been made, and one of the States was induced to enter the Union very largely upon the promise that the federal capital should be situated within its boundaries, we are bound to carry it into effect. I hope, however, that we shall find a wise means of borrowing the money without interest, under the Canadian system as has been suggested. With regard to the Inter-State Commission, I shall not speak at any length, but I desire to point out that the only purpose for which the appointment of an Inter-State Commission is essential is the abolition of preferential rates on the railways, the power to deal with this subject being contained in section 102 of the Constitution. Any other infringement of the Constitution, or of the laws made under the Constitution, may be dealt with in the ordinary courts. The Inter-State Commission cannot make laws; it can only adjudicate and administer the constitutional provisions and the laws made under them. The commission will have no power to prohibit anything which the Constitution or our federal laws do not prohibit, and its powers are absolutely restricted. Section 102 of the Constitution provides that as to railways we may prohibit any preference or discrimination that is undue, or unreasonable, or unjust to any State, and that such preference or discrimination is not to be regarded as undue, unreasonable, or unjust unless so adjudged by the Inter-State Commission. I frankly admit that that renders the Inter-State Commission necessary, if there are preferences shown in connexion with the railway traffic. The number and nature of the preferences now given, however, have not been disclosed to us. On three occasions last session I tried to obtain from the Minister for Home Affairs information as to the cases in which preferential rates were charged upon the railways. On each occasion he promised to supply particulars, but failed to do so. I do not blame the Minister, but I think the result shows that he found very great difficulty in discovering preferential rates. The instance quoted by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs with regard to the rates charged upon cargo carried in ships from North Queensland, as against ships which comes within the scope of section 102, which refers only to preferential railway rates, and that is the only matter for which we really require the Inter-State Commission. I object, therefore, to an expensive commission, with a large staff, being created, and fixed upon us for a period of at least seven years. We do not even know of the existence of preferential rates such as would render it necessary to call the commission into existence.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Bill formerly introduced proposed to do more than deal with railway rates.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit that, but the commission is essential only for the purpose of dealing with preferential railway rates. I feel that there is no machinery so bad as that which is adopted before it is really clear what is required.

Mr. KIRWAN.—There is no doubt that preferential railway rates are in operation in Western Australia in connexion with the distinction made between imported coal and that produced at the Collie fields. The position there is very serious.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I had an opportunity of inquiring into the condition of affairs in Western Australia some time ago, and I found that special reasons were advanced for the difference in those charges. It was stated that certain coal was more expensive to carry than other kinds. If there are preferential rates on the railways to any extent, the whole matter might perhaps be settled by constituting the Railways Commissioners of the various States an Inter-State Commission for the purpose of adjusting matters.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—In Western Australia beer brewed in Fremantle and Perth is carried on the railways at a lower rate than beer produced in other States.

Mr. MAUGER.—In New South Wales iron manufactured at Lithgow is conveyed over the railways at lower rates than those charged for carrying imported iron.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The only preferential rates prohibited by the Constitution are those which relate to the trade between State and State. I do not know of any State except New South Wales which produces iron in any quantity. There are iron deposits in Tasmania, but we know that they have not yet been developed. There are numbers of railway rates which are called preferential, but which really do not come within the scope of the Constitution. The Federal Parliament has power to deal only with trade and commerce between the Commonwealth and other countries, and trade and commerce between the States. It has nothing to do with trade within the area of any State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unless measures are adopted which are intended to take away the trade properly belonging to any other State, or to divert trade. We have power to deal with cases of that kind.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes. Section 51, however, does not relate to all kinds of trade, but only to trade and commerce with foreign countries, and between the States. I do not wish to dogmatize too much upon this subject, because I have not the information necessary to render it clear whether or not preferential rates actually exist upon the railways. It is a great mistake, however, to suppose that the ordinary long distance or tapering rates can be affected by the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What does the honorable and learned member think that "trade amongst the States" means?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is a very large question, and I do not feel prepared to discuss it now. What I say is that the ordinary long-distance rates charged upon the railways cannot be interfered with by the Inter-State Commission. It is only where a rate is intended to give an advantage to the produce of one State over the produce of other States that the federal authorities can intervene.

Mr. KIRWAN.—The Inter-State Commission would have power to deal with the case I have mentioned in Western Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I know that the differential rates charged in Western Australia form a great matter of grievance with the residents of Kalgoorlie; but when I made inquiries into the subject an explanation was made to me ascribing a motive which I considered to be perfectly genuine and satisfactory.

Mr. KIRWAN.—The honorable and learned member was misinformed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—With regard to the naval agreement, I desire to know whether it will be necessary to make an annual grant of the £200,000 per annum proposed to be paid to the Imperial authorities, or whether a special appropriation will be made.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—An Act will have to be passed making a special appropriation as long as the agreement lasts.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Then a special appropriation will be made for a limited term. The Prime Minister has very properly said, "As long as the agreement lasts." Either this £200,000 is to be the ultimate contribution, or it is not. If it is not to be the ultimate contribution, we shall begin by establishing a principle which will lead us how far we do not know.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We shall be perfectly free at the termination of the agreement.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but if we once admit the principle that we are to contribute money over which we are to have no control; that we are to pour money into the great gulf of the British naval expenditure, then we shall have no ground for objecting when we are asked to contribute our proportion according to our population or according to our trade. We must nip these new proposals in the bud. We all entertain the utmost good feeling towards the old country, but no one who understands the conditions of politics and life in Australia, and desires to maintain the good feeling which now exists, will propose anything calculated to cause friction. Such a result, however, must follow if we are called upon to divert money required for the development of our own resources to purposes which are to be carried out apart from our control. Our true policy is to try as far as we can to relieve the mother country of the burden of looking after us. It should be our object to protect our own floating trade, to train our own seamen, and to look after our own safety. I saw a letter a few months ago written by a very distinguished man in London to a resident in this State, in which the writer said that of all the Premiers who had attended the recent Conference in London the Prime Minister of Australia had created the best impression. He added that Sir Edmund Barton had promised least, but was esteemed the most. I was greatly pleased to read this letter, and it was afterwards that I learnt, to my chagrin, that the Prime Minister had been—if I may say it—wheedled into promising a contribution of £200,000. I think that in the absence of any instruction from this Parliament, the Prime Minister had no right to make any contract with the Imperial authorities.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Except subject to the ratification of Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit all that ; but if a promise is made subject to our ratification, it is very awkward for a supporter of the Government to refuse his vote under certain circumstances. I hope, however, this question will be treated as an open one, and that our allegiance will not be submitted to too great a strain. In a matter of national Australian policy such as this, the wishes of honorable members should have been ascertained to some extent before anything was done. Now I come to the matter of the High Court. I find, by referring to Hansard, that during the debate on the address in reply at the opening of last session, I expressed, in substance, the same opinions as those I now hold. I cannot help thinking that the Federal High Court is, under all the circumstances, unnecessary, and that we can easily delay incurring the expense that would be involved until some more suitable time. I was sorry to hear the leader of the Opposition to some extent supporting the Government in this matter. The right honorable gentleman was determined to find fault with the Government in some way, and so he complained of their having delayed the appointment of the court. So we have the curious spectacle of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition strongly advocating the creation of the court without further delay. Honorable members may think that I do not know much about the Inter-State Commission, or naval matters, but I do know a little about the High Court, and I do say deliberately, and after thinking the whole matter over very carefully, that its creation at this juncture will involve the placing of an unnecessary burden upon the people of Australia. The leader of the Opposition stated that the country was crying aloud for the creation of the court, but I fail to find any evidence in support of his statement. I urge honorable members to ask themselves what the High Court can do that cannot be equally well done by the Supreme Courts of the States, with the Privy Council over them to give uniformity. Several grave questions which have arisen in regard to our Acts and the Constitution have been very ably dealt with by our Supreme Courts. I do not think that the Attorney-General has cause to object to the last decision of the Victorian Supreme Court in connexion with a case in which he was interested. It has been said that the Supreme Courts of the different States may differ. That is so ; but at the same time we have the Privy Council which can make decisions uniform, and to which the Supreme Courts will, and must bow. The Privy Council can deal with constitutional points sent to it by the Supreme Courts as freely as it can with ordinary appeals. There is a provision in the Constitution that the Privy Council is not to deal with appeals from the High Court upon constitutional points except in very special circumstances, but there is no prohibition—and we cannot make one—against the Privy Council dealing with appeals from the Supreme Courts upon constitutional points.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Would not the Privy Council proceeding be too long in the settlement of trading disputes?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not think that there would be any difference between the time occupied by the procedure in the case of the Privy Council and that of the High Court. How could there be?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would take longer to obtain a decision from the Privy Council than from our own court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Of course there would be a difference between the time absorbed in going to London, which involves a journey of a month or more, and that occupied in travelling to some place in the heart of New South Wales. Of course the idea underlying the establishment of the High Court is that we should have a tribunal to deal with appeals in the federal capital. But the members of that tribunal—five of them—will go on circuit to the different State capitals. They will have to travel a good deal, and I think that there must necessarily be long delays before a man in Western Australia, for example, could have his case settled by the High Court Judges. It would be far better to allow him to appeal to the Judges of the Supreme Court of his own State. I have carefully re-read the speech delivered by the Attorney-General last session in submitting the Judiciary Bill to the notice of this House. I did so for the purpose of ascertaining whether I could not modify my views upon this matter. After recognising the graceful diction, the charm of manner, and kindness of feeling exhibited throughout that speech, I cannot help saying that when its columns are boiled down, the residual product of ground why this court should be created now is very small indeed. The Federal Constitution is merely a new law interposed between the Imperial law and Colonial law. The Judges of the courts simply have to endeavour to apply this Constitution in place of applying only the State Constitutions. Hitherto the Supreme Courts of the States have had to deal with Customs Acts. They will now have to deal with one Customs Act only. The same remark is applicable to the Defence, the Public Service, and the Post and Telegraph Acts. Of course the Privy Council is not an ideal court. It partakes more of the nature of a chamber or a board than of a court, but, at the same time, it contains some of the best jurists in the British Empire, and there is a good deal to be said in favour of the contention that British law ought always to keep a connexion with the parent stock. There is no system of law so great as was the Roman law, for the Roman Empire, except perhaps the British law. To hope that the principles of British freedom, which are involved in British law, shall extend all over the Empire is a great ideal to cherish. In Canada they did not create a High Court till ten or twelve years after the establishment of the Federation. It is quite true that our Constitution says in effect that a High Court shall be established, whilst in the case of Canada the provision was permissive. At the same time I would point out that in the Canadian Constitution the power was obviously one which ought to be exercised. I should like to see it exercised in Australia, but there is no obligation on our part to exercise it immediately, at a time of transition, and when the States Treasurers are straining to meet their liabilities. When we find the whole of the Tariff revenue of the Commonwealth practically appropriated for the purpose of paying interest upon the debts, and when we know that there is no great degree of prosperity at present throughout Australia, it is only reasonable to urge the postponement of the creation of the High Court for a time. In the case of the United States there were special reasons why that court should be established without delay. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has referred to some of these. The Federal High Court was created in America because the courts of the States could not be trusted. In support of that contention I would direct attention to the following passage from Elliott's Debates, volume 5, page 331 :—

Mr. Randolph observed that the courts of the States cannot be trusted with the administration of the national laws. The objects of jurisdiction are such as will often place the general and local policy at variance.

The fact is that the courts of the States in America at that time were not comparable in power and independence with those of our States. An instance of this occurred about three years prior to the holding of the Federal Convention in America. The legislature of Rhode Island had passed a law making paper a legal tender, and imposing penalties upon people who refused to accept it as such. A butcher declined to accept it, and an informer laid an information against him. The matter was tried before the Rhode Island court, and all of the judges held that the law was unconstitutional and void, because under the Constitution they could make only enactments which were consistent with the laws of England, and it was inconsistent to pass a law which directed that penalties could be recovered before a magistrate only as distinct from a jury. What happened? The Judges, I repeat, held that this law was unconstitutional and void. As a result they were hauled before the Legislature, and asked how they dared to declare one of its laws void. They explained that they were compelled to take that course in accordance with their oaths of office. A motion was tabled for their dismissal, for it must be borne in mind that they had not a permanent tenure of office. They were not dismissed, however, for the reason that they had to be elected every year by the Legislature, and the Legislature took good care not to re-elect them next term. But the difference between that case—which was rankling in Mr. Randolph's mind when he spoke—and that of the judges of our Supreme Courts, is that the latter have a life tenure of office during good behaviour, and cannot be removed. Surely it is not fair to say that because a special court was necessary under such a loose system as prevailed in America in 1789, it is imperative that we should immediately establish a Federal High Court in Australia. There are two objects for which the proposed tribunal is to be created. One of these is that it may deal with Federal matters. I altogether dispute that Judges with a permanent tenure, such as is enjoyed by the occupants of the benches of our Supreme Courts, have any more sympathy with their respective States than they have with Australia as a whole. Any one who knows them, must admit that they have no State allegiance as distinct from their allegiance to Australia. The chief ground upon which it is urged that we ought to have a special court to interpret our Constitution is that its members should be in sympathy with the spirit of that instrument of Government. Now, if there is one thing which a judge ought to do, it is to dispense justice without fear, favour, or affection. I do not think that sympathy is essentially a good quality to possess in dealing with matters of law. At the same time, when our Supreme Court Judges come to interpret a law made under the Constitution, they will deal with it as they would with a problem in mathematics, without any sympathy one way or the other, and with a determination to do what is right. In conclusion, I want to reconcile my attitude with the attitude I took in the Federal Convention, where I voted for a strong High Court. Right through I gave my vote in favour of the strongest High Court that could be created; but I voted in favour of there being no optional appeal to the Privy Council. I found that at the final drafting of the Constitution there was a clause omitted which prevented appeals to the Privy Council. The attention of the Prime Minister was called to the matter at the time, and Sir Josiah Symon, as well as the Prime Minister, gave expressions of opinion. If the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, who spoke on the subject or any one else will take the trouble to look at the report of the Federal Convention in Melbourne, volume 2, page 2455, they will find that Sir Josiah Symon said distinctly that there was no optional appeal to the Privy Council. Sir Josiah Symon said—

It appears to me that the point to which the honorable Mr. Glynn has directed attention will not, in practice, arise at all. The intention certainly was not to multiply appeals, or to give an alternative option to an appellant in a State court to appeal either direct to the Privy Council or to the High Court. We have dealt simply with appeals from the High Court to the Privy Council. Under clause 73, a general jurisdiction in regard to appeals is given to the High Court. The natural anxiety of the honorable member is that there should be a power in the Parliament to put an end to appeals direct from the Supreme Court of a State to the Privy Council without going of course, through the High Court. It appears to me that under clause 73 the appeal direct to the Privy Council is practically abolished.

Mr. CONROY.—That was altered, of course, in England.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; I think the only discussion in England was as to appeals from the High Court, and not as to appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States. As the law at present stands in the Constitution, a man who is beaten in the Supreme Court in Melbourne or Sydney can choose his appeal court. That is a most unwholesome thing, because neither court is bound by the other's decisions, and an appellant always chooses the court which is most likely to decide in his favour. The effect of the omission in the Constitution will be that most appeals in ordinary cases will go straight from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. If I had to advise, as I have often had to do, a beaten litigant in a Supreme Court, I confess that, having regard to present conditions and to the prospects in Australia with our existing population, I should tell him to appeal to the Privy Council in preference to the High Court. I should give that advice because in the Privy Council there is certainty of finality, which is a great point. People do not enjoy going from appeal court to appeal court; that is a burden they would rather not bear. What is wanted by a litigant is finality, and, of course, success. He does not care about paying money in order to support the Constitution, or to support a High Court; his only desire is to win and gain money or avoid paying money. In 99 cases out of 100, I am sure that litigants will choose to appeal to the Privy Council. I say, without doubt, that under present conditions there will not be obtained for the High Court stronger men or better lawyers than are now in the Supreme Courts of the States. If we had a prospect of getting men of better calibre on the whole for the High Court than we have in the Supreme Courts, there would be a great deal to be said for the proposal of the Government. In the course of time, when our finances are in a better state, I have no doubt we shall be able to get as much competition and as many men to select from as there are in England. Owing to the strong tenure and the exalted position which the Supreme Court Judges occupy, there is no doubt that the position attracts the best men at the bar. We have therefore to ask ourselves what is there to be gained by creating now a High Court? What is there that the High Court can do that the Supreme Courts, with the Privy Council over them, cannot do? I speak strongly because I know there has been a great deal of glamour and mystery about this matter. One would think that the Federal Constitution was something mystic, and not merely a means to an end—a means to order and progress. We do not want Judges to expand the Constitution; we want them to interpret it. It is with the people and not with the Judges, who are responsible to no one, that the expansion of the Constitution must rest. One of the greatest dangers is to commit to any bench—the members of which have their own idiosyncracies, and have no direct responsibility to the people—the moulding and shaping of the Constitution.

Mr. FOWLER.—Do not English Judges expand the law?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think they unfold the law; I should not say that they expand it.

Mr. MAHON.—I know a few cases in which English Judges have expanded the law pretty considerably.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may be so in Ireland, but I do not think that the judiciary in Ireland ought to be taken as a model for Australia. I know only too well how things are managed in Ireland. I feel I have taken up enough time. I merely wanted to indicate the three items of expenditure on which I do not feel justified in voting with the Government. I think, however, that the country is grateful to the Government for having administered up to the present the laws as they stand on the statute-book.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—After the very able speeches to which I have listened, dealing retrospectively with the work of the Government, I shall not add anything to the debate in that respect. I propose to confine myself to the speech of His Excellency, and only in such a way as to deal with general principles, leaving matters of detail until the various Bills are before us. I am very glad to hear the expression of opinion which came from so able a lawyer as the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne on the matter of the proposed High Court of Australia. I was further pleased to hear the able remarks which were made by the honorable member for Gippsland to-day on the same subject. I regard this question simply from the point of view of economy, though I should not continue to do so if I thought the creation of a High Court would lead to any greater efficiency in the administration of the law. I attach great weight to the arguments which have been put forward in favour of the view that this court can be done without for a time; and, in passing, I may say that I think the creation of an Inter-State Commission might also be postponed. There is one matter which has so far not yet been touched on, and with which I wish to deal in a broad way. I refer to the proposal to introduce a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. In this proposal, it seems to me, there is a very great principle at stake, and, so far as I know, there is no precedent for federal legislation of the kind. The laws of the United States are quoted very freely in this House, and naturally so, considering that we have practically adopted the Constitution of that country, and I think we may fairly look to the experience of that country to guide us in this matter. I shall not say anything at present in regard to the merits of courts of conciliation and arbitration, but confine myself to the desirability of confining their creation to State legislation. I find on reference to the excellent work of Quick and Garran, that there was great diversity of opinion in the Federal Convention as to whether the creation of these courts should be one of the subjects to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. Quoting from Quick and Garran's book, I find that the present leader of the Opposition said—

He believed in the compulsory investigation of trades disputes by State authorities, but he was of opinion that the proposed sub-clause would tend to enlarge the area of trade disputes, for the reason that the employers or the men might be disposed to extend the area of a dispute, in order to get the advantage of having it settled by the Federal tribunal. The arguments presented in opposition to the proposal were—that to interfere with the State in the settlement of trade disputes would be an undue and unnecessary intrusion on the local industrial life of the State.

Mr. Wise, who is responsible for the passing of an Act of the kind in New South Wales, is reported as saying—

He did not think that it would be prudent to create a Federal court having authority to fix the rate of wages for the whole of Australia.

Turning to a very able American writer for whose opinions we all have great respect, namely, the great late Professor Fiske, I find that, dealing with this subject, he said—

The chief problem of civilization from the political point of view has always been how to secure concentrated action amongst men on a great scale without sacrificing local independence.

The durability of the federal union lies in its flexibility. States so unlike one another as Maine, Louisiana, and California, cannot be held together by the stiff bonds of a centralizing Government.

It is in this complete independence that is preserved by every State in all matters save those in which the federal principle itself is concerned that we find the surest guaranty of the permanence of the American political system.

Those remarks were illustrated by certain legislation which had been passed in the State of California, and which, had the subject been one for federal control, would have become the law in the whole of the United States. The legislation was, however, confined to the one State, and after a few years, to use a homely phrase, it "fizzled out," without causing excitement in any of the other States. This is a subject we should approach very cautiously, and so far as I can see at present, experience, evidence, and argument are against the taking of this power out of the hands of the State Parliaments. The argument of the leader of the Opposition that employers or employes might push the matter so as to have the matter dealt with by the State authorities commends itself very strongly to me. In reference to the proposed agreement with the Admiralty, I am very much disposed to follow the Government lead; but there is one point which strikes me very forcibly, namely, the proposal, as I understand it, to do away with the torpedo boats. Even if we had a good strong squadron here, I think that to do away with the torpedo boats would be to create a hiatus in our line of defence which might lead to considerable suffering and loss. If there were no torpedo boats, and the squadron were ordered away, we should have only our forts and torpedoes to depend upon, and they would be practically useless against a vessel which could lie hull down off the coast and shell such a town as Sydney. The best authority I can quote on this subject is Captain Mahan, who in a very able article—as all his articles are—writing upon preparedness for naval warfare, says—

Coast defence implies gun power and torpedo boats; but coast defence, though essentially passive, should be an element of offensive force local character. This offensive element of coast defence is to be found in the torpedo boat in its various developments. There should be a local flotilla of small torpedo vessels which, by their activity, should make life a burden to an outside enemy.

He goes on to quote a distinguished English admiral, now dead, to the effect that the conditions of modern warfare, owing to the invention of torpedo boats, are such as are calculated to drive the captains of a blocking fleet crazy. We require, in the first place, heavy gun power within our forts, and in addition, torpedoes. Ships in motion are, like birds on the wing, not easily hit, and it has been demonstrated that fast ships can often steam past a fort almost without injury. Captain Mahan, therefore, lays it down very plainly that coastal defence is not sufficient without some sort of aggressive power which can be used to raise a blockade or to disturb a ship which may be shelling a town, perhaps with smokeless powder, from a great distance. Perhaps the Prime Minister can tell us whether the torpedo boats are to be done away with.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not think that that has been decided.

Mr. SKENE.—At the end of last session I dealt with this matter from another point of view. At that time the Minister for Home Affairs was administering the Department for Defence, in the absence of its proper head, and I asked him what was to be the position of the men who are now engaged in our local defences. I understand that there is nothing in this agreement to provide for these men, who have spent a good part of their lifetime here, and I gathered that that arm of our defence force was to be done away with altogether. I admit that it is necessary that a squadron should be free to be sent about anywhere within southern waters; but, in addition to our forts, we must have a fleet of light torpedo boats for coastal defence. Captain Mahan puts forward a very strong argument for the employment of torpedo boats. He says that—

In such a flotilla, owing to the smallness of its components and to the simplicity of their organization and functions, is to be found the best sphere for volunteers. The duties could be learned with comparative ease, and the whole system is susceptible of rapid development.

He points out that the largest warship could be built before you could train men to manage her, whereas men can readily be trained to take part in the defence of the coast by means of torpedo boats. So far as the general question is concerned, I may say at once that I will support the agreement, but that I should be very sorry to see the boats that are here now done away with, unless they are to be replaced with others. The Prime Minister last night referred to the attitude taken by Canada. I agree with him that Canada, so far as outsiders can form an opinion, has not taken a very broad view of this question. I hope, however, that that country will yet see its way to accept the idea that the British navy should be used for the general protection of the Empire. The position of Canada has been very clearly dealt with by Captain Mahan, so that I cannot understand the view taken in that country. Writing at the time of the Behring Sea disputes, he said—

It is upon the Atlantic seaboard that Great Britain will defend Vancouver and the Canadian Pacific. In the present state of our seaboard defences she can do so absolutely. What is all Canada compared with our exposed great cities? What harm can we do Canada proportionate to the injury we should suffer by the interruption of our coasting trade and the blockade of Boston, New York, the Delaware, and the Chesapeake.

Those words apply, not only to the position of Canada, but to that of other countries. The best way to defend ourselves is to be ready within reasonable limits to pursue an offensive policy. The matter of preferential trade is hardly brought by the Governor-General's speech within the arena of practical politics. It may do for us to fall in with some arrangement of the kind, but I cannot see how the telegraphed report of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, which is all we have as yet before us, can be taken to convey its full meaning. When Mr. Hofmeyer, the leader of the Africander Bond, made the suggestion, long before the Boer war, that a tax should be placed upon foreign goods for the maintenance of a fleet, it was pointed out by Sir Edward Giffen that the people of Great Britain would have to bear most of the cost, and that the colonies would get off with very little. That was the burden of the song all round. We were told that the home country could not afford to put us into the position of which Mr. Chamberlain seems to approve. I have here a telegraphed report of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister in Vancouver, and I do not think honorable members will be disposed to adopt the view there put forward, though, of course, the report may not be absolutely correct. It is taken from the London Weekly Times, and reads as follows :—

Referring to the preferential Tariff question, Sir Edmund Barton said that Australia would favour the mother country not by concessions from the existing Tariff, but by imposing duties on foreign goods, principally on those from Germany and the United States.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I never said anything in any speech which amounted to expressly indicating that Australia would take a certain course.

Mr. SKENE.—I am quoting from a short report telegraphed to the Times, through Reuter's agency.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I never pledged Australia in any way or at any time.

Mr. SKENE.—I do not regard the words I read as a pledge, but as an indication of a policy which I do not think Great Britain would be likely to accept, or that we would accept. With regard to the six batters' question, which has been so ably dealt with, I desire to say that, like most other honorable members, I had no idea that the Act could be used in the way in which it was used. I find, on referring to Hansard, that the honorable member for Bland was the first to propose the provision under which action was taken, and he did so for the reason that it would cover most of the classes of labour likely to be affected through people being inveigled into unfair agreements in ignorance of the conditions obtaining in Australia.

The Attorney-General, who is responsible for the nice way in which the committee was led on, would not accept the proposal without this proviso—

Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to workmen exempted by the Minister for special skill required in the Commonwealth.

Everything turns upon the words "required in the Commonwealth," but, read in conjunction with the remark of the Attorney-General, honorable members were justified in the view that the provision would not do very much harm. The honorable gentleman told us that—

It is necessary to make provision to permit skilled labourers to enter the Commonwealth if they are of such a character as to be able to add to the industrial wealth of the community.

Therefore I take it that the question to be decided when the men arrive here is simply this—"Were they skilled workmen?"

Mr. TUDOR.—Under that interpretation of the Act you could crowd the place with skilled workmen and turn out those already here.

Mr. SKENE.—That is another aspect of the matter. When the honorable member for Bland moved the insertion of the provision, he did so in the interest of people who are not here now, but who may be coming here, so that they might not be inveigled through ignorance into entering into a wrong agreement. The Prime Minister read into the provision another intention—the intention to protect men already here.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Only so far as the words “required in the Commonwealth” necessitated an interpretation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—One must regard the conditions of the Commonwealth in order to discover what is required in it.

Mr. SKENE.—Such an inquiry, to be of any use, would have to be most exhaustive. The Prime Minister required an affidavit.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. What I said was that some statutory declarations were laid before me.

Mr. SKENE.—The Prime Minister, in speaking upon this matter at Hobart, on 14th February, is reported to have said—

He would explain the circumstances connected with the six hatters. The law which he was charged to administer said that he must satisfy himself that the persons who came to Australia under contract were only to be admitted if they possessed the skill that was required in the Commonwealth. It was the duty of the gentleman into whose employment the immigrants were going to satisfy him (Sir Edmund Barton) by affidavit or otherwise on that point.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—“Affidavit or otherwise.” What I received were statutory declarations, which are not sworn. I received no affidavits.

Mr. SKENE.—The point I wish to make is that a statutory declaration or an affidavit contains the opinion only of one man, which is not much evidence as to the requirements of the Commonwealth. I was quite satisfied with the explanation of the Prime Minister with regard to the reasons why information was asked for regarding the necessity for importing skilled labour, but my recollection is that after Mr. Anderson had given the necessary assurance he was required to show that he had advertised throughout the Commonwealth for men, and that he had used every effort to find out if the necessary labour were available in Australia before taking measures to import workmen. I understood that this was done by the Prime Minister.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—My recollection is that Mr. Anderson was not asked to do anything of the kind, but that he came forward and acted very properly. He should have supplied us with the information six or eight days before.

Mr. SKENE.—No doubt the provision may be regarded as one for the protection of the workmen who are already in the country, but it is not fair that any undue restriction should be placed upon the introduction of skilled workmen who may be necessary for the purpose of carrying on our manufacturing industries with success.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does not the honorable member consider that the people of this country are entitled to some protection?

Mr. SKENE.—I differ from the view taken by the honorable member, because I think that there should be no obstacle to fair competition between British subjects. It is not fair that a State like New South Wales, which desires to start a new industry, should be limited in its selection to the cast-off workmen of other States.

Mr. MCCAY.—But no such limit was imposed. As soon as it became apparent that these men were needed they were admitted.

Mr. SKENE.—With reference to the point raised by the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, I notice that during the debate upon the Immigration Restriction Bill the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said—

There is no desire to exclude men who voluntarily seek to make their home here for the purpose of engaging in manual labour or anything else, so long as they belong to a civilized white race and are themselves desirable immigrants. As I understand it, we have never in Australia taken up that narrow view of saying that we must keep Australia for ourselves and our children.

I do not know whether that expresses the view of the honorable member for Yarra.

Mr. TUDOR.—All I want is that all immigrants shall come as free men.

Mr. REID.—Then the judge who recently came from England to Western Australia was not a free man?

Mr. SKENE.—I do not think the attitude taken by the honorable member for Yarra is a sound one. If we are to obtain skilled labour from other parts of the world, we should obtain the best, and the best men will not leave the old country unless we give them some guarantee of work when they arrive here.

Mr. PAGE.—The leader of the Opposition told us that any agreement that might be entered into was valueless.

Mr. REID.—I said that the agreements had no effect the moment the men landed in Australia, if they were contrary to the law.

Mr. SKENE.—A question was raised as to whether the men came here under agreements embodying terms prescribed by the trades unions. It appears that there was no infringement of the trades union rules in their agreements, but I do not see why that should in any way influence the action of the Federal authorities. The States have different laws relating to labour questions, and we find that in Victoria the value of labour is fixed to some extent by the minimum wage provisions of the Factories and Shops Act, but the Prime Minister should not be placed in the position of practically dictating the labour conditions under which men should be admitted into the Commonwealth. Still less should he be subject to any dictation on the part of the trade unions. So much has been said regarding this question that I need not dwell upon it any further than to remark that I shall be glad to take advantage of the opportunity which I understand the leader of the Opposition intends to give us to vote for a repeal of this law.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for East Sydney has not said that.

Mr. SPENCE.—He wants to make the law more drastic.

Mr. REID.—Let me speak for myself. By the time that all honorable members who desire to do so have spoken for me I shall be charged with inconsistency.

Mr. SKENE.—A matter outside of the speech to which I wish to refer is the disorganization of the mail service during the recent strike in Victoria. It seems to me that if there is no power within the Constitution at present to enable the Government to step in and insure the carriage of the mails, some authority should be sought by the Federal Government. I find that in the United States there is no such thing as a stoppage of the mails. No matter what strikes may take place, the Federal authorities there have the necessary power to secure the carrying out of all contracts connected with the postal service. If we do not at present possess power we should acquire authority in some way. Quick and Garran, in their Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, referring to the position of the Federal Government of the United States in this connexion on page 964, say—

If domestic violence within the State is of such a character as to interfere with the operations of the Federal Government, the Federal Government may, without a summons from the States, interfere to preserve order. Thus, if a riot in a State interfered with the carriage of the federal mails, &c., the Federal Government could use all the force at its disposal not to protect the State, but to protect itself. These principles were conclusively settled in the United States in 1895.

If during the recent strike in Victoria an application had been made to the State Government by the Federal Government, the rolling stock and other railway plant and material necessary for carrying the mails probably would have been supplied to them, and the postal service might have been continued without interruption. I quite approve of the attitude taken by the Prime Minister in connexion with the recent strike, because the policy of non-interference on the part of the Federal Government left them free to act impartially in the event of any application being made to them for their assistance in an extremity. But the federal authorities occupy a very humiliating position when they are powerless to prevent the stoppage of mails through strikes or other labour disturbances. During the recent strike a train started from Adelaide on Friday night, and did not reach here until Tuesday morning.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has the United States Government ever exercised its power with regard to the conveyance of mails?

Mr. SKENE.—I do not think it has ever been found necessary to exercise it. There has never been a stoppage of the mails.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Oh, yes; they have been stopped many a time through strikes, and the power referred to by the honorable member has never been exercised by the federal authorities.

Mr. SKENE.—The United States Government may not have exercised its powers, but I think it is due to us that some control similar to that which they can exercise if they choose should be vested in the Federal Government. I do not know whether the State Government is under any penalty for a breach of contract in connexion with the carriage of mails, but I know that very serious penalties are incurred by mail contractors in the country, and that they have no redress, however unfortunate may be the conditions in which they are placed through drought or other adverse circumstances. In any case some means should be adopted for obviating a recurrence of difficulties such as those experienced in Victoria recently. I need not deal any further with this matter. The Governor-General's speech indicates that a large number of measures are to be brought forward for our consideration. We are to be called upon to deal with a Bill providing for the incorporation of New Guinea as a territory of the Commonwealth. I have been altogether opposed to any such course, and if we could honorably do so, we should retrace any steps that may have been taken in that direction. I fear that if we take over New Guinea, we shall be brought face to face with a very serious race problem in the near future. There are 350,000 natives in New Guinea, and I am afraid that we shall experience difficulties similar to those which beset the Cape Government in connexion with the control of Basutoland. That Government found it desirable, after having assumed control of that territory, to hand it back again to the Imperial Government, and I understand that they now contribute £18,000 a year towards the expenses of governing it as a Crown colony. It will also be a serious matter for us to depart from the conditions under which we now find ourselves in regard to having a continuous sea-coast border line. If we incorporate New Guinea within the Commonwealth, we shall have 1,500 miles of boundary line contiguous to nations which are on the whole hostile to us, and we can easily imagine the possibility of serious complications arising under such circumstances. However, I do not consider it necessary to deal with these matters at any greater length at present. I shall take the opportunity when they are submitted to us in detail to discuss them more exhaustively.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I do not know that we can quarrel with the quality of the work outlined in the Governor-General's speech, but I think that we may very well ask for a reduction in quantity. During last session a great deal of discussion took place upon measures which were eventually abandoned, and the whole of the time devoted to them was virtually wasted. I have no objection to devoting attention to measures which we have a reasonable prospect of passing, but it is requiring too much of honorable members to ask them to spend night after night discussing measures which in the end are set aside for lack of time. It would be wiser, under the circumstances, for the Government to reduce the work of the session to the smallest possible proportions, and to confine attention to Bills which it is absolutely necessary to pass before the expiration of the present Parliament. I propose to deal briefly with a few matters which in my judgment are worthy of special notice. The administrative work of the Ministry has been the subject of several compliments, and I think that we should specially recognise the splendid services which the Attorney-General rendered by his advocacy before the Full Court of Victoria of the interests of the Commonwealth in the Customs case which was recently decided. The very great importance of the services he then rendered, and of the decision which he was instrumental in obtaining can hardly be overestimated. I think it is due to him that we should mention the appreciation which we individually feel for the very fine work indeed which he did upon that occasion. I wish also to commend the Government for the stand they have taken with respect to one or two matters relating to assurance, which were mentioned here during the course of last session—matters in which I was particularly interested. It will be within the recollection of honorable members that I submitted several motions in reference to them, and I am exceedingly glad that there will now be no necessity to deal any further with two of them at least. I asked that the Government should take in hand the work of guaranteeing its own officers. I urged that the Government itself ought to create a fund into which guarantee premiums could be paid, and out of which any losses might be made good. This has now been done, and I think that the Ministry are to be complimented upon the step which they have taken. It is one which will eventually be commended upon all hands, and one which must bring about very good results. I understand, too, from a letter which I have received from the Prime Minister's department, that it is proposed to institute a system of fire insurance in connexion with the properties and plant of the Commonwealth. These two systems to which I have referred have already been practically adopted, perhaps there may be some hope for the proposal which I put forward last year in regard to the establishment of a Commonwealth Life Insurance Department. That of course is a very much larger order. It is a subject upon which there may be very wide differences of opinion, but it is within the recollection of honorable members that last session the principle was defeated only by the narrow majority of one, and the probability is that if the issue were made a direct one, the proposal would be carried. Under these circumstances I trust that the Government will anticipate any motion upon the subject and declare in the readiest manner possible what their proposals are. Perhaps one of the most important statements made during the debate was that of the leader of the Opposition last night in regard to his policy concerning the Tariff. Honorable members upon the protectionist side of the Chamber had hoped that that matter had been definitely settled for some time at least. Personally I do not think that it should be touched again during the whole of the book-keeping period. But, from the right honorable member's statement, it appears that some of the items of the Tariff are to be made the subject of contention at the next general election.

MR. THOMAS.—We ought to have free timber.

MR. HUME COOK.—The trouble is that if the Tariff be re-opened at all, every honorable member who is interested in any particular item will want the duty upon it reviewed, and there will be no means of preventing that from being done. For example, I might desire to see an increased duty upon nails, just as the honorable member for Barrier might wish to have mining timber placed upon the free list. But, though I was very sorry to hear the declaration of the leader of the Opposition, I am hopeful that now we understand exactly what he proposes, the result may be placed beyond doubt. As far as I can understand the electors of Australia, free-traders and protectionists alike, are heartily sick of the Tariff question for the present. Therefore I hope that the electors will see that that matter will be left severely alone for a certain period at any rate, so that that peace may be conferred upon the community which is necessary to commercial prosperity. In the Governor-General's speech a passing reference is made to the recent great utterance of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. No further reference could be made to it in that deliverance, especially as the Government do not propose to re-open the Tariff question. At the same time it is encouraging to find a great statesman like Mr. Chamberlain at last indicating that he will put forward some proposition in respect of the matter of preferential trade. I do not know that we can give a preference of 5 or 10 per cent. to all classes of British goods. I have carefully thought the matter over, and it appears to me that the only way in which it could be dealt with effectively, would be by scheduling three or four items of commerce which might be advantageously admitted to Australia, and a similar number of articles which might be thus admitted into Great Britain. Amongst our chief exports are such articles of commerce as meat, wine, hides, tallow, and possibly wheat. These might be scheduled, and admitted to Great Britain at a lower rate than would be charged upon similar articles coming from the continent and elsewhere. On the other hand, there are items which would correspond to the export value of those I have mentioned, and which might be admitted into Australia. Of course it is a matter for mutual arrangement but in that way I think we might arrive at the efficacy and practicability of reciprocal trade. I do not think that we should give any general preference to British goods, because a difficulty will always arise as to their origin. We know perfectly well that quite a number of articles which are imported as British goods are not made in Britain at all. They are made in Germany and elsewhere, and simply pass through commercial houses in the United Kingdom. By a system such as I have suggested, we could admit articles which are known to have been manufactured in Great Britain as a quid pro quo for the admission of certain articles from Australia into Great Britain. If the latter country is prepared to give us a preference representing £500,000 or £600,000 worth of her trade, we should be prepared to reciprocate. It is merely a matter of adjustment between the two countries. The question of the establishment of a High Court has been discussed at some length. As a layman I am not the best qualified to express an opinion on the subject, but I do feel that there is a necessity for the establishment of that tribunal. I am therefore inclined to follow the Government, notwithstanding what has been said by such able lawyers as the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. Next to the Judiciary Bill the most important measure referred to in the Governor-General's speech is the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. For the most part I indorse all that has been said in reference to that measure, and I hope to witness its speedy passage into law. Legislation of the character promised is in the interests of commercial peace, and will make for prosperity amongst all classes in Australia. What will prove the chief topic of discussion, and the principal cause of disension during the present session is the naval subsidy. By listening to what the Prime Minister had to say to a Melbourne audience upon this subject, and by reading all that I possibly could in regard to it, I have endeavoured to arrive at its true bearings, but I am not yet convinced that the Government have adopted the right policy in this connexion. I feel that at this stage we are about to establish a precedent which, if followed to its logical conclusion, must lead to further contributions towards supporting the Imperial Government. To my mind there is another ideal at which we should aim—namely, the control and management of our own naval forces, seeing that we have to find the money for our own defence. Though I do not definitely commit myself to oppose the Government in this matter, I feel very grave doubts as to whether they are asking us to take the right course, and I shall, therefore, reserve my decision until the Bill is actually before us. It is worthy of notice, however, that, though we are told by the Prime Minister that the Commonwealth has not been committed to anything until Parliament ratifies the agreement arrived at, the additional sum which Australia is asked for has been placed upon the British estimates.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Not the money which this House is asked to vote.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The additional sum which we are asked to vote has been included in the Estimates submitted to the House of Commons, with an explanatory note to the effect that this money is expected to be received in accordance with the promise of the Prime Minister. It is also worthy of remark that men like Sir Charles Dilke and others affirm that this additional sum of money is of no value whatever to the British people. I cannot quote the exact phraseology, but the effect was that the spontaneous offering of the Commonwealth, and of the various States in connexion with the African war, were of value, while the sum of money now asked for was of no value. I am inclined to agree with that opinion, because it is not exactly a question of money, but a question of principle. My aim is that all expenditure of money on our own defences should be controlled by ourselves, and that the men to be paid with that money to manage our ships should be Australians. Whether we take these ships for our defence on lease, licence, or conditional purchase, they should be officered and manned by Australians receiving Australian money, and under the control of the Australian Parliament, rather than the control of some other body thousands of miles away. That is my present opinion, which I shall venture to voice and maintain until I hear good reason to the contrary. Such a policy would do much more towards fostering a genuine patriotic sentiment in our naval defence force, than could possibly be created amongst Britishers imported in ships which do not belong to us, and receiving our money merely in order to carry out a contract. We desire to stimulate an Australian feeling and sentiment in respect to Australian affairs, and that sentiment cannot be purchased, but must be created by giving a live and genuine interest in our own concerns. There is another matter in connexion with the defences on which I should like to say a word or two. I was not altogether pleased or satisfied with the action of the Ministry in an episode connected with the Easter encampment. It will be recollected that as a result of the orders of the general officer commanding, two of our most highly trained and respected volunteer officers have asked to be placed on the retired list. Both are citizen soldiers, one with eighteen years' experience, and the other, I believe, with 24 years' experience. So far as I am able to judge, both were quite fit to take command of a battalion or brigade at the encampment, and being senior officers they were, as I read the regulations, entitled to do so. But owing to some idea which the general entertained as to their incompetency to give instructions in camp, they were passed over, and a junior officer appointed. The volunteer officers naturally enough felt aggrieved, and protested ; but the Ministry, unfortunately, felt obliged to support the general officer commanding. A most regrettable result is that the services of these two officers are lost to the Commonwealth. It is deplorable that after men have given years of volunteer service at a cost to themselves of not only labour and time, but also of a good deal of money, they should by reason of what they conceive to be an affront be compelled to retire. Had a strong stand been taken by the Ministry there might have been a different result. At this stage I do not wish to say more, because the question will arise again in connexion with defence matters, when the subject of a citizen soldiery is being discussed. I am not devoting any more than passing attention to the men concerned ; it is the principle underlying their retirement and the slight put on the citizen soldiery which affects me. In the first Governor-General's speech we were promised that in the Defence Bill special care would be taken by the Government to avail themselves of a citizen soldiery. Emphasis was laid on that in the speech, but the first Defence Bill did not disclose any great evidence of the fulfilment of the promise, and the episode to which I have referred tends to show that the Imperial idea and regular soldiers are to have the consideration of the Ministry rather than the Australian idea and citizen soldiers whose conduct has been so lauded. The last, but by far the most, important point in the Governor-General's speech to which I wish to direct attention concerns the finances of Australia. The Federal Parliament has been charged outside with passing Acts which tend to increase the burden of debt borne by the people of Australia. No later than to-day it was pointed out in debate that the expenditure is increasing, and that some of the benefits which federation was to bring about are not yet in evidence. That is quite true.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Sydney Daily Telegraph expresses the opinion to-day that at no point can the Commonwealth be charged with extravagance.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Federal expenditure and federal extravagance are two different things, and I think the Sydney Daily Telegraph is right when it says we cannot be charged with extravagance, though it may be successfully maintained that the expenditure is increasing. But there must necessarily be an increase of expenditure when new departments and officers are created and new work undertaken. The proposals for a High Court, a naval subsidy, an Inter-State Commission, and the appointment of a High Commissioner, all prove that there is very soon to be increased federal expenditure. As one who strongly advocated federation, I feel I am not keeping my contract with the people whom I asked to support the Bill. We are not making some of those savings which I believe can and ought to be made. When the Constitution Bill was before the people, it was freely stated by the advocates of federation that by its adoption large sums would be saved. I then believed that to be so, I believe it now, and I was honest in advocating the Bill ; but up to the present we have not seen any great evidence of those savings. The only direction in which any reduction has taken place is in the military estimates.

Mr. TUDOR.—The expenditure is no less than under the State Legislatures.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Speaking from memory, I think that in the pre-federation days the expenditure was about £860,000, and is now about £700,000, showing a saving of £160,000. But the whole of that saving will be more than eaten up if the proposals for a High Court, a naval subsidy, and other matters have to be provided for. In view of these facts, what are we to do to keep faith with the public as to the savings to be made? My opinion is that the savings ought to be effected by consolidating the loans of the several States. Almost every speaker in the course of this debate has made reference to the matter, but only two ideas have been put forward, first that there should be consolidation, and next that there should be restriction on future borrowing by the States. No suggestion has been made, however, as to how the consolidation should take place or how the restriction should operate. With consolidation there should, in my opinion, be some restriction, but not the absolute restriction indicated by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. It would be ridiculous to tie up the States and render it impossible for them to borrow, seeing that they have had left to them matters of internal development and of social and domestic legislation which must necessarily entail the raising of loans in the future. The States have work to do which, as I say, can only be done by further borrowing, though, on the other hand, almost all the States have now borrowed up to what may be called the limit of their powers. Taking it for granted that the loans are to be consolidated, the restriction should take the form of limiting future borrowings on a population basis; that is, any future debts contracted by the States might be at the rate of so much per 100,000 inhabitants. If that were taken as the basis for Victoria, and the raising of £1,000,000 allowed, for each 100,000 people, the future borrowing power of the State would amount to another £10,000,000. I do not think Victoria should borrow that amount, or any amount, I merely use these figures for illustration. The idea of a population basis may not be wholly scientific, but at any rate it is sound and safe. Other elements must necessarily enter into consideration. There are possibilities of development in some States which are not in evidence in other States; but in the last analysis we come to the conclusion that the individuals composing the State have to pay the interest. On the units depend the burden; and if the population increases the State debts may increase, but if the population does not increase there must be no further borrowing. All future State borrowing should, in my opinion, be done through the Commonwealth. If the Commonwealth is going to take any interest in the matter at all, it has a right to see that the conditions as to the restriction are enforced, and there is the more special reason that if the loans are floated through the Commonwealth agency, we shall be able to avoid conflict between State and State and between the States and the Commonwealth in the money market. Such regulations would all tend to the benefit of the States. The position seems to be, taking the Premiers' conference as a guide, that the Premiers of the States are anxious for the Commonwealth to take over the debts of the States, and to have unrestricted borrowing powers. What then should be the position of the Commonwealth? Under the Constitution, the Federal Parliament may act in this matter upon its own discretion; there is no obligation upon it to act. That being the case, this Parliament will probably not interfere until it is asked to do so by the Governments of the States concerned. When the States learn that by utilizing the credit of the Commonwealth they can obtain an advantage which their own credit will not give them, they will probably be prepared to submit to the conditions which we shall seek to impose upon them, and we shall be entitled to impose conditions and restrictions if we lend them our credit, because credit is capital, and will be proved to be so, when the consolidations and conversions of State loans take place. Let us therefore consider what are the advantages of consolidation and conversion, and how they may be brought about. The opinion is held by a large number of people that a conversion cannot be brought about until the due date of the loan concerned, or somewhere near that time. That is a fallacy. I think the Commonwealth could begin the conversion of the State debts at any time, and convert any amount of indebtedness it, in its discretion, chose to so convert. That being so, the States could at any time obtain the advantage which the use of the credit of the Commonwealth would bring to them. I do not know that many people recognise how much profit there is to be obtained by the conversion of State loans. I hold—I may be wrong—that the Commonwealth could immediately begin to convert £100,000,000 of State debts. In converting that amount of State indebtedness there would be a very substantial initial profit. The average interest paid on the States' debts to-day will be found upon careful analysis to be something like 4 per cent. Now, if we take the Canadian figures as a basis, the Commonwealth Government could convert the States' debts upon an interest charge of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. To be on the safe side, however, I will put the interest charge at 3 per cent., and the difference of 1 per cent. would give a clear saving upon £100,000,000 of £1,000,000 per annum. That saving could be very largely supplemented by the profit to be made by the conversion. From an analysis of the Australian stocks upon the London market at the present time, it will be found that the average ruling price is about £92 or £93. That is fairly high as stocks go, but I make bold to say that Commonwealth stock would probably bring £97 or £98, a difference of £3 or £4 upon every £100. That would give, in the conversion of £100,000,000 of stock, a clear profit less charges and expenses of some £3,000,000. That being so, I marvel that the States do not immediately ask the Commonwealth to lend them its credit, so that the advantages I have pointed out may be obtained. But though those advantages can be obtained—

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Not now.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I think so. Perhaps the advantage would not be so great at the present time, but the gain upon so large an amount in any case would be very substantial. I think, however, that the £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 of profit should not be handed back to the States' Governments to spend as they like, but should go to the immediate redemption of the States' debts, the total amount of their indebtedness being reduced by the profit secured. That would be the first step. The next step would be the creation of a sinking fund, such as has been outlined by the Attorney-General in his reply to the Premier of Victoria. There are several ways of creating a sinking fund, and some of them are open to objection. It is suggested that the States should be asked to pay so much per annum out of their revenue account towards a sinking fund which would gradually reduce their indebtedness, but I think that if that were done it would probably be found in the working out of the scheme that the States would actually be paying more than they are now paying. My suggestion is that the difference between the rate of interest which the States are now paying, and the rate which will have to be paid for the Commonwealth loan should be devoted to the creation of a sinking fund. If the average rate of interest now paid is 4 per cent., and the average rate charged on Commonwealth stock is 3 per cent., the States would contribute 1 per cent. towards the gradual reduction of their indebtedness, and yet they would not be paying any more money on the whole than they now pay. That contribution should be vested in a board of commissioners, who would not be subject to the control of either this Parliament or of any of the Parliaments of the States. They in their discretion should have the right to purchase States stock, or otherwise invest the money intrusted to them as they deemed most profitable and fitting. Thus two benefits would accrue to the States from the conversion of their loans. They would benefit in the reduction of their indebtedness by the amount of the profit made by the conversion, and they would gain in the gradual reduction of their indebtedness through the medium of a sinking fund created and used in the way I have indicated. I do not suppose that matters of this kind will be dealt with during the present session, but I feel that it is not exactly a waste of time to discuss methods of conversion and the proper conditions and restrictions to be imposed upon the States in connexion with them, because public opinion must be educated on the subject, and we must have the support of the people outside before any economic proposals can be put forward. The Commonwealth is in the position of being able to render the States a great financial service, but in doing so it is entitled to impose conditions and restrictions such as I have outlined. All these matters should be placed before the public, and therefore, although the subject has not been given great prominence in the Governor-General's speech, I have ventured to put forward two or three suggestions in regard to it in the hope that they may form the basis of further consideration. Having said so much, I will conclude by repeating that, until some of the great and substantial savings which were promised to the electors when they were asked to accept the Commonwealth Bill have been obtained, we shall not have kept faith with them. Until this be done, this Parliament will hardly have justified its existence, notwithstanding the fact the federation is growing in favour with the public, and that there is an increasing disposition to clothe the federal authority with greater powers and privilege. As a Legislature, the people are getting greater confidence in us, but our chief aim must be to secure those financial and economic advantages for which federation was primarily adopted. Until we do that, we shall not have made the progress we hoped for, nor have kept our promises to the electors.

Mr. F. E. McLEAN (Lang).—I find myself in agreement with a great deal which the honorable member for Bourke has said, though at the outset I differ from him as to the inadvisability of reopening the Tariff question in connexion with the approaching elections. I do not see how it is possible for honorable gentlemen who have taken a vigorous stand against many of the duties in the Tariff to recede from their position, and accept it as a fair compromise between the opposing doctrines of free-trade and protection. However much we may have hoped at one time to settle the fiscal question during the first Parliament, no honorable member who took part in the discussions of last session, can have any reasonable hope that the question has been finally settled. I do not wish at this stage to advance particular arguments in favour of the re-opening of the matter, but it appears to me that the high feeling which prevailed during the discussion of the Tariff in this Chamber, and the evident dissatisfaction shown in the States at the result of our labours, make it abundantly clear that it must be reopened, and that a more satisfactory settlement must be obtained before anything like fiscal peace can rule throughout the Commonwealth. I hope, however, that when the question is again referred to the electors, and dealt with in Parliament, we shall, after reasonable deliberation and discussion, reach a settlement which will last for some years. The programme placed before us by the Governor-General brings very forcibly to mind the fact that we are very far from having accomplished the constructive work of federation, and that a great deal remains to be done before the federal machinery can be said to be in complete working order. I listened with a very great deal of attention to the speeches of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. They advanced very strong arguments in favour of the House pausing before committing itself to the great expense involved in the creation of a High Court. I am not prepared to express off-hand a definite opinion upon the subject; but such a pretentious establishment as it was proposed to create does not seem to be called for by the necessities of the situation, and in view of the very serious financial strain which the people of the Commonwealth have been labouring under during the past year or two, we should be very slow to commit them to any huge expenditure which is not absolutely necessary. I think that Ministers are deserving of very great censure for having allowed the citizens of the Commonwealth to remain for so many months without any legal redress against the Federal Government. The passage of an Act of Parliament at the close of last session conferring federal jurisdiction upon the States' courts seemed to constitute a sort of death-bed repentance on the part of the Government for long neglect of what should have been one of its first duties. We are assured by the Government that an early opportunity will be offered Parliament for considering the report of the commission appointed to inquire as to the sites most suitable for the federal capital. I cannot congratulate the Government upon the measures they have adopted to carry out the compact between the States regarding the federal capital. There was absolutely no reason why the commission, if necessary, should not have been appointed within six months of the assembling of Parliament, but fully eighteen months elapsed, and it was only at the expiration of last session that a roving commission was appointed to obtain evidence which was already in the possession of the State Government. The commission should have been appointed at least twelve months before, so that the results of its deliberations might have been placed before the Parliament within a reasonable period. It is to be hoped that the Government will be true to their promise, and push on the selection of the federal capital site as a matter of urgency. I find myself in agreement with the Government and with the leader of the Opposition in the matter of the proposed subsidy to the Imperial navy, and I altogether dissent from those who think that we should at this stage take upon ourselves the responsibility of forming an Australian navy, with all its attendant huge expenditure. I believe that questions of defence must necessarily assume an Imperial aspect so long as we remain a part of the British Empire, and I am certain that it is the desire of this Parliament, and of the vast majority of the people of the Commonwealth, to remain a part of the Empire. I am satisfied that our most efficient means of naval defence will be provided by an Imperial squadron stationed in these waters, and it is our duty to the Empire and to ourselves to contribute as liberally as circumstances will permit. I know that Sir Charles Dilke, and others, have urged that a contribution of £200,000 would be a paltry one, and that it would not materially help the Imperial Government, but I believe that in our present circumstances that amount is quite as large as the people of Australia are able to afford. We cannot burden the Commonwealth in these early days of its career with any extravagant expenditure, but I think we are bound to respond to the demand made upon us by the Imperial Government to contribute somewhat more liberally than in the past towards the maintenance of an efficient squadron in Australian waters. It has been urged by some honorable members that we should endeavour to create the nucleus of an Australian navy, that we should have our own ships and our own sons manning them. It is held that, in this way, we should build up a patriotic sentiment. But I would ask honorable members what they understand by those words? It seems to me that every loyal Australian is a loyal Briton, and if our sons show their loyalty by desiring to serve in the Imperial naval service, they will be manifesting just as high patriotism as if they entered an Australian naval service. In this matter we must stand or fall together, as part of a great Empire, and the true patriotism we ought to encourage in our sons is one that will not be bound by geographical limits, but will embrace the whole Empire of which we form a part. It has already been pointed out that to create even a small Australian navy, which would probably be inadequate to the service demanded of it, would require a large initial outlay. I am not prepared to say how much, but, knowing what we do of the large expenditure involved in the construction of first-class battle ships, we can realize that some millions would be required to provide vessels, and that we should then have to incur very heavy expense for maintenance. If we can enter into an arrangement with the Imperial Government to give us an efficient squadron, we shall make an excellent bargain, and secure for the smallest amount of money the best service we could have. I understand that an arrangement has been made by which Australian youths can derive the full benefit of training in the Imperial navy.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There are provisions in the agreement by which the crew of one of the second-class cruisers shall consist wholly of Australians and New Zealanders. There are also provisions that the minimum crews of three training ships shall be Australians and New Zealanders, and that their reserves shall be similarly constituted, so that with active sailors and reservists we shall have about 1,600 Australians and New Zealanders among the men required to fully man the squadron.

Mr. F. E. McLEAN.—The provisional arrangement, entered into subject to the approval of Parliament, must commend itself to us on the ground of economy, and as one that is just and equitable. We are bound by every consideration of Imperial patriotism to contribute to the defence of the Empire. Even if it were possible for us to provide a fleet for our own defence, the obligation would still rest upon us to contribute if we could towards the maintenance of the Imperial navy, and the defence of our great trade routes and interests in far distant waters. I believe that in a general way our highest duty to the Empire is to be discharged by our looking after that portion of it which has been committed to our charge; but we are not departing from that principle when we contribute to the maintenance of the Imperial squadron in these waters. We could not expect to be able to give our own people a better training than they would receive in the Imperial squadron, even if we had vessels of our own, and I believe the arrangements made as time goes on will secure the highest advantages to those Australians who wish to enter the Imperial naval forces. The Governor-General's speech foreshadowed one of the most important measures that can come before Parliament. I refer to the Patents Bill, which I understand is to be introduced into this House by the Minister of Trade and Customs. I would urge the Government to press on with that measure at the earliest possible moment. No advantage that we can derive from the Federation is likely to prove of greater service than the establishment of proper patent laws. Already a large number of small inventors, who are not able to incur the expense of registering their patents in the various States, are waiting for the passage of this legislation, which, I understand, will reduce the cost of protecting patents to a material extent. At any rate, we are sadly in want of some comprehensive law relating to patents. The honorable member for Bourke has referred to a question in which the Attorney-General is taking a very great interest—namely, that of converting the State loans into Commonwealth stock, and has spoken generally of the effect of such a course upon the finances of the various States. I think it should be impressed upon all the State Parliaments, as I am sure it has been upon the minds of honorable members of this House, that Australian credit is affected by the conditions prevailing all over the States. It is necessary that we should preserve the solvency of the weakest State in the union—that in some way or other we should come to its assistance—because Australia is bound to suffer as the result of State misgovernment or extravagance, or of any repudiation of State loan obligations that might be brought about by unfortunate circumstances. Therefore, by assisting in the conversion of the State loans, the Commonwealth Government are in a position to very materially enhance the credit of all the States. But it is obvious that this work must be proceeded with very cautiously. There can be no forcing of federal offices upon the State Governments. The friendly services which the Commonwealth is willing to undertake on behalf of the States can be undertaken only at the request of the State Governments, and at the present time there appears to be a reluctance on their part to give the assurances required before the Commonwealth can assume any obligations in this respect. I hope that this Parliament will pursue a policy of rigid economy in the administration of public affairs. It has been said by some newspapers that so far the Commonwealth Parliament cannot be accused of any very great extravagance in the management of its affairs. I hope that it will adopt a similar course in the future, that no great extravagance will be manifested, and that it will afford an object lesson to all the States in the union. We should be careful not to commit ourselves to any obligations on behalf of the States unless satisfactory assurances are forthcoming that the latter will not be guilty of extravagant borrowing. If the Commonwealth is to assume any responsibility in regard to State loans, there must be a limit put upon State borrowing. I am not prepared to follow in the footsteps of the honorable member for Bourke, by declaring that we could limit the borrowings of the States proportionately to their population. After all, these matters must be determined by the credit of the States themselves, by the nature of the works which have been undertaken with loan moneys, and by the revenue derived from those works. We must be painfully aware of the fact that throughout Australia a strong feeling has been manifested that federation has not come up to expectations. That may be a natural result proceeding from high expectations. Possibly the people of Australia expected that the very existence of a federal union would itself enhance their credit, improve their trade, and bring about conditions altogether favourable to them. If so, there is naturally a feeling of disappointment. At the same time, I think that much disappointment has arisen from the fact that the Government themselves have not been firm in their administration in some directions, whilst they have been very much too firm in others. I cannot allow the question of the exclusion of the six hatters to pass without expressing my very strong opinion that the Government in that case strained the law very considerably. I cannot help thinking that, at the outset, they might have allowed the exemption which was subsequently granted, instead of exposing this Parliament and themselves to a very great deal of ridicule. The honorable member for Bland, who was responsible for the amendment under which the hatters were for a time excluded, has expressed himself as being in thorough accord with the Prime Minister upon that matter, and the latter has urged again and again that he merely carried out the law. I hold that there should have been no hesitation on the part of the Government in admitting these men at once. The proviso which was introduced by the Attorney-General in connexion with the amendment of the honorable member for Bland was intended to be used by the Government in such a case, and certainly not after the rigid inquiry which the Prime Minister deemed it his duty to undertake. It seems to me a humiliating spectacle for the Prime Minister to constitute himself a court of inquiry to determine the capacity of certain workmen from Great Britain who seek to land here, and the necessity for that class of labour in Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — The honorable member would not have had me decide without inquiry?

Mr. F. E. McLEAN. — The Prime Minister's inquiry need only have been of a very limited character.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Would not the honorable member have me take the trouble to ascertain what those men were?

Mr. F. E. McLEAN. — Yes, I would justify the Prime Minister in demanding both from the gentleman responsible for bringing the hatters to Australia, and from the men themselves, some affidavits as to the trade and occupation which they were about to follow, and the nature of the agreements into which they had entered. But the agreements into which they had entered bore on their face sufficient evidence that that class of labour was required in the Commonwealth. The Prime Minister cannot constitute himself a competent court to inquire into the necessity for obtaining men in a particular trade at a particular time. The very fact that a large manufacturer had sent to the old country to bring men to Australia, and contracted to pay them the current rate of wages, is in itself evidence that that class of labour was required. It was not cases of that kind that the amendment of the honorable member for Bland was intended to meet. It was designed rather to prohibit the importation of large bodies of men who might be brought to Australia under contract for the purpose of depressing wages here, or of interfering in times of strikes with the arrangements between masters and men. In the light of what has happened, however, it will be absolutely necessary for the Commonwealth Parliament to deal with the question of immigration again, and to liberalize the law so that no white British subject coming to Australia to work at an honest trade shall be prohibited from landing.

MR. WATSON.—How can that fact be ascertained without some sort of preliminary inquiry?

MR. F. E. McLEAN.—I do not know that any elaborate inquiry would have to be made to discover that. A man's agreement in itself is evidence that he is coming here to accept bonâ fide employment. The honorable member for Bland knows perfectly well that no manufacturer would send to the other end of the world to secure workmen, and agree to pay them the wages current in Australia, unless he believed there was a necessity for so doing. Naturally, upon starting a new industry a manufacturer would desire to obtain the most highly-skilled labour procurable, and, consequently, he would go to those centres where men had an opportunity of becoming thoroughly efficient in their trade.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—The fact that they are under contract is sufficient evidence that they are exempted from being under contract?

MR. F. E. McLEAN.—The fact that they are under contract at the rate of wages current in Australia is evidence that their services are required here. Undoubtedly those men should have been admitted without exposing the Commonwealth to the ridicule of the whole world. Now the impression prevails abroad that Australia does not extend a hearty welcome to British workmen. So far from encouraging their presence here, we discourage them by leading them to believe that they will be exposed to a kind of Ministerial inquiry as to their fitness before they are allowed to land. I suppose we are all agreed that Australia requires a very much larger population to develop her resources, and to place her in a foremost position amongst the nations of the world. But the Government have broadcasted to the world a notification that Australia does not welcome British workmen—that Australia is in no need of population. It is practically a placard to the whole world that Australia wishes the work here to be shared amongst the men who are here. Every other new country in the world is seeking to attract population by offering inducements to able-bodied men to come and settle. Here, however, we are pursuing a policy of discouraging such men. I am thoroughly with the Government in their desire to restrict undesirable immigration and in trying to prevent an influx of coloured and inferior races, or the landing here of men not capable of existing by their own labour. Thus far, the Government will find members of the Opposition supporting their policy as vigorously as honorable members behind the Ministerial benches. But when it comes to refusing to admit our own flesh and blood—men with no blemish in health or character, who have a trade at their fingers' ends, and are coming here under contract to pursue that trade—it is time to seriously consider whether we have not gone too far, and whether we should not at once liberalize this Act in such a way as to admit any free white man—or free Britisher, at any rate—who comes here to earn his livelihood. The Minister for Trade and Customs is not at present in the chamber; but a great deal has been said about his administration of that department. I do not propose to go further than express a hope that, for the future, the Minister will recognise that all the mercantile community in the Commonwealth are not dishonest men seeking to defraud the Customs, and that they should not be treated as criminals for the making of purely clerical mistakes. It was never the intention of Parliament when the Customs Act was passed that respectable honest traders would be placed in such a position. This view has been so often expressed before, and the matter has been so thoroughly discussed in the newspapers and on public platforms throughout the Commonwealth that it is almost like wearing the subject threadbare to make any further reference to it. This, however, is the first opportunity honorable members have had of expressing their opinions since last session on what must be considered the unnecessarily severe administration of the Customs Act by the Minister. I do not for one moment attempt to defend a person who may try in any shape or form to defraud the Customs revenue. Much as we may deplore the existence of so high a Tariff as has been imposed, and much as we may regret the mistaken policy that has been accepted by a majority of honorable members, we still recognise that it is the duty of the Government to see that the duties are paid according to law. But it is no part of the duty of the Government to persecute and harass traders, or to treat mere clerical mistakes, which may be made by even careful men in any office, as if they were crimes. I hope that the Minister, without relaxing the severity of his treatment of those who seek to fraudulently escape their obligations, will at least show some consideration for those who, as his own officers know, have only made mistakes. A number of subjects are touched on in His Excellency's speech which, it is unnecessary to say, this Parliament will have no opportunity of dealing with in the present session. His Excellency's speech refers to other measures which are in course of preparation, or are already prepared, but which, it is feared, there will be no time to consider; and I join with the honorable member for Bourke in expressing the hope that the Government will not try to do too much, but will content themselves with passing measures which are absolutely necessary. If it is proved to the satisfaction of the House that a High Court must be established before the federal machinery is in perfect working order, let the Bill be pressed forward, and a decision come to at the earliest possible moment. But I repeat that the business of the session should be confined to measures which are absolutely necessary. No mere "show" legislation should be attempted. We are on the eve of an election, and there is great temptation to members and Ministers to bring forward measures which will commend themselves to the public; but I hope that during this short session in which it is not possible to achieve a very large amount of legislation, we shall approach the consideration of those questions only, the settlement of which is absolutely demanded by the necessities of the situation.

Debate (on motion by Mr. V. L. SOLOMON) adjourned.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until to-morrow, at half-past two o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT.

NORTHERN TERRITORY.

Motion (by Sir EDMUND BARTON) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether, since the House last met before the recess, the promise to make inquiries as to the terms on which South Australia was willing to part with the Northern Territory to the Commonwealth has been carried out? I should like to know what communications have been entered into with the South Australian Government on the matter.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter, Minister for External Affairs).—In reply. Before Parliament prorogued, there was a communication before the House on this subject. Soon after Parliament went into recess, it became apparent that the Government of South Australia intended to construct, or desired to construct, a transcontinental railway on the land grant system, and shortly afterwards a Bill was passed by the South Australian Legislature giving the necessary powers. It was not possible, by any means known to the Constitution, for the Commonwealth to interfere in a matter of the kind—not that the Commonwealth would have interfered had it been possible to do so—but the action taken by the South Australian Government justified me in making inquiries as to whether there was still a desire that the Northern Territory should be taken over by the Federal Government. If I recollect rightly, a modified reply was given at first to the effect—I do not put this as a certain statement, because, in order to do that, I should have to refer to the papers—that it was not intended for the present to press the offer of the territory to the Federal Government. Then I think I wrote another letter asking the South Australian Government to put the matter in a more certain way, and I was informed in reply that the offer was withdrawn, the words being added “for the present”—but whether for the present or not, the offer was withdrawn. I think the first reply I got was that the offer must be considered to be in abeyance, and, when I asked for something more definite, I was told it was withdrawn for the present. To the best of my recollection that is how the matter stands.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 28 May, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

POST AND TELEGRAPH OFFICE, MOUNT GAMBIER.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General, without notice, if it is the intention of his department to take any steps to improve the postal and telegraphic facilities at Mount Gambier?

Senator DRAKE.—The matter is now under consideration. It is a question as to whether the present post-office building shall be enlarged and improved, or whether a new one shall be erected. That is a matter which for certain reasons—obvious ones, I think—has not yet been decided. If the honorable senator will give notice of his question I might be able to furnish him with fuller information.

PAPER.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following paper:—

Regulations under the Post and Telegraph Act and Post and Telegraph Rates Act.

Ordered to be printed.

METEOROLOGICAL REPORTS.

Senator MACFARLANE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Will arrangements be made to permit the same amount of daily weather and general meteorological reports to be telegraphed to the Observatory in Tasmania as is received from Tasmania?

2. If this will entail expense and exceed the free transmission allowed by the Eastern Extension Cable Company, will he arrange to permit such free transmission to be equally distributed between Victoria and Tasmania?

Senator DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable senator's questions:—

1. The matter is now under consideration, with a view to such arrangements being made.

2. The matter of apportioning any expense that it may be necessary to incur for transmission over the cable will be dealt with when arrangements have been completed.

SHIPS' STORES.

Senator PULSFORD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What was the total amount of duty collected on ships' stores during 1902, and what was the amount thereof credited to each State?

2. On what basis is the division made of the duty collected on ships' stores between, say, Fremantle and Sydney?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Total amount of duty collected during 1902 is shown in attached return (as regards Victoria and Queensland, however, the only available return is for the twelve months ending 30th September, 1902). No amount has as yet been credited to each State.

2. The basis of the division of the duty collected has not as yet been determined. Pending decision in the appeal case to the Privy Council, the crediting and distribution of the amounts collected have not as yet been effected.

The attached return is in these terms—

Total amount of duty collected on ships' stores during 1902, £19,208.

NOTE.—The Victorian and Queensland figures are from 8th October, 1901, to 30th September, 1902, the figures for 1902 not being available.

DEFENCE FORCE.

Senator BARRETT asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Is it the intention of the Government to lay on the table all the papers in connexion with the proposed retirement of Lieutenants Colonel Braithwaite and Reay?

Senator DRAKE.—The following is the answer to the honorable senator's question :—

The Government is of opinion that no good purpose would be served by doing so, and would suggest to the honorable member not to press the question.

Senator DE LARGIE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. In connexion with the parade of Commonwealth troops before the Japanese at Albert Park last Saturday, was the attendance of the men enforced by a threat of a fine of 7s. 6d. against every militiaman absent?

2. Will such fine be enforced against any militiamen who declined to attend?

3. Were the men ordered to remove their helmets and cheer the Japanese?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows :—

1. No threats were made upon the occasion mentioned.

2. The parade upon Saturday, the 23rd inst., was the half-yearly inspection by the commandant. In accordance with the Victorian regulations men absent on the occasion will be fined 7s. 6d.

3. Yes.

LANDING PERMITS: SOUTH AFRICA.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Was the Commonwealth Government requested by the Imperial authorities to issue permits granting permission to land in South Africa?

2. Did the Commonwealth Government arrange with the State Governments for the issue of such permits?

3. Over what period did the work of issue extend?

4. How many of such permits were issued by each State respectively?

5. Did not the Imperial authorities express a willingness to remunerate the officials employed in the issue of such permits?

6. Have any payments been made on account of the work of issue?

Senator DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable senator's questions :—

1. Yes.

2. The work was carried out under the supervision of the Department of External Affairs, with the assistance of State officers, in States other than Victoria.

3. January to October, 1902.

4. No complete return is available, but to 31st August, 1902, the figures were :—New South Wales, 830; Victoria, 1,670; Queensland, 254; South Australia, 290; Western Australia, 443; Tasmania, 212.

5. No.

6. No.

ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Senator PULSFORD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Is the work of preparing the new electoral rolls sufficiently well advanced for the Government to be able to say that they will be ready without doubt in ample time for the elections that must be held towards the close of the year?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows :—

My colleague, the Minister for Home Affairs, informs me that every effort is being made to expedite this matter, and he is confident that the rolls will be ready. In New South Wales and South Australia the collection of names has been completed, and the commissioners appointed for the purpose have issued their schemes of distribution into electoral divisions, these being exhibited at the various post-offices, and must, under the Act, await objections for a period of 30 days. Until the divisions are approved, the printing of the rolls must remain in abeyance. In Victoria the canvass by the police is practically concluded, and the commissioner will proceed with the distribution into electoral divisions forthwith. In Queensland the police have finished the house-to-house canvass, but all the lists have not yet been received. In Tasmania and Western Australia the collection of the lists is being pushed forward with all possible despatch.

SESSIONAL COMMITTEES.

The following Sessional Committees were appointed (on motion by Senator DRAKE):—

STANDING ORDERS.

1. That a Standing Orders Committee be appointed, consisting of the President, the Chairman of Committees, Senators Dobson, Sir J. W. Downer, Lt.-Col. Gould, Harney, Higgs, O'Connor, and Sir W. A. Zeal; four to be the quorum.

LIBRARY.

2. That a Library Committee be appointed, consisting of the President, Senators Barrett, Keating, Matheson, Millen, Stewart, and Sir J. H. Symon, with power to act during the recess, and to confer with any similar committee of the House of Representatives; four to be the quorum.

HOUSE.

3. That a House Committee be appointed, consisting of the President, Senators Cameron, De Largie, Fraser, Glassey, Lt.-Col. Neild, and Playford, with power to act during the recess, and to confer with any similar committee of the House of Representatives; four to be the quorum.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH : ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 27th May (vide page 124) on motion by Senator DOWNER—

That the Address in Reply be adopted.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I think the Senate may well congratulate itself upon the tone of the debate. It is very gratifying to me as a federalist—and I claim to be before all things a federalist—that the work which has been done up to the present time towards the federation of the States of Australia has been so completely recognised. I think the graceful references made upon the floor of the Senate represent not only the feeling of this House, but also the feeling of the country. I have nothing to say with regard to the tone of the criticism—if I may so call it—of the action of the Government. The honorable senators who moved and seconded the address in reply—to whom I give my grateful acknowledgments—spoke perhaps in a tone of criticism in some respects with regard to what the Government has done, that seems rather to have surprised some members of the Senate. But the Government are not afraid of criticism, and would certainly prefer that their friends should state openly anything in their action that they may consider open to criticism. Then we may endeavour to meet them. But by those honorable senators from whom, perhaps, we might have expected that their criticisms would to some extent have been tinged with political animus, the Government have been altogether blest. No exception could possibly be taken to the remarks that have come from honorable senators opposed to us ; and I find, on looking through my notes of what has been said up to the present time in this debate, that although some statements have been made to which I am very glad to take the opportunity of attempting a reply, of hostile attack there has been really nothing to notice. There are, of course, many subjects upon which there are differences of opinion. The leader of the Opposition does not object to the work done during the last session on the ground that we did not do enough, but on the ground that we did too much. He does not agree with us with regard to the degree of importance attached to the measures which we dealt with during the session.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think you did the wrong work.

Senator DRAKE.—That is a matter of opinion. We consider that those measures which were designed to preserve the race integrity of the people of Australia were of first importance, and that we did right in placing them in the position in which they appeared. With regard to the measures known as belonging to the policy of a white Australia, we held that they had special claims. There are one or two points which I wish to refer to in connexion with that subject. As to the sugar rebate, there seems to have been some misunderstanding in the Senate. The opinion was generally held during last session, when Parliament agreed to grant a bonus for the growth of cane by white labour, that the cost of that policy should be a burden borne by the whole of Australia, seeing that it was an Australian policy. The form in which the policy was passed was that there was to be a rebate from excise paid on account of sugar grown by white labour. Under ordinary conditions, or under the conditions which will prevail, I hope, before very long, when the whole of Australia is supplied with sugar produced from Australian-grown cane, that provision for taking the amount of the rebate from excise would work fairly equitably. That is to say, if all the people of Australia were consuming sugar produced from cane grown in Australia—I do not say whether grown by white labour or black labour—then the contribution as a bonus to the growers of cane grown by white labour would be fairly equally drawn from the various States. But it happens, in consequence, to a great extent, of the drought and the comparative failure of the cane crop in Queensland, that the production fell very far short of the consumption. Consequently, in some of the States, the sugar consumed was nearly all Australian-produced sugar, whereas in other States nearly the whole of the sugar consumed has been imported. If the amount collected in excise had been distributed according to the consumption in each State, and if the amount of the rebate paid had been deducted from the amounts paid to those States, the result would have been that the people who consumed the sugar which was grown in Australia would have contributed the whole of the bonus paid to the growers of cane by white labour, whereas those who consumed sugar which had been imported, and upon which £6 per ton was paid, would not have paid their proportion. That would have been the result. I am sure that no one contemplated that any such injustice would be done as to provide that the amount expended to encourage the growth of cane by white labour should not be contributed by the whole population of Australia; and that is a measure which I think meets with general satisfaction. I will say a word or two about the six hatters, and then we can pass the matter by. It was an amusing, and at one time it looked as though it were going to be a tragical incident. I am glad that the leader of the Opposition has told us that he does not raise any question with regard to the administration of the section of the Act, but that he objects to the section itself.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I said I thought that the administration was a farce.

Senator DRAKE.—I understood the honorable and learned senator to say that it was not the administration of the section to which he objected.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I said that I would not re-open the question.

Senator DRAKE.—The section itself was passed by Parliament after full discussion, without any division. I remember that I spoke upon it myself.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—And there was a belief that it would not be applied to such cases as have occurred.

Senator DRAKE.—It was not applied to the six hatters, because they were not excluded. When the section was discussed here, if honorable senators opposite thought that it should not form part of the measure of course they knew the steps they ought to take to give expression to their view. Speaking generally, however, I am convinced that the people of Australia agreed with the policy embodied in that section. With regard to the administration of the Act, I fail to see how any fault can be alleged against what was done. When the news arrived that these men were due, and they had given no proof of the special qualifications which would have removed them from the operation of the section, surely the Prime Minister was perfectly correct in putting the provision into operation. As soon as it was proved that the six hatters were exempt they were allowed to come in. But we are told that this section was shocking the conscience of the British people. Well, the section is still in the Act, and the conscience of the British people is not shocked now. We know now exactly what took place in connexion with the administration, and we know that the section is not shocking the conscience of the British, or of any other people. What was it—if there was anything—that caused distrust in England in connexion with that incident? It was not the facts of the case, but it was the telegram that was sent to England—the misleading telegram; and if you find out who was the person who sent the telegram you will find out the person who was instrumental in shocking the public conscience.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Postmaster-General thinks then that a concealment is all that is necessary?

Senator DRAKE.—How can there be any concealment after all the talk there has been about it? We have now got all the actual facts, and having got them I say that the people of Australia approve of the provision of the Act, and will acquit the Prime Minister of any possible blame in connexion with its administration.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is universally disapproved of.

Senator DRAKE.—Not at all. Now as to the postal contract. Some honorable senators seem to think that a great deal of trouble is going to happen in consequence of the inclusion of the black labour clause in our postal contracts. I do not anticipate any great trouble.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—How are you going to get out of the difficulty?

Senator DRAKE.—We have given notice, as we were bound to do, having that section in our Act of Parliament, that we cannot enter into an arrangement in the nature of a contract with the owners of vessels whose ships are worked by black labour. In consequence of that we understand that the British Postmaster-General in calling for tenders says that he cannot be bound by such a condition. He will call for tenders in the ordinary course. Whether the British Postmaster-General will enter into any contract with a company employing coloured labour or not we do not know. It is possible he may not. He may stipulate that in accepting tenders he will accept the contract from some company employing white crews, in which case we are open to an arrangement. But in any case we do not anticipate that there will be any delay whatever in the carrying of our mails. There is such a large amount of competition now between the different steamship companies, and they are running such close races for the purpose of delivering their mails and passengers and cargo—one against the other in ocean races—that there can hardly be the slightest doubt that the postal service will always be properly maintained, and that the vessels for the carriage of our mails will always be sufficient to enable us to ensure a quick delivery. Indeed, I have no doubt that facilities will increase. We must remember that the amount that has been paid to the P. and O. and Orient companies has been £170,000. It is not a very large amount, and we cannot suppose that if that £170,000 were withdrawn these two companies would slacken their efforts to make their passage as quick as it has been in the past.

Senator MACFARLANE.—But you now require them to deliver their mails on regular days.

Senator DRAKE.—The sum I have mentioned is the amount paid, and its loss would not be of sufficient importance to such big companies to prevent them from endeavouring to land their passengers and cargo in as quick a time as they possibly can. A fact which is overlooked by some people is that we have a statutory right under the British and our own Postal Acts to put our mails on board any of these steamers, and we have been doing so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Notwithstanding that coloured labour is employed on board those ships?

Senator DRAKE.—Honorable senators know perfectly well that every steamer that leaves our ports carries away mails, whether it is under contract to do so or not.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—They are paid for doing so.

Senator DRAKE.—Of course; we pay them on a system of poundage. And so with the P. and O. and Orient Companies, if they carried mails, and were not under contract with the British Government, they would be paid by poundage. How that payment would compare with the subsidy of £170,000 I am not prepared at present to say. There is no need to fear that in consequence of the inclusion of this provision in the Postal Act our mails will not be carried expeditiously. While I do not altogether agree with the leader of the Opposition in believing that we did wrong in placing that legislation in a prominent place, I agree with him in regretting that we were not able to pass the High Court Bill last session. He has not overstated the case as to the importance of passing that Bill as soon as possible. It is, as he has pointed out, one of the pillars of the Constitution. Until the tersely printed sections of the Constitution are amplified and vivified by judicial decisions it must remain a thing of parchment. Until our High Court has had an opportunity of giving decisions upon disputed law points under the Constitution, the Constitution itself will never be what we desire it to be, but I hope that when the Bill is before the Senate honorable senators will not be disposed to fulfil the letter of the Constitution by means of some cheap substitute.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Better nothing at all than that.

Senator DRAKE. — Exactly. If we are going to have a High Court it should be fully equipped and efficient for the purpose. It should command and include the highest judicial talent obtainable in Australia.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — What will the Judges have to do? They will not have more than one day's work a month.

Senator DRAKE. — They will have to give decisions correctly interpreting the Constitution, and that is of more importance than the printed text. Considering the very great issues at stake, I think it would be a vitally false piece of economy to take any steps in the direction of sacrificing the efficiency of that tribunal for the sake of making a small saving. As to many other matters which have been referred to by honorable senators, I think it is unnecessary for me to reply at length. The Conciliation and Arbitration Bill will be a most important measure. The importance of such legislation has been shown, I think, by recent events. The Bill is to be brought forward during the session, and when it is before us it will be time enough to discuss its provisions. I may say the same with regard to the Navigation Bill. That is a measure which may or may not be brought up for discussion this session. It is of great importance, but in view of the uncertainty as to whether it will be introduced this session, it seems rather premature now to discuss what may be its provisions. Then there is the question which was referred to by one or two honorable senators as to the taking over of the State debts. The Governor-General's speech sets forth that the question will be discussed if an opportunity is afforded. Looking at the list of measures which have to be dealt with during the session, I am inclined to think that the probability of the Senate being called upon this session to pronounce an opinion upon the subject is somewhat remote. But it is a most interesting matter, and I am very glad to see that both in Parliament and outside attention is being directed to it. If Senator Millen, with his financial ability and acumen, can devise in the interval some provision for a sinking fund which could not possibly be got at by the Government of the day, he will do a very good service.

Senator MILLEN. — That is just what I think is impossible.

Senator DRAKE. — We can take care at all events that savings which are actually made shall be devoted to the purpose of a sinking fund. It is very hard, however, to devise any means by which to bind the Government of the day to continue a sinking fund. Senator Gould referred more particularly to the Customs administration, and I suppose it is due to him that I should say something on the subject. It must be borne in mind, however, that the department is not under my control, and I cannot speak with regard to any particular cases because I have not taken any careful note of them. But it seemed to me in listening to Senator Gould's remarks that the gravamen of his charge against the administration of my colleague the Minister for Trade and Customs is much the same as that of all the complaints I have heard on the subject. He complains that the Minister has not discriminated between innocent mistakes in connexion with incorrect entries or invoices and cases of fraud. I understand that the position taken up by my colleague is that it is not his business to decide those questions, and that he would have to try each case beforehand if he were compelled to decide whether each mistake was innocent or fraudulent.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD. — But he proceeds with a prosecution, and the counsel for the prosecution states deliberately that there is no imputation of fraud.

Senator DRAKE. — I am not dealing with any individual case, but that always seems to me to be the clear difference between the Minister for Trade and Customs and his critics. His critics say that he ought to decide whether a mistake is an innocent one or not—that he should exercise discrimination on those lines. The Minister says—"No; let them go to the court, and let the court decide whether the mistake is an innocent one or not." I do not envy my colleague the task that he had to perform, but I think it is a task which required great strength of mind and firmness.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD. — The very reverse.

Senator DRAKE. — It was a task which required a man of strong determination and will in order to cope with the difficulties which presented themselves in connexion with a Tariff that was new in every State, and which differed very widely from the Tariffs which had existed in some of the States. It was necessary that he should be a strong man. Senator Walker made a remark last night which did not impress me in the way I think he intended it should do. He spoke about a gentlemanly, courteous administration and referred to section 156 of the Postal Act under which the Postmaster-General has a right to decide certain small cases and to inflict fines. But the two cases are not at all analogous. The little mistakes which occur in the Postal department are almost invariably cases in which some one has slipped a note into a packet or parcel and thereby defrauded the revenue of a penny or twopence which would represent the postal charge. Such occurrences are not analogous with those dealt with by the Minister for Trade and Customs. He has been dealing with cases which if not checked and stopped would eventually result in an enormous loss of revenue and prove a handicap to the honest and careful trader competing with one who is not.

Senator WALKER.—But the principle is the same.

Senator DRAKE. — No. I shall show now why Senator Walker's remark last night did not impress me as I think he intended it to do. I have been much shocked to find that the cases coming before me under the section referred to are very numerous. Whether it is that the officers are now more vigilant than they were I do not know, but the fact remains that the cases dealt with under this section, and in which I impose fines without any publicity being given to them, are becoming too numerous. What is the reason? I do not disagree with the policy of the section. I think it is right that it should be there, because it would be a most painful thing to have to prosecute a servant girl, for instance, for slipping a note into a parcel, or for some other offence of that kind. Still I cannot help believing that if there were prosecutions which would give publicity these cases would be less frequent. Now that we have adopted the principle of inflicting these fines in the Postal department I do not care to depart from it, because it seems to me that if I once commenced public prosecutions of this kind I should have to go on prosecuting all the way through. Nevertheless, I believe that if there had been public prosecutions in some of these cases, publicity would have been gained, and people would have been deterred from offending against the Act in that particular.

Senator BEST.—What is to prevent the Postmaster-General from obtaining publicity by publishing his decisions from day to day?

Senator DRAKE.—I do not believe in doing that, because the very object of the section is to enable the Postmaster-General to dispense with that.

Senator BEST.—No.

Senator DRAKE.—I find that in nearly all these cases the offenders in their letters submitting to the jurisdiction of the Postmaster-General almost invariably say they were not aware that they were breaking the regulations. In some cases it may not be an excuse, but in a great many it is really true that the offenders did not know they were committing an offence. To come back to the point which I think Senator Walker desired to make, I would point out that, although the Minister for Trade and Customs has been compelled to adopt a stern system of administration, the benefit of it will be felt in the future. All the turmoil that has been worked up against his administration—and to a great extent it has been worked up by these complaints—is now dying away, and it will continue to die away as the decisions of the Customs department come to be known. As the working of the department by the officers goes on I am inclined to think that these cases which have been painfully brought before the public will become very less frequent.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — Painfully brought before the courts.

Senator DRAKE.—And I think that in increased revenue, and in the security of fairness of competition between merchants, we shall get the benefit of the results of an administration of the Customs which has been stern, just, and indiscriminating. I have a word or two to say with regard to the Western Australian railway. It will be generally agreed that the Government have been justified in the action they have taken in getting all the information available upon that subject. That line of railway, like other means of communication between different parts of Australia, cannot, I think, be judged upon absolutely the same grounds as those upon which the advisability of constructing an ordinary railway is decided. We must regard this work as desirable or otherwise upon grounds of high public policy. I think I am right in reminding honorable senators that in connexion with the federation of the different portions of the Canadian Dominion it was a stipulation made by British Columbia that, upon coming into the Union, the Canadian-Pacific railway should be made in order to bring together the east and west of Canada. The Dominion, by means of granting large land subsidies, secured the construction of that railway, and it was constructed for high political purposes. We must admit that means of communication which are designed to bring enormous parts of this great continent into close touch should be regarded in somewhat the same way. I therefore think that no stone can be thrown at the Government for the action they have taken in this matter. We have gone steadily on endeavouring, without any unreasonable delay, to get all the information upon the subject which may be available. There is a matter upon which I must say a word, because we know there is some little feeling aroused in connexion with it. I refer to the selection of the site for the future capital of Australia. Certain honorable senators from the State of New South Wales seem to be a little hurt with the tone of some remarks which have been made in the State of Victoria. I do not think there is any justification for the feeling. I have no reason to believe that Victoria, or any one entitled to represent Victoria, would be disposed to depart from either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution. This provision of the Constitution is as binding upon us as any other part of it, and it is fully recognised that it was part of the federal compact that the capital of the Commonwealth should be in the territory of New South Wales. No unreasonable delay has taken place up to the present time in putting Parliament in a position to make a proper selection, and no blame in connexion with this matter can be cast upon the Government. It is said, and no doubt this has weight with some honorable senators, that it will be necessary to at once spend large sums of money upon the capital before it can become the seat of government. That aspect of the matter was very well dealt with by the leader of the Opposition. To my mind it is an unsubstantial bogey. I see no reason to fear the expenditure of large sums of money upon the capital site. We must bear in mind that it has been stated by the Government, and I believe with the entire approval of the people of Australia, that the lands of the Federal territory, within which the capital of the Commonwealth will be, shall remain unalienated. That being so, any expenditure of money which takes place for the improvement of the land, and indeed the mere fact of the settlement of the people there, will give a continually increasing value to the land, which will itself be revenue-producing. I have no idea as to what site will be recommended to Parliament for its acceptance, but when a site is accepted, I see no reason to anticipate the expenditure of large sums of money before it becomes the capital. As soon as it becomes the capital, the expenditure of a certain amount of money in developing it, will be justified by the increased value which will be given to the land. I desire as much as anyone to see proper economy in Commonwealth expenditure, but there are few directions in which I think expenditure may be more safely incurred, supposing it to be incurred wisely and not too hurriedly, than in the development of the federal territory. Senator Fraser referred to the agreement entered into with the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, but I think the honorable senator was not fully aware of the facts connected with that agreement. I should like for the information of the Senate to state briefly the circumstances in which the agreement was made, and the necessity for it. When the Commonwealth was established, four of the States had entered into contracts with the Eastern Extension Company, and those contracts were dissoluble, only by the mutual consent of the parties. That is to say that, at the wish of either party, they were practically interminable. The agreements were made for the purpose of obtaining from the Eastern Extension Company certain concessions in the matter of rates—practically for obtaining a 3s. rate. Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, and New South Wales entered into the agreements only just before the establishment of federation. The position, therefore, when the Post and Telegraph services were transferred to the Commonwealth was that four of the States had actually made these agreements, which were subject to termination only by mutual consent of the parties. An agreement has been made to substitute for these four agreements a contract terminable in ten years, with two years' notice; that is to say, terminable in twelve years. So that the Eastern Extension Company gives up its interminable contracts with four of the States to get a contract with regard to the whole of Australia, which will be terminable in twelve years. Under this new agreement the whole of Australia gets the benefit of the 3s. rate, and the Eastern Extension Company can, under no circumstances, raise that rate. In certain circumstances, however, that is to say, given an extension of business up to a fixed limit the 3s. rate is to be still further reduced to 2s. 6d. I have spoken only of the general rate, but of course the Government rate and the press rates have been reduced in the same way. It seems to me that being a federation it would be almost impossible for us to have continued under such a state of things as existed when the postal services of the States were handed over to the Commonwealth, and I need hardly tell honorable senators that in the course of years it would certainly have been found to be most unsatisfactory if we had been bound to any company by a contract terminable only by the mutual consent of the parties. The agreement entered into was the result of prolonged negotiations, and it represents the best terms the Government were able to secure in the matter. Of course, we are animated by the hope that consequent upon the reduction of charges there will be such an expansion of telegraph business between Australia and Europe and Australia and Canada, that both of these great undertakings may prove remunerative. There is still room for a great extension of cable communication.

Senator PULSFORD.—When the Government Tariff is smashed.

Senator DRAKE.—Not at all. I am sorry to have heard the word "Tariff" mentioned again, but I suppose we must expect that from the honorable senator, because it is his particular bogey. Listening to the remarks which have lately been made in connexion with the very interesting address delivered in England by the Secretary of State for the Colonies I could not help thinking what an advantage it would have been if we could have had the full text of the speech cabled out here. We have now for some time past, here and elsewhere, been discussing a speech, the text of which we have not yet received. All we know is that the Secretary of State for the Colonies made an important deliverance in England, which apparently expresses a deliberate intention to make some move in the direction of increasing the commercial ties between different parts of the Empire. That, I think, has given general satisfaction, not only to the Government, but to people outside. But we cannot discuss the matter or form any settled opinions upon it until we have the advantage of perusing the exact text of the speech. There is one other subject of very great importance upon which I must say a word, and that is the naval subsidy. The matter is one which I am afraid is not very well understood, and I would ask honorable senators not to be in haste in coming to a decision upon it until the proposal has been thoroughly discussed. An opportunity will be given to the Senate, as well as to the House of Representatives, of either ratifying or refusing to ratify the proposed agreement. But it is desirable when the time comes that the judgment, if it is to be pronounced, should be pronounced upon the facts. Senator Downer has explained the kind of ships of which the squadron will consist. We are at present in this position, that an agreement entered into now some ten or twelve years ago for an auxiliary squadron has expired, and has been renewed by the Admiralty from year to year. The ships forming the auxiliary squadron admittedly are, if not exactly obsolete, at least not up-to-date. What is proposed is that a squadron consisting of a very much better class of ships should be provided for the subsidy, and that an agreement for its services should be entered into for a period of ten years. A good many persons tell us now that they think it is time that we had a fleet of our own. Strange to say, some who profess the strongest views with regard to economy are the very persons who tell us that we should go in for a fleet. A fleet is a very expensive thing to have, and when I hear some of those who talk so much about economy in this department and the other speak about starting a fleet, I am reminded of the lines in King John, where Philip Faulconbridge says of the citizens of Angiers that they talk—

... as familiarly of roaring lions,

As maids of thirteen do of puppy dogs.

When some of these gentlemen talk to us about fleets as though it were like starting some department, I wonder whether they have really considered all the intricacies as well as the enormous expense of maintaining a fleet.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Nobody talks about having an ocean-going fleet.

Senator DRAKE.—It is of no use to have any ships that we cannot send to sea. The principle of naval science at the present day is not to wait for the ships of the enemy to come and attack you at home, but, as soon as you learn that a hostile fleet is in any direction, to find it out and either destroy it or shut it up. Take, for instance, the war between America and Cuba. The Americans had their forces all ready to be transported to Cuba, but they would not allow a single transport to leave until every Spanish ship had been found and shut up or rendered harmless. That is the principle upon which naval warfare is now carried out. There are some persons who say that the cost of a fleet is so insignificant that it should not be considered at all. No doubt £200,000 is a very small sum to pay, but it puts us in this position, that we are getting this defence from the mother country for absolutely nothing. We are paying only five-twelfths of the cost of equipping and maintaining the squadron, and what do we get for that expenditure? We get a first-class squadron, very much better than any we could maintain ourselves, even if we paid the whole cost.

Senator HIGGS.—That is what they said of the present squadron.

Senator DRAKE.—That was said twelve years ago. No doubt at the time it was considered to be an up to date squadron, but it has been outclassed since then. We are told that it is desirable that we should make a commencement with a view to having a fleet of our own. In this agreement we have a provision for training our seamen. It is specially provided that the three drill ships and one of the other vessels shall be manned by Australians and New Zealanders as far as they are procurable, paid at special rates, and enrolled in proportion to the relative population of the Commonwealth and New Zealand. There is a provision for giving our seamen an opportunity to become effective, and the cost is very much less than it would be if we attempted to do the work ourselves. There are some persons who say that they do not object to the cost or to the character of the fleet, but that they want a provision put in that the vessels shall not be removed from Australian waters without the consent of the Government. Let us look at this objection for a moment. Every man who asks himself the question must know that if that state of things existed the consent would never be refused. Only recently we sent away contingent after contingent, not waiting for the men to be asked for, but practically stating that whatever military strength we had would be placed at the service of the mother country if needed. Can we suppose for a moment, therefore, that if we had a squadron under these conditions it would ever happen that that consent would be refused? Certainly not. But the delay would be absolutely fatal. Supposing that the Admiral had first of all to communicate with the Governor-General of Australia, perhaps at a time when the cables might be cut, it would be absolutely useless for him to attempt to co-operate with any other portion of the British fleet, because the delay that would take place in obtaining that consent would be absolutely fatal. That brings me to another point which apparently has been overlooked—that in this scheme there are three squadrons on three different stations. The idea is that, in case of a hostile fleet ever making its appearance, the Australian, China, and East India squadrons should coalesce to attack it. The Australian squadron would, if circumstances so required, go from Australian waters and join the other two squadrons in order to attack the enemy. On the other hand, if the enemy ever appeared in Australian waters, we should get the benefit of the squadrons on the China and East India stations. The business of the Admiral in charge of the three squadrons, as soon as he heard of a hostile fleet being in any locality, would be to mobilize his strength and prepare at once to attack it. Surely we must take those points into consideration. I share with other honorable senators the aspiration that the time will come when we shall be a great people, and shall be able to maintain a fleet of our own, and perhaps have a naval policy, but that time has not come yet. We require protection, and we seek by this agreement to get at a very moderate cost this necessary protection from the mother country as a temporary arrangement for ten years in order to give us time, after which we may perhaps be in a position financially and otherwise to maintain a fleet of our own. I do not know whether any other matters have been mentioned to which it was my duty to reply; but if I have omitted to refer to any such matters, it has been through inadvertence. I can only express the hope that the auspicious commencement of this session may be followed by a record of good work in the direction of building up the Commonwealth.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I do not propose to follow closely on the lines which have been taken by previous speakers, but there are some other matters which I desire to bring before the Senate, and to some little extent I shall break new ground. If I have to animadvert on the administration of any departments, it is not my fault that the Postmaster-General will not have an opportunity of replying to me, because I told him what I proposed to do and suggested to him that he should reserve his speech until I had had my grumble, when he would be able to reply, which, by taking the course of speaking first, he has denied himself.

Senator DRAKE.—But the honorable senator could have spoken yesterday. I was nearly forced to speak at eight o'clock, when no one would get up.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I could have spoken yesterday perhaps, but just at the particular moment—when the debate was petering out apparently—I was not prepared to speak. I had not contemplated speaking yesterday. As a matter of fact, I only got the materials of my speech together this morning. First of all, I propose to deal with a matter which I wonder no honorable senator has referred to. It is a matter arising out of the speech of the Governor-General to both Houses at the close of last session, and it affects the rights of the Senate and the position which it successfully assumed at the commencement of its existence as a deliberative body. When the Governor-General came to prorogue Parliament our mouths were closed, and, of course, we were unable to enter any protest, or take any objection to an attack made upon the rights the Senate assumed in the earliest days of its existence. I refer to this paragraph in the speech—

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—

I thank you in the name of His Majesty for the liberal supplies that you have voted.

If there was one matter of contest between the Houses it was the right of the Senate to have a potential voice in the granting of supply. The very first Supply Bill passed by the House of Representatives was sent to us with a preamble which contained these words—

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the House of Representatives in Parliament assembled towards making good the supply which we have cheerfully granted to Your Majesty in this session of Parliament have resolved to grant unto Your Majesty the sums hereinafter mentioned.

When the Bill came before the Senate, I gave notice of a motion to omit these words. I had no opportunity of moving the motion, because the Government put the Bill under the table in the other House, and introduced a Bill with another preamble, in which these words occurred—

For the purpose of appropriating the grant made by the House of Representatives.

The Bill came before the Senate in that form, and upon my motion and without a division we sent it back with a request for the omission of those words, and they were omitted. Every subsequent Supply Bill which has been sent up has recognised completely the right of the Senate to take part in the granting of supply, and not to be a humble subservient echo of the other Chamber. The preamble of the Act of which these Bills were the foundation is now as follows—

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty and the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Australia for the purpose of appropriating the grant originated in the House of Representatives . . .

Of course we recognise that under the Constitution, not as a matter of superiority, but merely as a question of convenience, certain money Bills must be introduced in the other Chamber. But we have fought out this question. After having had the first Supply Bill submitted to us thrice, and altered twice with the view of meeting the constitutional requirements of the Senate as provided in the very foundation of our rights—the enactment which gives us our existence—whether through an oversight or intentionally, a direct slight was cast upon this Chamber, inasmuch as the speech of the Governor-General contained the words to which I have alluded. The speech was one for which, of course, His Excellency was not responsible. But His Excellency's Advisers, after this Chamber had twice over insisted on maintaining the terms of the Constitution, appear to me to have taken a most improper advantage of an occasion when our lips were closed, to place in the mouth of the august gentleman who is the apex of our Constitution words that could mean nothing else than a denial of the right of the Senate to participate in the granting of Supply. I think I have done my duty in mentioning this matter, but I will carry it further now that I have mentioned it. I shall ask the Senate on some future day to affirm a resolution in reference to it. At this stage of our existence, in the first Parliament of the Commonwealth, if we permit inroads to be made upon the Constitution—if we permit our statute rights to be frittered away—we are not discharging the duty that is cast upon us, but we are permitting a political offence that is worse than an error, in allowing an alteration to be made in the conditions provided by the statute that gives the Commonwealth of Australia its existence. Looking at the strangely long menu provided for our legislative digestion in the form of the Governor-General's speech, I regard it as filled with promises that cannot be fulfilled. In the last session we had a Governor-General's speech that contained a large number of promises, and no attempt was made to fulfil many of them. In respect of others, there was so feeble, so helpless, so abject an attempt to give a semblance of vitality to the promises which the speech contained, that I recognise in this document something worse than a second edition of that which we had two years ago. But though many of the propositions that are contained in the speech we are now discussing are old familiar friends by name, I hope that if they come before us again they will be dressed in different garments, and contain a different body within those garments. I find there are some questions here as to which I shall be at one with the Government. Therefore, in taking exception to much that I find in the speech, it will be understood that I am not offering a captious criticism. As to their first proposal in reference to the High Court, I shall be with the Government, though I do not pledge myself as to the number of Judges I shall eventually vote for. As has been very well said by many honorable senators who have addressed the Chamber, the establishment of the High Court is necessary to the completion of a very important part of the Commonwealth edifice. To my mind the people of the Commonwealth, and the very constitution of the Commonwealth, are not safe from danger and from attack until the High Court has been properly constituted, in order that many questions that continually arise may be settled by an authoritative tribunal, and that we may not have the varying decisions that are now being given by the different Supreme Courts of the different States. We never shall be able to attain any degree of concininity in our judicial decisions if cases arising have to be referred to the States Supreme Courts. You will never find those Supreme Courts deciding things in the same manner. While it may be said that varying decisions might perhaps represent more justice than decisive opinions, it must be remembered that no plaintiff nor defendant is ever able to get absolute justice in a law court. They get more than they are entitled to, or less. I think it infinitely preferable that the decisions given in connexion with Commonwealth matters should at least have the merit of being stamped by the wisdom of the highest court we can establish within our borders, and that there should not be varying decisions, which may render the administration a by-word and a mockery throughout the community. There is another old friend mentioned in the speech—the Judiciary Bill. We are going to see that again. It was one of the kittens that were carried a little way and dropped and forgotten and left behind by the Government at last session.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Cannot the honorable senator put it among Mr. G. H. Reid's pups?

Senator LT.-COL. NEILD.—No; but perhaps I can put the honorable senator among them! Another measure is the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. My honorable friends on my left are, I believe, very strong in their desire to see that measure passed. Let me say at once that I am not going to stand in the way of putting the Bill through if it is made, as far as possible, a just one. I may state that in years past I have strongly supported compulsory arbitration, because I do not see what you will achieve if you only arrive at an agreement between employers and employes which cannot be enforced. I cannot see any advantage in an arrangement of that kind. But I will utter this word of warning: that, in the establishment of these courts of compulsory arbitration throughout the land, the workers of the country, in seeking the ægis of the courts, will be parting with the freedom of action which they now possess. Whether the parting with that freedom will be eventually beneficial is a matter of absolute experiment ; but I do say that it is impossible to establish arbitrary courts of arbitration without the workers losing the freedom of action which they now enjoy. They will part from that freedom for good or ill, and the future alone will disclose the result. Then there are allusions in the speech to other matters, which it is not necessary to go into, and I will not discuss them. I will not allude to the question of preferential trade. The time to discuss that matter is when we have the facts before us. To start an academical discussion in advance of the facts of the case being submitted to us, would be a waste of time. I say the same with regard to the naval agreement, though to a large extent I am with the Government in that matter. I may be against them on details, but the consideration that weighs strongly with me is that there should be an opportunity for training colonial seamen in the duties of a fleet which we afterwards might bring into existence. I do not see how we can hope to bring into existence a fleet of our own immediately. We could only buy two or three war vessels, and at present we have neither the men, nor the supervision, nor the knowledge to enable us to succeed immediately in respect of an effective navy of our own. The part of the agreement that provides for the training of colonial sailors upon the vessels of the squadron seems to me to offer a ready method for the introduction and establishment of a colonial navy at the proper time. During the recess Ministers have been going about the country. I have not read many of the utterances of my honorable and learned friend the Postmaster-General, and I do not accuse him of being one of the Ministerial Hallelujah chorus singers who have been careering throughout the Commonwealth claiming credit for the accomplishment of results that do not appear to have been accomplished at all. They have been taking credit to themselves for the white Australia legislation. I say that the white Australia legislation achieved by the Ministry is a sham and a public fraud. I am justified in using a strong phrase for this reason—that the whole claim for the exclusion of coloured workers is not based upon the conditions of labour competition, but is based upon the proposition that the exclusion of these hated aliens will preserve the white character of our population and its Anglo-Saxon blood. Those are the arguments which are invariably used. But what has been achieved by the Government and their white Australia legislation? All they have succeeded and all they have dared to do is to play the part of the school bully, who is prepared to kick a little boy who has no one to defend him. They are trying to persuade themselves and the rest of Australia that their cowardice has been an act of splendid virtue. They have taken authority to banish the kanaka from Queensland. The kanaka has been living in Queensland by thousands and tens of thousands for thirty years or more, with the result that, so far as the contamination of the white race is concerned, the official figures of Queensland disclose the fact that there are not 50 kanaka half-casts within the whole of the borders of that great land. Yet the Government has been willing to cast out the kanaka as an unclean thing, though the kanaka has done scarcely anything to contaminate the Anglo-Saxon race in Queensland, while at the same time they have made no effort—because they had not the courage to do so—to exclude from the cities and towns of the Commonwealth the evil-smelling and evil-doing opium dens and immorality shops that flourish throughout Australia unfortunately, and which are doing a deadly work upon the young womanhood and the young manhood of the Commonwealth.

SENATOR DRAKE.—We are stopping more from coming in.

SENATOR LT.-COL. NEILD.—Does the honorable and learned senator think that if one end of his house was on fire it would be sufficient to simply prevent the other end from igniting? Would it not be his duty to put out the fire rather than to satisfy himself by preventing a second fire?

SENATOR DRAKE.—But we prevent the fire from beginning.

SENATOR LT.-COL. NEILD.—I am satisfied that so far as the white Australia legislation of this Government is concerned, it has done absolutely nothing that is appreciable in maintaining that purity of the Anglo-Saxon race about which we have had so many hypocritical platitudes from press and platform for so great a length of time. The honorable gentlemen who constitute the Government have sung another Hallelujah chorus on the granting of the franchise to women, and they represent themselves to the world at large as having achieved a splendid liberality of legislation on behalf of the women of the Commonwealth.

Senator GLASSEY.—Is it not true?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No, it is not true in this respect, because they could not help themselves. I hear some honorable senators laughing, but such laughter is simply, as Solomon says, like “the crackling of thorns under a pot.” It does not represent intellect; it represents something of the very opposite character. The Constitution provides most emphatically that no person in possession of the franchise at the establishment of the Commonwealth shall lose that right. That provision made it absolutely impossible to take from the women of South Australia the franchise rights which they possessed when the Commonwealth was established. It goes without saying that we could not have a double franchise—a superior and an inferior franchise—for one community; we could not have a House elected by a varying franchise, as between one State and another. Thus, as it was impossible to take away the franchise from the women of South Australia—and judging by his speeches in the past, the Prime Minister would have done so if he could—there was nothing left for him to do but to level up. The granting of the franchise to the women of the Commonwealth was nothing more than the automatic action provided for by the Constitution. The people who are entitled to thanks at the hands of those women of Australia who appreciate the franchise are not my honorable friend the Postmaster-General and his posturing colleagues, but rather the members of the Convention, who were the framers of the Commonwealth Constitution.

Senator DRAKE.—And amongst them were my colleagues.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Up to a certain point. But I do not know that because a person was a member of the Convention, he is entitled to thanks for doing something which he opposed when in a minority.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator cannot show that.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Another question to which I desire to refer is the proposed bonus for sugar grown by white labour. I agree with the Government that it is a proper thing that as all the Commonwealth is to benefit by a white Australia, all the Commonwealth should pay for its whistle. The burden of establishing this glorious white Australia, which people so much appreciate, or believe they do, should not be placed solely upon Queensland, and, to an infinitesimal extent, upon New South Wales. There is another aspect of this question, upon which I desire to say something. The Postmaster-General made a speech in Brisbane, in which he detailed how many thousand tons of sugar had been grown by white labour in Queensland, but he must have been hopelessly dense if he believed that it had all been grown by white labour. Up to, and inclusive of the work of trashing, that cane had been all grown by black labour. It was only during that portion of the year when no one was really required to look after it, that it was grown by white labour. I am speaking of what I know to be the case. I have been up there; I have travelled through the districts, and have obtained information for myself on the subject. Therefore, I am not going on the statements of newspaper writers, or even upon those of plantation owners. I have gained a personal knowledge of the subject, and what I further assert is that, in connexion with this growing of cane by white labour, one of the greatest pieces of wickedness that has been attempted in Australia is now in full swing. I refer to the growing of cane, not by stalwart men—whom you can not obtain to do the work for payment—but by rapacious proprietors of canefields who turn their own wives and children into the fields to do sweating work, which they cannot hire men to accomplish. When the proposal foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech comes before the Senate, I shall take every care to give an opportunity to those who like to vote, as I shall not vote, for employing white women and tender children to sweat in canefields, doing work which adult men cannot be hired to do, owing to its obnoxious and cruel character. Before I leave the sugar question I must make a reference to something that the Minister for Trade and Customs would not refer to at his celebrated meeting in Sydney a little while ago. He was challenged in the most direct manner in the press by press writers and by correspondents who signed their names, so that they were not anonymous charges. The charge was this: that at the time the excise duty was imposed there was in store, outside bonded warehouses, in Queensland, 16,000 tons of sugar, none of which had paid any duty. And this is the extraordinary feature of the matter to which I am going to draw attention, although I know it was mentioned last session.

Senator PEARCE.—It was mentioned three or four times.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes; as no answer has been given I shall mention it again, and I hope others will continue to do so until the secret of this mystery is wrung from those who are responsible for a transaction which is not to the public credit of the Government of the Commonwealth. Out of that 16,000 tons of sugar 7,000 tons were allowed to go into distribution without paying a "bean," while the remaining 9,000 tons were clutched by the Customs Collector, and a duty of £3 per ton collected.

Senator MCGREGOR.—"Beans" would be spurious coin.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Not half so spurious as the honorable senator is as a politician. A sum of £21,000, which should have been collected as duty on 7,000 tons of sugar, was allowed to go by the immaculate Government which will prosecute a ship's cook for carrying away half a bucketful of second-hand fat. These are the people who will chase an unfortunate sailor in the streets when he is obliging a friend in England by simply carrying from the ship's side to the post-office the Bible of a deceased mother. These are the gentlemen who are so greedy of religion that they must even confiscate an old woman's Bible in the interests of honest administration. Yet, when they see an opportunity to collect £21,000 of duty on 7,000 tons of sugar, they, like the Pharisee of old, pass over on the other side.

Senator PEARCE.—What about the fat?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—They collected duty on the remaining 9,000 tons with the same avidity that the Postmaster-General's colleague, like the proverbial shark after the bit of pork, went for the bit of fat.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That fat would have greased the Victorian railways.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The less said about greasing the Victorian railways the better. My honorable friend who has just resumed his seat deplored, in that sweet plaintive voice with which he sometimes addresses the Chamber, the use of a certain word. The Postmaster-General is more persuasive than violent. He is not like me. There is this difference between us, that he is one who will try to Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame;

while I am satisfied to take my axe and hack my way through the world. My learned and honorable friend was telling us just now how he deprecated and deplored the fact that some one who had preceded him had used a certain little word, and that word was "tariff." The use of that word, I was going to say, was like a red rag to a bull. I shall not say that, however, because my honorable and learned friend does not play that rôle, but it came to him with a sense of heartbreaking grief. Sitting here I watched my honorable and learned friend's face, and I felt sorry that he should have met with such a matter of distress. Still, while referring to the Tariff, I intend to indulge in a little bit of ancient and modern history. I had no opportunity of dealing with the matter last session, and I am going to take the one which now offers. It is suggested that the Tariff must not be touched. It is too sacred a thing. It must not be interfered with in any way. I am going to ask the Senate to remember the declaration made by the Prime Minister in his celebrated Iaitland speech, when he asked, "Shall we pile the duties on the cottager and the artisan." I am going to ask the Senate, and especially those who claim to be the immediate representatives of the cottager and the artisan—

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does the honorable senator dispute our claim?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not. But I also represent them. If it had not been for the cottager and the artisan I should not have been here.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Then why dispute our claim to represent them?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not addressing myself to honorable members of the labor party, but to those who claim to be the more immediate representatives of the cottager and the artisan. Let me just give, briefly, an evidence of how, notwithstanding this notable declaration, the Ministry of the day have piled the duties on them. When the cottager or artisan rises for his day's work he leaves a bedstead on which there is a duty of 20 per cent.

Senator BARRETT.—Will the honorable senator tell us about the mangles?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Does the honorable senator wish to be passed through one? I think a little of his irrepressibility might usefully be squeezed out of him. I say that the cottager or artisan rises in the morning from a bedstead which pays 20 per cent. duty. The blankets pay 15 per cent., and he has one cheap line at 5 per cent. on sheets.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Is that according to the Tariff as introduced?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No. That is the Tariff as passed—the subject of the universal pean sung by the Yes-Mr.-Watson Ministry. I am not going to take the unfortunate cottager through a maze of extravagance and luxury. I am going to put him on bed-rock principles. He washes with soap dutiable at 3d. per lb., uses a towel at 15 per cent., a toothbrush at 15 per cent., and shaves with a razor at 20 per cent. He uses a jug and basin at 20 per cent., a washstand at 20 per cent., and a hair brush at 15 per cent.

Senator O'KEEFE.—He would never get to work if he had to go through all that.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I know this is very unpleasant for some honorable senators. They would rather not have it recorded, but it shall be recorded unless the President pulls me up. This unfortunate cottager, who was to go free, according to the Prime Minister, puts on clothes bearing a duty of 25 per cent., boots at 30 per cent., polished, if he can afford it, with blacking at 20 per cent., and by brushes at 25 per cent. The cottager wants some breakfast, and he sits down to a breakfast table dutiable at 20 per cent., on a chair upon which there is a duty of 20 per cent. Before him there is a cloth, the duty upon which is 20 per cent.; a cup, saucer, and plate at 20 per cent.; knife, fork, spoon, and coffee-pot, all at 20 per cent. Is this piling up Customs duties upon the cottager and artisan, or is it not?

Senator BARRETT.—But he is not objecting.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Is he not? Let my honorable friend wait until the numbers are up before he is so positive about that. Then the cottager and artisan must have something to eat, and his porridge has on it a 40 per cent. duty, his sugar a duty of £6 a ton, his coffee is dutiable at 5d. per lb., his eggs at $\frac{1}{3}$ d. apiece, and the duty upon his bacon is 3d. per lb. I suppose he will like some mustard with his bacon, but there is a duty of 2d. per lb. upon it, a duty of 3d. per lb. upon his butter, and his bread is made from flour which is dutiable at £2 10s. per ton.

Senator PLATFORD.—He gets his butter at a cheaper rate than the man in England, who pays no duty.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—He must go to work under the circumstances which I have recounted after an exceedingly frugal breakfast. Then he puts on a hat bearing a duty of 30 per cent., and walks off to work smoking tobacco dutiable at 3s. 3d. per lb. in a pipe paying a 20 per cent. duty. But it is not alone during his sleeping, working, or eating hours that this Tariff touches the cottager and artisan. It follows him to his sick bed, and pursues him beyond the grave.

Senator PEARCE.—Horrible!

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is horrible. That is what the Barton Tariff does for the cottager and artisan. When he comes to die there is a duty of 15 per cent. upon his physic. When he is dead he is allowed one cheap line only in the matter of the duty of 5 per cent. on his shroud. But there is a duty of 20 per cent. on the cards calling his friends to the funeral, 20 per cent. on the coffin that holds his corpse, 25 per cent. on the hearse that bears him to his grave, 20 per cent. on the organ that sings his requiem, and a final duty of 25 per cent. on his tombstone. This is a specimen of the operation of a Tariff which, according to the Prime Minister, was not to be piled up in the form of duties upon the cottager and artisan. When my honorable friend the Postmaster-General shrinks at the very mention of the word "tariff," let me tell him, with the greatest kindness in the world, that he will probably hear it more than once during the coming session, and that the word "tariff" will sound trumpet-tongued throughout Australia when the people are asked to poll their votes at the next election. I said I intended to say something about the Postal Department. I find that the Postmaster-General has apparently been doing that which Scripture describes as "making friends of the mammon of unrighteousness" that when other things fail he may be received into their good graces. What I refer to is that we have had the remarkable spectacle of a Minister travelling through his electorate—the whole State—and spending Commonwealth money with such prodigality that the State Premier absolutely makes public protest against the unwarrantable expenditure.

Senator DRAKE.—Nonsense.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I find, by a return recently published, that my honorable and learned friend has, during the recess or since his accession to office, increased the annual expenditure upon the post and telegraph services in Queensland by a sum of £27,000.

Senator DRAKE.—That is rubbish. That amount was paid for services initiated before federation, and for buildings and works constructed out of loans.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not pretend to know the details. My honorable and learned friend must now see the inconvenience of insisting upon speaking before me. I gave the honorable and learned senator warning that I intended to speak of these things. He therefore cannot complain if I now ask him not to interrupt me. I cannot possibly know the secrets of the honorable and learned senator's prison house, but I do know that Mr. Philp, the Premier of the State that sends the Postmaster-General here, has publicly protested against the lavish expenditure on the Postal department in that State because it has the effect of diminishing the proportion of Customs duties which he receives from the Commonwealth Treasurer. I say that it is a very remarkable thing, and it shows that while we may be restricted to £250 for an election candidature, if we happen to be Ministers of the Crown, with the revenues of the Commonwealth at our hands, we may get there just the same by another route. Now I am going to say that the Postmaster-General has been a party to a scandalous miscarriage of justice in his department in New South Wales in the shape of a double trial for the same offence. I shall briefly state the facts as disclosed from no other source than that of a copy of a report which the honorable and learned senator's own secretary has sent me. Although the person chiefly concerned was only a switch attendant, earning from 8s. to 10s. a week, a switch attendant is as much entitled to have me speak in his behalf as a man receiving £5,000 a year. I never saw this boy. I have difficulty almost in remembering his name, and should not remember it if I had not seen it written so often.

Senator DRAKE.—"Martin" is the name, and I can give the honorable senator all the particulars.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Here again, if the honorable and learned senator had been content to allow me to speak first, he would have had an opportunity to put the matter right, and as he has not done so, I am sure he will not disobey the ruling of the President by interrupting me. I do not desire to be interrupted while I state the facts in this case concisely. This boy, earning the small sum of 8s. or 10s. per week, was accused upon four charges, the most serious of which was an offence which is committed probably by every switch attendant in the land at one time or another—that of exchanging a word or two of information with a subscriber. Switch attendants are continually supplying bits of information in this way, and indeed the service could hardly be carried on without the exchange of a word or two in this manner. There were four charges alleged against this boy; but this was the most serious one. A departmental inquiry was held, three of the charges were held not to have been proved, and the other proved—the charge of talking. It was found to be of so serious a character that the boy was ordered to pay a fine of 4s. 6d.

Senator DRAKE.—He was not ordered to pay.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I shall now state a fact which has been disclosed to me, not by the report to which I have referred, but which I happen to have from an absolutely reliable source. The decision of the Deputy Postmaster-General, Mr. Dalgarno, that the boy should pay a fine of 4s. 6d. was communicated to him by the head of his department, but before he could pay the fine it happened that the Deputy Postmaster-General went away on a holiday, and an Acting Deputy Postmaster-General coming into power, the old charges were reiterated against the boy. In defiance of the principle that a man should not be tried twice for the same offence, in defiance also of the principle which my honorable and learned friend the Postmaster-General will recognise in military matters that an acting commandant has no right to alter orders given by the actual occupant of the office, this Acting Deputy Postmaster-General at once suspended the boy. The head of the department thought that a fine of 4s. 6d. was enough, but upon representations being made by some method, of which I have no knowledge, the boy was suspended and the Postmaster-General was advised. The honorable and learned gentleman set in motion all the magnificent machinery of the Commonwealth, including the Governor-General in Council, and a new trial is ordered by the Executive Council.

Senator DRAKE.—Not a new trial—a statutory inquiry.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator knows that there was a departmental inquiry. He cannot contradict that.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did they hang the boy?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—He was treated in much the same way. The honorable and learned senator is trying to draw a distinction between a departmental inquiry and a statutory inquiry. Will my honorable and learned friend say that a man who has been acquitted after trial at quarter sessions, or who has only been fined a nominal sum, may, when the head of his department has turned his back, be subjected to a second prosecution by a criminal court at the hands of some temporary occupant of the position? That a boy of tender years should be dismissed by order of the Governor-General in Council, with a Gazette notice heralding the matter forth to the world, is very extreme punishment. It was almost as bad as would be hanging the boy, and I say it is a despicable business. The facts as disclosed to me are of such a nature that I feel more than grieved that such a thing should happen in a department presided over by so amiable a gentleman as the Postmaster-General. I can only say of the honorable and learned senator, as I said of him at a public meeting in Sydney, that he is a very courteous gentleman and most obedient to his Under-Secretary.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable senator say that this boy should not have been dismissed?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I say that the boy, having been fined, should have been permitted to pay the fine, and should not have been dragged up again in order that he might be thrust out of the service.

Senator FRASER.—The honorable senator contends that two trials were too many?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is so. The Postmaster-General would, I think, desire to have two trials only of a vote of censure, and only if on the first trial the vote were carried. But he took two shots at this unfortunate boy, and that is what I object to. There is one matter that has not been dealt with, and that is the very serious question of the transferred State properties. It will be recollected that I fought this question pretty hard, and divided the Senate on the third reading of the Bill. In the other House the obnoxious clause was struck out, and now we find that there are millions of pounds worth of State properties, the transference of which forms the subject of negotiation between the Commonwealth Government and the State Governments. No provision is being made for the payment of the accruing interest, amounting to £300,000 a year. By the time that the properties have been transferred, the Commonwealth will owe an interest debt of at least £1,000,000 in connexion with their transfer, and that charge will have to be met in some way. Is it to be added to the debt obligation that is to be recognised by the Commonwealth to the States, or is it to be paid in cash? And if it is to be paid in cash, ought not provision to be made in the Government accounts for meeting this heavy demand when the amount is finally adjusted? Most distinctly I maintain that the Treasurer is neglecting a high duty of state in not making provision for that which must inevitably be required. I shall have a word or two to say of the condition into which a very important branch of the Commonwealth service has been allowed to drift, and that is the Defence Force. I have already indicated what my action will in all probability be in connexion with the naval agreement, but when I deal with the land forces, I find a state of affairs of so undesirable a character existing that it is my positive duty, having knowledge of the facts, to put them before the Senate.

Senator BARRETT.—We had a peculiar incident to-day in connexion with my question.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is a matter which the honorable senator has in hand, and he will no doubt take whatever action he thinks proper.

Senator BARRETT.—I shall follow it up.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is a matter that might perhaps be very well followed up, but I am not going to refer to any order issued by any soldier in the service of the Commonwealth, no matter how highly placed. I shall deal solely with actions of the Ministers themselves, and particularly actions of the Executive Council. When the Government took over the defence forces of Australia the land forces numbered 28,886, and in the short space of two years they have dwindled by 6,351, closely approaching a fourth of the total number. There has been not only a deterioration in number, but a heavy deterioration in quality. I attribute this result solely to the reign of incapacity and muddle that has characterized, from first to last, the action of the Government. When we hear of the difficulty of raising colonial loans on the London market, we recognise the fact that the Australian States are going there from time to time for loans. I suppose the Commonwealth Government will have to go there for the same purpose before long, and go like a borrower who has not got a valid policy of insurance as collateral security. The collateral security I refer to is in this case a valid defence force. What man can borrow, or what institution or individual will lend, without there being a fire or marine policy, as the case may be, as collateral security in the event of fire or wreck? The Government have been treating the question of Australian defence from first to last with a careless imbecility that is wholly discreditable to any gentlemen charged with the high duty of Ministerial office.

Senator DAWSON.—Is the commandant free from blame?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I said that I would only discuss the acts of the Government. There are very good reasons, which I need not refer to, why I decline to utter anything that comes to me in an official way. I shall use no information that is not of the most publicly known character, and that is not connected with the action or inaction of the Government. As regards the distinguished soldier who is the head of the Defence Force, the Government went along this road of drift and drivell for a year before they had a military adviser of any kind. From answers given by the Acting Minister for Defence in the other House, in September last, it seems that the military commandant had not been sworn in. There was no Act under which to swear him, and he has not yet been sworn in, I presume. Nor, according to an answer given by Senator O'Connor in the Senate, on the 12th July last, have the head-quarters staff been sworn in, because there is no Act to swear them in under. How can you possibly have a valid military force, the chief members of which have never been attested?

Senator CHARLESTON.—Under what authority are they acting?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—They are really acting under civil authority. Certainly they have a uniform, but, so far as I know, no parchment commission has been issued to any officer of the Defence Force. Since the Ministry took office, all that has happened has been that the names of officers have been published in the Gazette as having been appointed or promoted.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Is the General Officer Commanding acting under any Imperial authority?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Under the Constitution: there cannot be any Imperial authority. He is acting, I presume, under the authority given to him by the Governor-General in Council. In military and naval forces everybody has to be sworn in, but there has been no opportunity to swear in the General Officer Commanding and his staff. While we have had a Ministry in power for two and a-half years, they have not sworn in one soldier to serve the Commonwealth. They have only sworn in soldiers to serve the Commonwealth in the States. You cannot have a joint camp of the Victorian and New South Wales forces, say, at Albury, unless you keep them carefully on each side of the river.

Senator HIGGS.—You cannot do everything at once.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No. But it is not a desirable thing to be spending between £500,000 and £750,000 without having value for your money. The force is less to-day by practically one man out of every four that were in existence as State troops when the departments were taken over by the Commonwealth. So far as my knowledge goes there do not exist to-day more than two men out of every four who were there at the time when the departments were taken over. The difference, of course, has been made up in this way; that new men have been sworn in. We have, perhaps, equal to three in every four, but one of the three is a new man, and owing to the discouragement which has been notoriously given we find that stalwart men—men properly developed—in large numbers. Their places have been taken by youthful enthusiasts, who, however valuable the military training is to them, could not possibly be expected to stand the strain of active service with the same efficiency as men of more mature years.

Senator HIGGS.—They had boys at fourteen in the Boer army, and they were good shots, too.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is absurd to quote a fact of that kind as an answer to my charge that not only have the numbers of the force been depreciated by practically one man out of every four—and it will be quite that by the end of next month, when a lot more dismissals will take place—but the very stamina of the men is of a less substantial character.

Senator FRASER.—They had to reduce the number on account of the vote being reduced.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — To some extent, but that does not account for it all by any means. Reduction applies more particularly to the permanent troops, than to the militia and the volunteers. I have all the figures in a return prepared by the Treasurer, but I shall not weary the Senate with the details. I shall take the broad facts.

Senator HIGGS. — Can the honorable senator state the number of men in the defence forces in the States prior to the taking of the last referendum?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — No; but when the military departments were transferred the forces numbered 28,886.

Senator HIGGS. — The strength of the forces was swollen very much as soon as it was decided to federate.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Like they put up the salaries of a number of the officers.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not discussing the question of the salaries, because I believe that applies particularly to South Australia. I understand that colonels were manufactured there at a rate which was positively alarming, and I know that one or two staff officers were advantaged in New South Wales. For instance a staff officer who will retire in a month or two was promoted, and his commission dated back five or seven years, in order to give him seniority and extra pay. I do not defend these things for an instant, whoever perpetrated them. I am naming a New South Wales case, and thus showing a perfect willingness to condemn in New South Wales what Senator Playford objects to in the case of his own State. Here is another matter connected with the Defence Force. We have heard so much about the simplification of uniforms that this will appeal, I have no doubt, to those who have been specially urgent in demanding a reduction of unnecessary expenditure. I have a copy of the Commonwealth Gazette of the 16th May, and if honorable senators wanted food for merriment they might turn over five entire pages, the first entry being—

His Excellency the Governor-General in and over the Commonwealth, by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof and the final entry—

JOHN FORREST, Minister of State for Defence.

What do honorable senators think that those entire five pages refer to? Nothing but military millinery. If I were to take up the time of the Senate by reading some extracts, I am sure there would be a certain amount of hilarity over the grave proposition of the Governor-General in Council after all this incubation by the Ministry putting forward the mass of detail here for a force that is a dwindling quantity, and a force that has been reduced in enthusiasm and efficiency as well as in number. I suppose that to-day it is generally understood that there is scarcely a known drill throughout the length and breadth of the Commonwealth. The drill of the Imperial Army is not good enough for Australia, and we have to put up with some kind of cross between infantry and cavalry drill. Schools of instruction are held continually in the different States, in order to instruct the officers as to what is a proper drill for the Commonwealth. As in every one of these schools of instruction different orders are given and different drill is taught, they have done little more than cause "confusion worse confounded."

Senator STYLES.—Who is responsible for that drill?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The Minister for Defence; who else?

Senator STYLES.—Is not the Commandant responsible?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The Commandant has made so many recommendations, and has been so severely "sat upon" for making them, that I dare say he is not responsible for nearly so much as is supposed. I am not criticising anything that is not an act of the Governor-General in Council. Here is another act of the Governor-General in Council to which I draw attention; and I should like, Mr. President,—perhaps you will forgive me for saying it—to have the keen attention of yourself at this point, because I am going to deal with a matter that is to my mind a serious inroad upon the rights and privileges of Parliament, and an absolute incursion upon the Constitution under which we exist. We have a Constitution that provides—I will not labour the matter by quoting the section—that members of the Defence Force of all ranks, so long as they are not fully paid professional soldiers, may sit in the Parliament, and we have no law in any part of the Commonwealth that limits the rights of members of the Defence Force to enjoy the full rights of private citizenship. Yet we have a regulation issued on the 27th February last that absolutely in express terms prohibits any member of the Defence Force of any rank from instituting a meeting for religious or political purposes.

Senator PEARCE.—In uniform?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No; out of uniform. I will read the regulation, which was issued by the Governor-General in Council—

Officers and soldiers are forbidden to institute or, when in uniform, attend any meeting, demonstration, or procession for any religious or political purpose.

There are so many lawyers present that perhaps I may be venturesome in attempting to say what "institute" means. But I hope that any lawyer who is present will correct me if I make a mistake.

Senator FRASER.—Are they not allowed to go to church on a Sunday?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I will deal with that directly. To "institute" a meeting, in legal phraseology, means to commence, to initiate, to start, to begin.

Senator PEARCE.—Surely such a regulation would be ultra vires.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have here a letter, three pages long, which I have written to the Prime Minister on the subject. I propose to read some extracts from it, because this is a serious inroad upon the religious and political rights of every man who gives his services for the defence of the land of his birth. This is an absolute embargo upon any member of the Commonwealth forces initiating a public meeting for any religious or political purpose. I said just now that the Commonwealth Constitution provides that members of the Commonwealth Defence Force can sit in this Parliament. It also provides in another section that, sitting here, they are to possess the "powers, privileges, and immunities" of the House of Commons. Now, sir, there is no such regulation in England applying to either House of Parliament in respect of any officer or soldier belonging either to the militia or volunteer services. What happens? Under this order I am advised by the highest legal talent I have been able to consult—I have talked the matter over with and submitted the regulation to more than one King's Counsel—that my contention, addressed to the Prime Minister, is absolutely accurate, namely, that a member of the volunteer or militia services of the Commonwealth who sits in Parliament, or seeks a seat in Parliament, cannot, under this regulation, call a meeting of his constituents or those whom he desires to be his constituents. I consider that this is an absolute inroad upon the Constitution. I notice that the Postmaster-General smiles. What do I find in the Prime Minister's reply? He does not dispute any proposition which I have laid down, but he says—and this is written by Sir Edmund Barton himself and signed by his own hand; it is not a mere formality from an official—

I wish to point out that it is not proposed to apply to this, or any other regulation that may be issued, an altogether strained and unreasonable method of interpretation.

I do not say anything about a strained or unreasonable method of interpretation. I am only questioning the literal application of this order. We were told identically the same thing in this Chamber when we were asked to give phenomenal powers to the Minister for Trade and Customs. We were told identically the same thing with reference to the Immigration Restriction Bill—that there was to be no harsh application of it. But we now have Ministers telling us that they are absolutely bound by the strict letter of the law. Perhaps they are. And that is what I object to—that this regulation may be literally interpreted to direct a Member of Parliament, who is also a military officer, that he cannot call a meeting of his own constituents. I say, further, that this regulation has been broken every day. It was broken at the opening of Parliament. We then had a purely political meeting. What is a meeting of Parliament but a political meeting? Yet on that day we had the General Officer Commanding and his staff officers, in uniform, present, and there were outside a guard of honour and an escort in uniform. In fact, this is a regulation that cannot be enforced except some one in authority wants to get rid of some one. Then it will be used. And there is no appeal. It is not a regulation that can be decided in the law courts, because a member of the military service can be taken, put into a political bag, and dropped into a political Bosphorus without any appeal. The regulation applies to members of State Parliaments as well as of the Commonwealth Parliament. I say that the highest officer who sits in any one of the Parliaments of Australia may have his commission cancelled at any moment without any right of appeal. There should surely be some protection to a man's reputation, and he should not be liable to be thrown out into the street by a secret accusation such as I have known during my experience. I know of a case that happened in New South Wales, where a general officer, in defiance of the Queen's regulations, made four surreptitious attempts to get an officer dismissed or placed on the retired list; but he did not succeed, owing to the fact that he had a stiff-backed Minister to deal with. That Minister is a member of the Commonwealth Government to-day. I again point out that there is no appeal from a decision under this regulation. No member of the Defence Force can bring an action at law to protect his commission or his military status, because, though he might commence such an action, he would be out of the service before a trial could take place. This is an ukase that deals with men who are absolutely helpless to protect themselves. I will take all the risk of giving publicity to the circumstances that led to the making of this regulation which I look upon as so scandalous. His Eminence Cardinal Moran was returning from a visit to Europe, and on the day when he landed in Sydney the band of the Irish Rifles headed the procession which went to meet him. What was to be done was announced in the press by advertisement from day to day before the procession took place. It was announced that the band of the 8th Regiment was to head the procession. Of course, according to all military custom that I ever heard of, it would have been a proper thing for that action to be stopped, because the military are not supposed to mix themselves up with matters that are likely to bring them into collision with any part of the community. It is quite contrary to all military precedent for a military band in uniform to play in a political or religious demonstration. This is so well known that it need not be discussed further. But, instead of stopping the band from doing that which was contrary to military custom, the Government let them play at the head of the procession, and now they want to jump on every member of the military forces, from a private to a colonel, in respect of his civil and religious liberties. Under this regulation a military officer who was a churchwarden would not be able to call a meeting of his fellow churchwardens. I suppose that would be instituting a meeting for a religious purpose.

Senator DRAKE.—That is a strained interpretation.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I quite agree that it is. Perhaps I am pushing the argument to a reductio ad absurdum; but that is not altogether a new form of argument.

Senator DAWSON.—It is a possibility.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is an absolute possibility. I do not know—if we are to pursue the reductio ad absurdum—whether a member of the Defence Force could even be married by religious process! He would be instituting a meeting for a religious purpose! I admit that that is a strained application of the regulation, and is not likely to occur. I do not suppose that any Minister would go so far. But why does the Ministry attempt to take to itself such powers as could be used in such a manner for such a purpose, just because a band played a little out of the ordinary? If the Government comply with the law as they should do, they will have to lay the regulation before Parliament, and then we can discuss it. In view of a possible discussion, I propose to read a few paragraphs from my letter to the Prime Minister in order that honorable senators may have an opportunity of looking over the propositions for themselves in the pages of Hansard. I wrote—

Under this extraordinary edict the military forces could not have taken part in the demonstration which inaugurated the Commonwealth, nor in the intercessory services during the King's illness—because they are prohibited from attending a religious meeting in uniform—nor in the funeral service when the late Queen died. . . . I further submit that it is unconstitutional, inasmuch as the Commonwealth Constitution expressly guarantees to the members of the military forces certain political rights, which are curtailed in a flagrant manner by this regulation.

And I submit that for any person to attempt to impose the restraint of this regulation upon, or attempt to use it to restrain the statute right of any member of the military forces who sits or seeks to sit in the Federal Legislature, would constitute a most serious invasion of "the powers, privileges, and immunities" of the Parliament, as defined by section 49 of the Constitution.

Indeed, I submit that it may even be argued that the promulgation of this regulation actually constitutes a contempt of the Parliament, inasmuch as it attempts to limit "the powers, privileges, and immunities" of those members of the Legislature who are also officers of the military forces.

No such regulation obtains in the United Kingdom. There no similar attempt has been made to trammel the civil and religious liberty of either the regular army, militia, or volunteers.

I think I am more than justified in bringing this matter forward, so that when it comes before the Senate again, as no doubt it will, honorable senators will not consider that a new subject has been sprung upon them.

Senator BEST.—The honorable senator thinks it applies to what a man does privately as well as to what he does in a military capacity.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The difficulty is that we have no interpretation clause to show what constitutes a "meeting." I am not lawyer enough to say what in law constitutes a meeting; but I have enough knowledge of military affairs to know perfectly well that if it were desired to frame a charge against any man it would be very easy to call a gathering of two or three people a "meeting."

Senator BEST.—Does not the general context indicate that it relates to something done in a military capacity?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It stands distinctly by itself. It was issued separately, and there is nothing to guide one. Plainly, it means that under no circumstances is a man to initiate any meeting, nor is he to dream of attending a religious service in uniform. I do not know whether he could even go to a funeral. But I will say that the military authorities are really not carrying out the regulation so far as it applies to themselves, because church parades have been held. What I take exception to is that a Ministry should seek such extraordinary, such utterly unusual powers—powers which were never before asked for in the British dominions. Why do they ask for them, and are we to have these powers granted and exercised according to the strict letter of the law? I am sure I am addressing some honorable senators, who, if they were in my position, would be able to deal much more effectively with the matter, and that I am also addressing honorable senators who, if they were practicing in a court, would be able to make a most telling address on no better material than I am now submitting. Although I must thank the Senate for its consideration in listening to me while dealing at such length with this subject, I consider that I have simply done a public duty in bringing under notice a demand for an utterly unknown and unreasonable power to be exercised without any adequate cause.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator think that the sole reason for the regulation is that relating to the band incident?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—On this point I am only going by general repute. I cannot speak authoritatively as to that.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator will remember a certain meeting in Adelaide at which the troops attended.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I did not know of that. There may have been reasons other than the one I have stated, and, if so, I am sorry if I have put a 'strained interpretation upon the matter. There is one other matter to which I desire to refer. Under a defence scheme which has been agreed to it is proposed by the Government to destroy the last remnant of ornate attractiveness associated with the military forces. There is in New South Wales an artillery band, which has been the pride of that State for many a year, and which, whether as a military or as a string band, is perhaps unequalled in any part of the British dominions outside the United Kingdom. It has been notoriously a band upon which the whole community have centered a great deal of pride, and which in thousands of cases has rendered admirable aid to private as well as to public charities. Now it is to be dismissed. Although every bandsman is a trained soldier—is an artilleryman, and understands how to work the guns—nearly all of them are to go, and there is to be a paltry section of a band of twelve members left. I do not know whether I am addressing gentlemen who have a wide knowledge of bands, and I do not profess to have any specially profound knowledge of the subject myself. But this I do know, that you cannot have a decent military band consisting of less than from 24 to 26 performers, because the proportion of instruments cannot properly be balanced when the number is less. You have a little “tootling” association instead of a well-balanced and properly constituted military band.

Senator DOBSON.—Is this due to retrenchment?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes. To save the cost of twelve men this band is to be destroyed, and its destruction will be a great public loss. It plays in the public parks—

Senator FRASER.—If the Government have not the money, what are they to do?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think there might be retrenchment in some other direction. I know of certain ways in which I could very well retrench, but those are matters of which I cannot speak here. I know of them not as a public man, but officially, and, therefore, I will say nothing about them. If the Minister wants to know, and calls for my views, that of course will be another matter; but I am not going to mention them here. There is one other point to which I wish to allude. I am sure honorable senators will forgive me if I deal rather largely with examples from New South Wales, leaving other honorable senators to deal with those arising in other States. The first mounted band ever formed in Australia is connected with the New South Wales Lancers. That regiment is to be kept, to some extent, for administrative and escort and ceremonial purposes, and the men are to retain their lances as well as carry their rifles. The regiment furnishes escorts to Governors, and it is one which takes, as no doubt every honorable senator knows, a very prominent part in ornate ceremonies. The band has been kept up at great cost by the officers of the regiment. I have some actual figures, obtained from a gentleman who is conversant with the subject, and I find that the total cost to the Commonwealth of this band of 25 men has been, apart from their military pay, only £175 a year. That represents the cost of agistment and forage for 25 horses. For the sake of saving a miserable £175 the band is to go, thus taking the heart out of the mounted regiments, and taking away the little bit of “frill,” to use a colloquialism, which pleases the men and pleases the public.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Government is a band of robbers.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have not said that, and do not intend to say so.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But the honorable senator is trying to prove it.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not trying to prove it, but I think I am successfully showing that certain methods in connexion with the administration of the Defence forces have given a great deal of dissatisfaction in the State which I have the honour to assist in representing. The band to which I have just been referring has accumulated property at the cost of the officers of the regiment. There are band instruments and music. They have £200 worth of horseflesh, the horses costing £8 each—which is a very low price—and they have other property, totalling altogether between £600 and £700. The cost of maintaining this band of 25 men is £8 per man per annum. That is the ordinary pay which is granted to the militia. These men are trained soldiers. They do their drill and their musketry, and they are effective soldiers in every sense of the term. They are musicians into the bargain, but they have to go. Honorable senators may say—“Why not keep them on and allow some others to go?” The answer is that if you have men in the band you cannot have them in the ranks, and if the total strength of a regiment is reduced to a certain number you cannot deplete it still further even to the extent of having 25 men doing duty as bandsmen.

Senator DAWSON.—It would not do to have all band and no ranks.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Exactly. The pay which these men receive is the ordinary one, and it is to apply, I understand, throughout the Commonwealth. The cost of forage and agistment amounts to £175 and the keeping up of instruments together with a small payment to the band-master totals £50 a year. That £50 is an allowance granted to all bands, so that the actual cost of maintaining this important band is £175 per annum. It is worse than a pity that the volunteer or very slightly paid service of Australia is to be rendered of so dull and unattractive a character, for as a matter of personal knowledge I can assert that if you take away all that is attractive, all that is ornate, and all that appeals to the eye and to the mind as being something above the dull grind of hard work, you will not get your ranks filled. You will not get men to join, and you will not be able to keep those whom you have. It is all very well to say that men ought not to join for the sake of anything that is attractive—that they ought to join simply for grim work. We know perfectly well that a man puts on a Sunday suit every Sunday, and his moleskins every Monday morning, and he does his "graft," as the phrase goes, in a different style of clothing to what he wears when holiday making. That which applies to men in private life, applies equally to the professional soldier, the volunteer, or the militia man. You cannot take away all that is pleasing to the eye, and still find them showing the enthusiasm which induces men in times of peace to do the hard unattractive work which fits them for the duties of military service.

Senator DAWSON.—Honorable senators do not come here in pyjamas.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Certainly not. I suppose no one, except a man who has a bit of a mental kink, would go about in clothes which he knows are unattractive to his fellow men. No one wants to be a peacock, but there is some satisfaction in knowing that the common decencies are observed. I think it is a lamentable thing that this process of tomahawking the feathers off the military bird is going on at such a pace. In juxtaposition to that we find a Government Gazette published, with five entire pages taken up with descriptions of brand new military millinery at the hands of the steady and grave members of the Executive Council, with the Governor-General presiding.

Senator HIGGS.—Did not that come from the Commandant?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have no idea where it came from. It is sufficient for me to deal with the Commonwealth Gazette with its five pages of millinery headed by the name of His Excellency the Governor-General and the Executive Council, and signed by the Minister for Defence.

Senator DOBSON.—Is it not an offence for a soldier to come upon parade without full military uniform?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Certainly.

Senator DOBSON.—Then is it not necessary that these regulations should be published?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I only question the desirability of spending such an immense amount of enthusiasm upon trifling details of hooks and eyes, and collars, while the great work of building up the Defence Force is non-existent, because the Defence Force is dwindling rather than increasing. Certainly we must have regulations. It would never do for men to turn up in what uniforms they pleased. We should have a rabble rather than an army if that were permitted. But I recognise that we are to have a piebald army since paragraph after paragraph in those five pages of millinery provide that one thing after another is to be bought as funds permit. That will mean that one man may be clothed in one colour and another in another; that one man's jacket will be cut in one way, and another's in a different way, and if these regulations are to be carried out there will be a most beautiful piebald exhibition of troops on parade. It will be simply discreditable. Provision is made, for instance, that officers and men may wear scarlet uniforms, but officers appointed after this need not procure scarlet uniforms. We may find a company of men in scarlet led by an officer in khaki.

Senator FRASER.—He may not be able to afford all these gew-gaws.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not arguing for the gew-gaws. I am merely stating what the regulation provides. I have to express my gratitude to honorable senators for the kindness with which they have borne a fairly long speech, in which there has been introduced that which is always unattractive, namely, a considerable amount of detail. In concluding my remarks, I express a hope that the business initiated during the present week may be carried on with the same gentlemanly, kindly, feelings which are so characteristic of the members of the Senate at all times; that the same high level of debate which was evinced almost invariably during the long session which has passed may be sustained; and that when the work of this session comes to its close those of us who have to seek ratification at the hands of the people may find as a result of the challenge that we shall all meet together again to transact the public business of the country to which we seek to devote our services, and to which I believe every member of the Senate is most honorably and devotedly attached.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I am sure that the speech in which His Excellency the Governor-General has set forth the policy of his advisers is one which provides ample food for debate, and one which will provide us with ample work during the session before us. With much contained in that speech referring to the policy of the Government in the past I am in hearty accord. When we take all the circumstances into consideration the Government are to be congratulated upon their successful administration. I recognise that there is a considerable amount of dissatisfaction expressed in respect of many administrative acts of the Government, and, as a reasonable man, I admit that there must be some cause for this dissatisfaction. During my recent tour of the State from which I come, I met many who expressed a severe condemnation of various acts of various heads of departments. Reasons for that dissatisfaction have been indicated by other speakers, but we must admit that many of the results of the administration have justified acts which might, under other circumstances, be looked upon as being worthy of condemnation. Viewing their administration as a whole, I hope we may never have a worse set of Ministers than those who are in possession of the Government benches at the present time. With respect to the policy which the Government have put before us, and first of all dealing with the question of the High Court of Judicature Bill, I may say that when that measure was introduced last session, I was prepared to oppose it, believing that its introduction was premature, and that the time had not arrived when we should be justified in plunging the Commonwealth into the expenditure which the establishment of a High Court would involve. However, the developments of the past twelve months have convinced me that unless we do establish the High Court there will be grave danger to the smooth running of the federal machine. I can well believe that we shall very soon have a number of varying decisions given in different States under the temporary measure passed last session, giving State courts federal jurisdiction. Those decisions will be pronouncements interpreting the Constitution, and because they vary they will endanger the success of the Constitution which they are supposed to interpret. It is for this reason that I am now prepared to support the establishment of a High Court of Judicature. Reviewing all the circumstances, I think a debt of gratitude is due to those who in the Convention fought the battle for limiting the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I recognise the fact that they fought that battle in the interests of the Australian people. In my opinion we are to be congratulated upon the fact that when the High Court is established, by putting into practice the powers given us under the Constitution, we shall be able to almost entirely abolish the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I personally would much rather have the administration of justice placed in the hands of an Australian body than in the hands of an outside tribunal absolutely unacquainted with our circumstances. The question is raised whether three or five Judges should constitute the High Court, and I think it is upon that question that the whole battle will be fought, as the necessity for the establishment of a High Court is now generally recognised. It will require all the oratorical powers of the Government to persuade Parliament that five Judges should be appointed at the outset. I, at present, have an open mind upon the question, and I shall listen with interest to the reasons which may be advanced by legal members of the Senate in support of the appointment of the larger or smaller number of Judges. With respect to the settlement of the question of the capital site, I recognise that representatives of New South Wales have a right to ask that the rest of the Commonwealth shall keep faith with them in this matter. As a senator representing another State, I am prepared with the utmost expedition to carry out the contract entered into by the people of Australia with the people of New South Wales, and I shall assist the Government in any step which they may deem it advisable to take to bring about a speedy settlement of this question. I may say, also, that I believe such steps may be taken without pledging the Commonwealth to any great expenditure. Perhaps a speedy settlement of the question of the site may result in a saving of money. We know that, as a result of the terrible drought experienced there, land in New South Wales is at present at bed-rock value. We are all of us optimistic enough to believe that a period of recovery is before us, during which land values will rise, and if we have to resume land for the federal territory at a later period we shall have to do so at a higher price than that at which we could get the same land now. I now come to a question which, to every Western Australian in the first degree, and to every Australian in the second degree, is of prime importance. That is the proposal for making the federation with Western Australia a real federation. I refer, of course, to the construction of the proposed railway from the east to the west. Some honorable senators have said that they are inclined to be keenly critical in dealing with this proposal. And seeing the state of our finances, I admit that in taking that view they are doing no less than their duty. They would not be doing their duty if they consented to the construction of this railway merely from a spirit of good fellowship. They have a right to ask for, and they should be given good reasons why the railway should be constructed. They should be advised as to its probable cost, the probable revenue to be derived from its working, and its utility to the Commonwealth as a whole. I trust that, not so much as the consequence of what may be said on the floor of this Chamber, but as the consequence of what will be said by the experts who have been commissioned to make inquiries, the proposal will be found to commend itself to honorable senators. I am sure that honorable senators will recognise the necessity of providing for the efficient defence of every part of the Commonwealth, and of giving facilities of access to, and communication with, every State in the Federation. I am sure that members of the Senate will look at the question from these points of view, and if that is done we shall have no cause to complain. In this manner we may, I think, ask honorable senators to deal with us as Canada dealt with the provinces of the Dominion in a very similar case, so far as geographical position is concerned. When the Dominion of Canada was formed the States were not connected by the most modern means of communication, and there very quickly sprang up an agitation for the construction of a railway. On the part of one of the provinces—British Columbia—it was made a condition of their joining the Dominion that the Canadian-Pacific railway should be constructed. I am sorry that Western Australian delegates to the Convention had not sufficient foresight or business conception to make a similar condition for the entry of Western Australia into this Federation. In his book, Canada and the Canadians, Goldwin Smith, who will be admitted to have an intimate knowledge of Canadian questions, says—

To link together the widely severed members of the Confederation, two political and military railways were to be constructed by united efforts as federal works. The first was the Intercolonial spanning the vast and irreclaimable wilderness which separates Halifax from Quebec. This has been constructed at a cost of 40,000,000 dollars, and is now being worked by the Government at an annual loss which is reckoned by an independent authority at 500,000 dollars. The Canadian-Pacific has also been constructed at a cost to the Dominion, in money, land grants, &c., of something like 100,000,000 dollars.

He speaks of the military value of these lines, and then he points out that as a commercial road the Intercolonial is a failure, for the simple reason that there is not, nor is there likely to be, any trade of the slightest importance between Canada and the maritime provinces. In order to link the distant States with those, as it were, in the commercial world, Canada was prepared not only to construct a railway which was to be run at a loss, but to construct a railway which for the greater part of its length was to be practically of no commercial importance, and whose commercial usefulness has not yet even been demonstrated. Goldwin Smith goes on to point out that even then it had a rival in the trans-continental railway of the United States, which lessened its commercial usefulness, and made it impossible that it could ever be a great commercial success. He also points out that as a colonization achievement the railway has never been a success. His summing up of the whole position is that they did right in constructing the railway; that they fulfilled an obligation which was a contingency upon federation, and that without that railway federation would not have been a fact to the distant States in the Dominion.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That was promised to the maritime provinces before federation took place.

Senator PEARCE.—While Western Australia, through its delegates to the Convention, did not make the construction of this transcontinental railway the condition of its entering the Commonwealth, there was an overwhelming preponderance of opinion that the eastern States recognised the justice of our claim, and were prepared to construct a line. And if anything were needed to confirm that opinion, to a great extent it was the correspondence from the Premier of South Australia and the present Minister for Trade and Customs. From both these gentlemen we had letters written ostensibly in the name of the people of South Australia. These gentlemen, as Senator De Largie pointed out yesterday, held responsible positions, and to all intents and purposes must have been recognised by the people of their State as speaking in its name, and knowing that the consent of South Australia was necessary. Having got the promise of the men who were ruling the destinies of South Australia at the time that they would not object to the construction of the railway, we had every reason to assume that the Commonwealth would agree to its construction. Much has been said by way of interjection, rather than comment, that the railway can never be a success because the land along the route is worthless. I make bold, to say, on the authority of those who have been over the land it traverses, that that is an entirely erroneous idea so far as it refers to Western Australia. For instance, in his report, Mr. Muir, who went over the line of route and made an examination lasting for some months, writes in these terms of the quality of the land :—

I was led to believe, prior to starting this trip, that the country to be traversed consisted almost entirely of a desert, composed of sandhills and spinifex flats. This impression proved, however, to be perfectly erroneous, unless a waterless tract of country, though well grassed and timbered, can be called a desert.

Interspersed through this forest are numerous flats covered with grass, as well as with saltbush and other folder shrubs. The soil is of good quality, and the growth of grass and herbage luxuriant.

At about 200 miles, rolling downs of limestone formation are met with, covered with a luxuriant growth of grass, and occasionally a saltbush flat. This country is lightly timbered with myoporum, and presents a beautiful park-like appearance.

Close to the coast a narrow belt of mallee runs, and further inland small belts of myall and myoporum are met with. This country is also well grassed, and saltbush and other feed bushes are plentiful.

To the north, near the 31st parallel of latitude, the country is more open. In fact, from the South Australian border for 250 miles in a westerly direction, it is one large open plain of limestone formation, fairly well grassed throughout.

Taken as a whole, this stretch of country is one of the finest I have seen in Australia, and, with water—which doubtless could be obtained if properly prospected for, it is admirably adapted for grazing purposes, and will, without doubt, be taken up some day from end to end.

At the time of our visit this tract of country must have been at its driest, as the settlers at Eyre and Eucla informed me that it was the worst season they had experienced for the last twenty years. From our observations, it was quite evident that there had been a long dry spell, extending over fully twelve months I should think. Still the grass was sound and strong, growing for the most part to a height of 12 inches.

Judging from the growth of grass and other vegetation on this country, it is very evident that there must be good falls of rain over it at irregular intervals; but the ground is so porous that the rain, as soon as it falls, percolates through the limestone.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Has good land like that been taken up by pastoralists?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is waterless.

Senator PEARCE.—Any water supply must be of a subterranean character. The Government of Western Australia have never been in a position, or enterprising enough, to open up stock routes. At present they are boring for water. On the route of this very line, 60 miles from Eucla, a Government boring party struck very good stock water six months ago. Mr. Muir, the surveyor, goes on to say in his report, which was made to the Government of Western Australia about twelve months ago—

Apart from the facilities that would be afforded to railway construction, and the maintenance of the railway service when completed, by artesian water being struck on this waterless tract of country, it would be of incalculable profit to the State in another direction. At present there are millions of acres of splendid pastoral land lying idle in this portion of the State, solely because water has not been conserved. Once let it be known that artesian water has been discovered, and what is now nothing better than a waste, would be transformed, in a very short space of time, into one of the most important stock-raising centres of our State.

The construction works for the railway will be very light, and will be practically the laying down of a surface line for the whole length between Kalgoorlie and the border.

The engineers have submitted two estimates of the cost of constructing the line. One is contingent upon water being struck along the route, and the other is based on the assumption that water will not be struck, but will have to be carried from our abundant supply at Kalgoorlie. In the centre of that belt of 250 miles the engineers on their return journey struck a surface water supply containing some million gallons of water, showing that it would be quite possible to obtain, by surface conservation, sufficient water for the purpose. Senator PLAYFORD shakes his head, but let me remind him that it was done along the route of the Kalgoorlie railway, and that up to the establishment of our great water scheme, that line was run entirely by water obtained by surface conservation. That country has a poorer rainfall than the country through which the transcontinental railway will pass.

Senator PLAYFORD.—You cannot conserve water on top of loose limestone.

Senator PEARCE.—It is a characteristic of all our inland country that immense granite outcrops occur. We met with granite outcrops over the greater portion of the surveyed line to Kalgoorlie. At the foot of a granite outcrop we were able to construct a dam, and not a drop of water was allowed to escape. The granite outcrop acted like a galvanized iron roof, and by this means a sufficient supply of water was obtained to run the railway service through 378 miles of what is called desert. I am not making any statements which are not borne out by the official reports of a party of experts who have gone over every mile of the route, and whose professional reputations depend upon the accuracy of their remarks. It is unlikely that they would make any statement that was inaccurate. It is assumed by the opponents of this project that the railway will only be used for the carriage of passengers and mails. But we have to recollect that the people of Western Australia, particularly on the gold-fields, will for many years draw their supplies of agricultural produce from other States, and that for a great number of years they will draw their supplies of beef and mutton from other States. We have not in our coastal districts any country which will for many years be useful for pastoral purposes. All the country is heavily timbered, and I do not need to point out that heavily timbered country, carrying a heavy undergrowth, is not suitable for the running of stock. A large portion of our supply of cattle from South Australia is drove down to Port Augusta, or until it strikes the line running up to Oodnadatta, carried by steamer to Fremantle, put in the trucks again, and taken a distance of 378 miles up to Kalgoorlie. The Victorian supply will come still by steamer. In 1901, when our population was much less than it is now, we imported from South Australia 5,544 cattle, 432 horses, and 13,109 sheep. The greater portion of the supply we get from South Australia comes from its northern districts. It is proved by our Engineer-in-Chief, who has made a comparison of the cost, that this traffic, instead of going by steamer as at present, would go over the transcontinental railway. In a report he says:—

The assumption that there would be a considerable traffic in cattle and sheep on this railway is based upon the fact that freight by rail for a bullock from Port Augusta to Adelaide (in full truckloads), would be about 16s. 6d., and the sea freight from there to Fremantle I am informed about £4, and the railage again from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie, £1 3s. 6d., making in all £6 as compared with which the cost per bullock (in full truck loads) at Western Australian railway rates, from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, would be about £3 4s. 6d., showing a saving of £2 15s. 6d. per bullock—equivalent, I believe, on the average, to about 1d. per lb.

I think it is a mistake to assume that it is goods traffic which makes the railways of these States pay. The goods traffic of any railway only represents about 50 per cent. of the receipts. I have here the percentage of receipts of the two kinds of traffic, goods and passenger, and I find that in most of the eastern States the goods traffic brings in 50 per cent. of the receipts, and the passenger traffic accounts for the other 50 per cent. We have upon our eastern gold-fields a large population who are allied by blood with the people on this side of the continent, and who are continually travelling backwards and forwards. They now have to travel by steamer. A large number of people object to travelling by steamer for a variety of reasons. Our Engineer-in-Chief, Mr. O'Connor, has made an estimate as to freights and fares for passengers by the proposed railway, in comparison with steam-ship fares, based upon the fares usually charged in the various States. He tells us this—That from Kalgoorlie to Adelaide by the overland route the first-class fare would be £5 13s. 3d. By the present route, taking the train to Fremantle, and then steamer to the eastern States, the fare is £10 18s. The second class fare by the railway would be £3 8s.; the present cost is £8 0s. 10d. That is by taking the best lines of steamers—the P. and O., the Orient, or the German line. But he also makes a comparison with the ordinary coastal service. The fare from Kalgoorlie to Adelaide by the railway would be £5 13s. 3d., but by rail and sea route, using the coastal steamers, it is £7 14s. The second-class fare would be £3 8s., whereas by rail and sea route the cost of the journey is £4 19s. 10d.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In the one case you get meals on board, and in the other you do not.

Senator PEARCE.—When a passenger is only three days on the train we can easily estimate what the cost of the meals would be. We have on our gold-fields nearly one-half of the present population of Western Australia. We have nearly 100,000 people on the eastern gold-fields, mostly adults. They are a class of people who travel a great deal, and they would, I am sure, prefer the overland route to the sea route even if the price were greater on the railway. The consequence is that a heavy passenger traffic is assured for the line. As I have pointed out, it is possible that a large goods traffic will also be assured. In regard to the goods traffic also we have to look to the quantity of food stuffs supplied to the gold-fields. To a large extent these supplies come from South Australia. The gold-fields are entirely dependent on outside supplies for food stuffs. Food stuffs were imported from South Australia alone, in the year 1901, in the following quantities:—Flour, 220,281 centials; oatmeal, 33,488 lbs; pollard, 1,964 tons; bran, 5,637 tons; hay, 146 tons; chaff, 529 tons. The greater portion of the agricultural products of South Australia supplied to the gold-fields come from Port Augusta to a point 70 or 80 miles south of Port Augusta, and there would be very little lost by bringing them to Adelaide. Then the only comparison you have to make is in regard to the freight from Adelaide to Fremantle by steamer, and then from Fremantle overland on our Western Australian railways. Mr O'Connor says he believes that the freight will be found greater by steamer and railway than would be the charge on the overland railway line. There is also the double handling of goods to be considered. So that we have to realize not only that the passenger traffic will be large, but also that there will be a considerable goods traffic. There is another point which I believe appeals to honorable senators very strongly, and that is the usefulness of the proposed line from the point of view of defence. We know that Major-General Bevan Edwards strongly recommended the building of the line. Major-General Hutton has also recommended the building of it, both in speeches in Western Australia and, I believe, by a minute to the Minister for Defence. I do not think that all the advantages would be in favour of Western Australia from the point of view of defence. For this reason—We have in Western Australia the largest proportion of adult population of any State in the Commonwealth. Our population between the ages of 21 and 45—I am speaking of males only—was, at the end of 1901, 61,714 out of a total population of 194,890. That is, 31 per cent. of our total population are adult males between the ages of 21 and 45.

Senator O'KEEFE.—And look at the sort of men they are too.

Senator PEARCE.—They are the cream of Australian manhood—the very best class of men from the military point of view. Compared with the figures I have quoted, we find that in Victoria only 17½ per cent. of the population are between the ages stated, and I dare say that a similar average will be found in South Australia. In New South Wales the average is 18½ per cent. When we look at those figures we realize that South Australia, by consenting to the building of this railway, and the Commonwealth by building it, will give to the eastern States a great power of mobilizing its adult manhood and bringing into active use 60,000 men between the ages of 21 and 45—the picked men of the Commonwealth. That is an important point to be remembered in connexion with defence. Western Australia is at the front door of the Commonwealth as regards both the European and Asiatic nations. We have two magnificent harbours—one created by the genius of man, and one by nature—which are almost unequalled, if we leave Sydney harbour out of consideration.

Senator DOBSON.—Do not forget Hobart.

Senator PEARCE.—But Hobart is within striking distance of Australia and within a few hours' sail of the eastern States, whereas in Western Australia we are a week's steam from the eastern States. A foreign military commander would prefer to make a descent on Albany at once, and establish himself there, rather than go to Hobart or to any other point on the eastern side of the continent.

Senator DONSON.—Is it suggested that the whole cost of this undertaking should be borne by the Commonwealth as new national expenditure?

Senator PEARCE.—I take it that it must be so, if the railway is to be a national undertaking, as we ask that it shall be. If it is to be a State undertaking, and the cost is to be treated as transferred expenditure, Western Australia and South Australia, as they would have to pay for it in an indirect manner, might as well construct the line themselves and have independent control of it.

Senator DONSON.—Might there not be a compromise?

Senator PEARCE.—If there is a proposal for a compromise I should like to hear it, but I see no reason for one. We have a right to ask for this as a national concern.

Senator DONSON.—It is not quite fair to Tasmania.

Senator PEARCE.—Surely it is not a matter that wholly concerns Tasmania, when there is half of the continent absolutely which, in case of war, is at the mercy of a foe and cut off from the rest of Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—You have communication by sea.

Senator PEARCE.—Of what use is that? A single cruiser in the Bight could cut off that communication entirely, and make it absolutely impossible for any communication to take place between the East and the West, or for any troops to be sent, or for commerce to be carried on. As Senator Symon pointed out yesterday, it is not likely that we shall have a large fleet of our own, and when we have this new naval agreement brought into force and the British fleet in these waters is sent off to the China Seas to fight the battles of the Empire, one small foreign cruiser or gunboat could prey upon our commerce with the greatest ease. There is another point of view from which we must view this matter, and that is the acceleration of the mail service between the old country and the eastern States. By constructing this railway we might save three days between Fremantle and Melbourne.

Senator STYLES.—What is the rate of speed proposed?

Senator PEARCE.—I think it is 40 miles an hour.

Senator STYLES.—There is no such speed in Australia—not within 8 miles an hour.

Senator PEARCE.—I know one line upon which the train travels 60 miles an hour for a portion of the journey—that is on the Melbourne and Adelaide line when crossing the desert. This proposed line will cross the desert for a considerable length of country where there will not be many stopping-places. Senator Styles is in the habit of travelling to Williamstown, and I suppose he thinks that the stations on this transcontinental line will be as close together as those on the line upon which he travels. It is a matter of importance to the eastern States to, if we can, accelerate by two days the mail service from Europe, and it is clear that we can save that time between Melbourne and Fremantle.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The nearest route would be across the continent to Port Darwin.

Senator PEARCE.—I am very anxious to know whether, if that line is completed on the land-grant system, the merchants of Australia will allow their mails to be taken over a semi-barbarian country, and through territory where in the winter the climate is of such a character as would interfere with the regular traffic and perhaps block the mails for weeks at a time. Again, if arrangements are to be entered into for a subsidy for mail boats, I see no reason why we should pay a subsidy for taking the mails round the coasts when we could utilize this railway and save the subsidy from Fremantle to Adelaide. We could put that down as a debit.

Senator PLAYFORD.—You will not get the mails carried any cheaper by building the railway.

Senator PEARCE.—The handling of the mails at the various ports gives rise to delay, and the steam-ship authorities would look upon it as an advantage if they had to handle them only at Fremantle, instead of at four or five ports.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It takes only half-an-hour to put them on board.

Senator PEARCE.—I am in a position to say that it takes a little more than that. Occasionally they have to wait for some time, at the honorable senator's own front door at Largs Bay, for the arrival of the mails.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is no delay.

Senator PEARCE.—A committee of experts is dealing with this matter, and we shall have their report presented to us. But what I would ask the Senate to say is, that if that report is at all favorable, they will support the Government to the extent of authorizing a flying survey between the points in order that we may have authentic information as to the cost of constructing the line. I think that is a reasonable request, but I recognise that we have no right to ask honorable senators to pledge themselves to the construction of the railway.

Senator DOBSON.—What would a flying survey cost?

Senator PEARCE.—The actual cost of Muir's survey was £1,083 for 700 miles.

Senator STYLES.—That was not a flying survey. The party simply rode across country on camels.

Senator PEARCE.—The trip was undertaken in order to gain a knowledge of the water supply and general contour of the country. An engineering survey would be of course a little more costly.

Senator PLAYFORD.—About £5,000 would do it.

Senator PEARCE.—While I admit as a representative of Western Australia that we have no right to ask for more than that at the present juncture, I think we are preferring a reasonable request when we say that if the report is at all favorable the Senate should support the making of a trial survey. In that way a great deal of assistance would be given to the Government. I pass on now to the Immigration Restriction Act. A good deal has been said as to the way in which the Act has been administered, especially in regard to the immortal six hatters, and in dealing with this subject I should like again to quote from Goldwin Smith's book. It is well to remember that Goldwin Smith is a free-trader of the Manchester school, and, therefore, is not likely to have any sympathy with the principle of closing the door to immigration. At page 51 of his book he says—

Canada, when the value of the connexion is under discussion, is always set down as a place where any Englishman can find a home. A sudden change has come over the attitude of the occupants of the American continent on the subject of immigration. Till lately the portals were opened wide, and all the destitute of the earth were bidden to come in. Now the door is half shut, and there are a good many who would shut it altogether.

I have here a cutting from the Empire and Mail Newspaper of Canada, dated January 23, 1903, which sets forth that a man who brought in a person under contract was fined for doing so. Mr. Anderson, of Sydney, was not fined, and yet we are told that the Government has done something which no other British Government would dare to do. Here we have the Government of Canada, a country which is attracting thousands of people, according to one honorable senator, proceeding against an employer for bringing in a man under contract, and a fine being imposed. There is another country which attracts a fair proportion of people, the United States of America. There the Immigration Restriction Act prohibits the entry of labour under contract, but I have yet to learn that the credit of the United States is in any way injured by that legislation. Let me say also that the Act is enforced there. It is not a dead measure on the statute-book. In 1897 1880 persons were deported at the expense of the steamship companies from the United States of America. Of that number 328 were under contract to perform labour in the States. In 1898 3,229 persons were excluded, 417 for being under contract to perform labour. In spite of all this I have yet to learn that the United States of America, is going down hill, that the stream of immigration has ceased there, that the credit of the country is injured or that she has been made a laughing-stock in the eyes of the English-speaking world. On the contrary, I think she is entitled to the respect of the English-speaking world, and that she gets it. As the United States of America as well as Canada find it necessary to have such legislation, and to enforce it, I think that the people of Australia, having the Immigration Restriction Act on the statute-book of the Commonwealth, are not going to condemn the Government which enforces it, neither are they going to ask for its repeal. I believe there is a conspiracy on the part of certain people in the Commonwealth to bring the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act into contempt. In support of my assertion I shall give one little illustration which came under my own notice. The Sultan of Johore recently visited Australia, and we had a howl of indignation throughout the press of the Eastern States, because, as it was said, he had been prevented by a Customs official from landing at Fremantle, and was told that he had to submit to an educational test. Great indignation was caused by the indignity which had been put upon this Prince. As a matter of fact, however, no Customs official in Fremantle ever spoke to the Sultan. What happened was this : That when the steamer was nearing Fremantle certain passengers spoke to him—

Senator DE LARGIE.—Saloon passengers ?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, they were certainly not steerage passengers. They told him that when he reached Fremantle he would have to submit himself to an educational test. The officials on board advised him to the same effect. I shall quote now from a leading newspaper in Western Australia—the West Australian—which is not by any means a labour party's paper. In its issue of 1st May last a column interview with the Sultan of Johore is given, and the reporter goes on to say of the Sultan—

He was amused at a slight contretemps which had occurred in the morning. Some reference had been made by a Customs official to the Immigration Restriction Act, and this remark seems to have unaccountably been misconstrued by the ship's officers to the effect that a formula would have to be gone through before the Sultan could land. The matter had reached His Highness, and although indignant at first, he was highly amused over it when mentioned later in the day.

That is the canard, and it shows the means which are being used in an endeavour to weaken the position of the Immigration Restriction Act in the opinions of the people of Australia.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Was the Sultan of Johore a member of a coloured race ?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Then why was he not subjected to the educational test ?

Senator PEARCE.—Because, as a distinguished visitor, he did not come under paragraph (g) of section 3 of the Act. He did not come here to reside. The opponents of the principles of legislation of this kind have arrived at a pretty pass when they have to descend to lies—because this was a lie—in order to bolster up a case against the administration of the Act. I think a good many of the statements made about the six hatters were on a par with those made in the newspapers of Melbourne and Sydney, relative to the Sultan of Johore. I am glad to see that the Government propose to bring forward a measure for the establishment of courts of conciliation and arbitration. I do not think the labour party will be found tumbling over one another to put that measure on the statute-book. The time has now arrived when, in the opinion of the great bulk of the people of Australia, this measure is absolutely necessary, not merely for the workers but for the employers. Recently the Chamber of Manufactures in Victoria received a slight setback at the hands of the Chamber of Manufactures in Western Australia. The Victorian chamber approached the Western Australian institution with a view of getting it to oppose the introduction of this legislation, but the Chamber of Manufactures in Western Australia passed a resolution saying that they would take no action in the matter. Why? Because experience there has shown that a conciliation and arbitration court is just as good for the employer as it is for the employé. Provided you have a good Act, as we have in Australia, and a good man on the Bench—

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is what we want, a good administrator.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes. In such circumstances the court will be found to be a benefit to the whole community. We have to remember that in agreeing to a Conciliation and Arbitration Act the workers of the Commonwealth give away a considerable amount of their power. They give away many opportunities which they would otherwise enjoy of making increased wages. I believe that on many occasions the workers in Western Australia would have been in a position to take advantage of the situation had there been no such Act on the statute-book. They would have been able to obtain higher wages in many trades ; but the Act had bound us down for a term, and we had to accept the conditions. The moment was favorable for obtaining higher wages with the greatest ease, still the Arbitration Act prevented us from doing so. It will be seen, therefore, that the advantage of such legislation is not altogether on the side of the worker. Those who come from Western Australia and who have had some experience of the working of a Conciliation and Arbitration Act there have been considerably amused by the criticism that has taken place in Melbourne in regard to this proposed legislation. Some time ago I read in one of the papers, a report of a speech made by Mr. F. T. Derham before the Chamber of Manufactures, relative to the working of legislation of this kind in New Zealand. He said it was ruining that country ; that industries were declining there, and that capital was leaving the State. I wrote to the Right Honorable the Premier of New Zealand, Mr. Seddon, enclosing the newspaper cutting, and asking if there was any truth in the statement. In reply, I received a letter from Mr. E. Tregear, Secretary for Labour, intimating that the Premier had handed him my letter for acknowledgment and reply. After acknowledging the receipt of the cutting, Mr. Tregear went on to say—

Since the passing of the Compulsory Arbitration Act (as it is nicknamed) in 1894, the number of persons employed under the Factories Act has exactly doubled, rising from 25,000 in that year to 50,000 in 1901. The number of people in the pay of the Government has not increased perceptibly, but, if it had, the increasing population and the general prosperity of the colony would have justified the extension. There is no doubt that the working classes generally, not only the artisans, but the shop-employed and warehouse-employed people, have increased with the same ratio as those engaged in manufacture. There are not 17,000 out of employment, as Mr. Derham states; if there are, they possess the faculty of concealment. Indeed, it is very difficult for me at times to get labour for the rural districts since the war took our young men away. It is said that on many farms the girls have to tackle outside work. Every year and every election the determination of the people of New Zealand to support the Act becomes more and more pronounced. Almost every year there has been an amendment Act drawing tighter the bands and closing the gaps. The Opposition has opposed every one of these amendments, to its own utter destruction. It is now only "the shadow of a name." What better proof of value can you have than the opinion of those who have to live and work under such a law?

Then in the Review of Reviews I find these figures quoted concerning the trade of New Zealand. I give, of course, round numbers. I find that in 1891 the imports were valued at £6,000,000, and the exports at £9,000,000. In 1897, imports £8,000,000, exports £10,000,000; in 1902, imports £11,000,000, exports £13,000,000. I say that if arbitration has brought about that result in New Zealand, let us hope that it will have a similar result in Australia. Before I leave this subject I should like to say that in Western Australia some twelve months ago we had a notice of a reduction of wages published on our mining fields. Honorable senators know what the mining industry has done for Western Australia, and when I tell them that our mining camps are so well organized that if it had not been for the existence of the Arbitration Act in Western Australia we should have had a universal strike throughout the mining industries, it will be admitted that the Australia to an almost irreparable extent. A strike was averted, the wages were adjusted, and a scale of wages arranged which, though protested against in one or two places, was generally accepted by both parties, and all that was accomplished without the loss of a single day's work to any man, or the loss of a single dividend to any shareholder.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Could the men have been compelled if they had refused to work?

Senator BEST.—No, they could not, but they might have been fined.

Senator PEARCE.—We could compel them in this way: we could fine them. The union funds are liable; then every individual member of a union is liable, and as no member can retire from a union without giving three months' notice, he has no opportunity of retiring in anticipation of an adverse award, and he may be prosecuted in the police courts of the State.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The workers also have some sense of honour.

Senator PEARCE.—As Senator De Largie says, the workers also have some sense of honour. In my experience of the operation of the Arbitration Act in Western Australia, I have never known a suggestion made that was interfered with or departed from.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How many years has it been in force?

Senator PEARCE.—It has been in force since 1898. We have had a number of awards given, and some of our trades have been working under the Act since 1899. Let me say that during that time we have not had a continuous period of prosperity. The enemies of this kind of legislation will say that it is all very well while things are on the up-grade, and that the worker will accept the position so long as his wages are being continually raised. That, however, has not been the case in Western Australia, for, since the introduction of the Act, we have had times of depression and times when the labour market has been overstocked. Some of the decisions of the courts have not been considered favorable to the men. They have taken away privileges and pay, but on the whole the operation of the Act has given general satisfaction. I should add that we have been extremely fortunate in the appointment to the Bench of Judge Burnside, a man of sound common sense, and one who recognises his great responsibility in holding in his hands practically the destinies of the industries of Western Australia.

Senator BAST.—Can either party compel a reference to the court in Western Australia?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, either party can compel a reference, and if during the currency of an award either party considers that conditions have so altered that it should not be enforced—if, for instance, the wages fixed are so high as to make it impossible for the employer, under the altered conditions, to pay them—he can ask for a review of the case and a re-hearing. I wish now to refer to the action of the Government in adopting the recommendations of a select committee appointed by the Senate, and of which I was a member, to report upon the means of communication between the mainland and Tasmania. I am glad to find that the Government have adopted most of the recommendations of that committee. I recognise that Tasmania has a right to an increased mail service, and I hope that as Tasmania has received from the Commonwealth what we thought that State was entitled to in the way of increased facilities of communication, similar action will be taken to bring Western Australia into closer touch with the rest of the Commonwealth. Dealing with the question of the postal contract, and the section of the Postal Act requiring the employment of white crews upon subsidized mail steamers, it appears to me, that, judging by their utterances, some of our honorable friends would, if they had their way, not only repeal that section, but enact a section prohibiting the carriage of mails upon boats worked by white labour. From every point of view it must be to our advantage to do what little we can to encourage the employment of white crews on our coast. It is said that the principle of a white Australia does not extend beyond the shores of Australia, but surely marine employment is just as legitimate a source of employment for the Australian worker as employment upon shore; and if ever our people are to take to that kind of employment, we must prevent the unfair competition of these coloured persons. I think we owe a debt of gratitude to Senator Neild for bringing forward that military regulation. Its production has been one of the interesting incidents of the debate. We are to have the Defence Bill before us this session, and I can promise the Government that on the question of defence they shall have my uncompromising opposition to any measure for conscription, and to any measure which will introduce into Australia any military principle other than that of a citizen soldiery. I shall also be opposed to any proposal to contribute Australian money in the shape of a naval subsidy. I believe that we hold the moneys of the Commonwealth in trust for the people, and we have no right to give them away to another Parliament to spend as they wish. We are responsible for the expenditure of the Commonwealth, and while we may not get so efficient a system of defence—and on that point I am not convinced—I believe it is now time to lay down the principle that we must have the spending of our own money in our own way. In conclusion, I hope, with others, that during the session we may be able to do some practical work, and that much of the legislation foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech will find its way on to the statute-book of Australia.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—As the Senate will not have very important duties to perform during the next few weeks, I hardly think it can be said that we are wasting time in continuing this discussion. I feel indebted to Senator Neild for his breezy address, in which he gave me some information on defence and other matters, although I think that his criticism against the Government was rather weak, and that he dwelt too long upon detail. I am certainly indebted to Senator Pearce for the very useful speech he delivered, and I have to thank him for the information which he gave upon the transcontinental railway proposal and the working of the Arbitration Act in Western Australia. We have not had much party feeling shown within the Chamber since we met, but we have had a little party strife and political speeches outside. I followed that criticism very closely, and it exhibited to me the very weak case which some of the Opposition members have against His Majesty's Ministers. The more they prolonged their criticism and tried to make much out of nothing the weaker appeared to me to be their arguments in many particulars, and in one or two instances there were decided hits below the belt, which, I think, ought to be avoided. No man has a right to say that the Minister for Trade and Customs looks upon every importer as a scoundrel, and every manufacturer as an angel. There was a very uncalled for allusion by Mr. G. H. Reid to the conduct of the Government in reference to Senator O'Connor and the High Court. I should have thought that Mr. Reid ought to be the last man in Australia who would try to surround the formation of the High Court with any party strife, and make remarks which were quite uncalled for and quite unjustifiable. I heard some of the free-trade speakers dwell at very great length, and with what they seemed to think was very cogent criticism, upon the failure of the Government to place upon the statute-book many of the important measures which were announced at the opening of this Parliament. But they quite forgot to tell the people of Hobart and the North-West Coast of Tasmania, and other people in meeting assembled, the reasons for that delay. The fact was that after the Tariff, which was called for from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, was placed upon the table it took us eleven months to get rid of it. No matter what Government had been in power, the same thing must have happened. Yet I have listened for three-quarters of an hour to Opposition members dwelling upon the unwisdom and unstatesmanship of the Government in not passing the High Court Bill, Defence Bill, and numerous other measures. It was absolutely beyond the control of any Government to do in most instances other than what was done. Let me dwell for a few minutes upon the disappointment I feel at the justifiable criticisms I have heard against the results of the union. I happened to be in Queensland at the time when every public man and every man one met in the street had not a good word to say for Federal Ministers, and he certainly seemed to me to be inclined to curse and damn the union. Yet when these men put into words their objection, from Ministers of the Crown downwards, any political baby could supply the answer in a sentence. I am glad to notice that all this dissatisfaction and irritation is passing away.

Senator DAWSON.—It has passed away.

Senator DOBSON.—I believe it has passed away, and I think we may congratulate ourselves that there has been less friction, less injustice, and less trouble than might have been expected when Ministers undertook the Herculean task of starting the Commonwealth. But I regretted to notice in yesterday's newspaper that the Premier of Queensland, for whom I have very great respect, is once more abusing Federal Ministers. I think it is a great mistake for that gentleman to keep on criticising Federal Ministers in an unjustifiable way without giving us the detail of their doings. Federal Ministers and State Ministers ought to work with the utmost cordiality and sympathy, and whatever they may feel, and whatever their followers may say, it will do no good, and only increase the friction if State Premiers begin to call names and criticise Federal Ministers in unbecoming language. Last session no honorable senator was more inclined than I was to take strong exception to the way in which the Customs Act was being administered. During the last week of the session I put on the business paper two questions as to whether the Minister ever intended to carry out section 265 of the Act. It was put in the measure for a purpose: it was intended by all of us that it should be administered, and that all these petty offences or abrogations of the law committed with no intention of defrauding the revenue should be dealt with by the Minister sitting in open chamber with the press and the public present. To each question I received a kind of put off answer showing me that he did not intend to take advantage of the section. When I returned to Hobart I wrote him a letter on the same subject, because I saw that prosecutions were being continued, and that a great deal of irritation was being aroused. I received from him rather a snubbing letter saying that when he had made up his mind to alter his administration he would let me know. From that day to this I have been more and more inclined to think that the Minister, although he may be acting in a harsh and unconciliatory manner, is doing the right thing. He may be doing it in the wrong way, but his heart is in the right place. He is acting as trustee for the four million people in the Commonwealth. He is doing his best to collect every shilling of revenue, and I believe that he will administer the Act on the whole more justly, and collect more revenue in each State, than any State Treasurer ever did. Is he not doing right in trying to obtain uniformity of administration? Supposing he had done what many persons urged him to do, and what some of us thought that he might very fairly have done, delegated his authority to the chief Customs officer in each State, you would at once have had a want of uniformity of administration. You would have had one collector fining an importer £5 for importing flannelette as cotton goods, and thereby saving 10 per cent., and another collector, who took a far more serious view of the question, fining a man under exactly similar circumstances £50.

Senator BEST.—Different magistrates might do the same.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think that they would do the same in the sense in which I am speaking, because the whole essence of the charge, when you come to increase the fine, is whether there has been any intent to defraud the revenue. At all events, that is another criticism which the public have been hurling at the Minister's head, and it appears to me that there is not much in it. They say why should we all be treated in the same manner whether the mistake was made innocently or whether it was made with intent to defraud. They are not treated in the same way. If a man simply makes a false or erroneous entry, and nothing further, he is charged under one section. But if a man makes a false entry with intent to defraud he is charged under a later section, and is liable to double the penalty. All these things have lately been pointed out by the Minister. I understand now that he does not believe in central control, and that when he gets his Customs Guide perfected and issued, and is satisfied that his officers know how he desires the Act to be administered, he will delegate more power than he has done to certain officers in the States. But I am inclined to think that it might be as well to appoint in each State a committee of experts, presided over by a skilful magistrate, to adjudicate on all these questions of breaches of the law. There is one criticism which I have not heard quite answered, and I think the Minister is rather to blame, and that is as to the great delay which in some cases has occurred in men getting their goods from the bond when a dispute has arisen. I cannot understand why there should be an hour's delay. If a dispute arises as to the rate of duty, surely the Minister can either take the bond of the importer, with two substantial sureties, or he can take the cash, and let the goods go at once. Any reflecting person knows what it means to a trader to have a large shipment of summer goods to arrive 48 hours before any other shipment. To keep back any goods is simply frustrating and hindering trade. I think that all these delays ought to be avoided. I see that Senator Millen is not present. I should have liked him to hear my reply to the remarks he made about the selection of the federal capital site. It is perfectly true, as he said, that in the minds of the people of New South Wales there is rightly or wrongly a kind of suspicion that they may be deprived of the advantage of the provision in the Constitution which says that the federal capital shall be within the borders of that State. I can hardly conceive it possible that any Member of Parliament, or any elector who knows anything about the framing of the Constitution, can ever think for a moment that the capital can be outside the Mother State. It cannot be if we are to keep the legal bond, and I may say the moral bond—the very terms upon which the union was brought about.

Senator BEST.—Who has ever striven to alter it?

Senator DOBSON.—I think Senator Millen must be right when he says that there is in the minds of thousands of electors of New South Wales a kind of distrust of this Parliament and a distrust of the people in other States, and that they believe that unless the capital site is selected soon injury may accrue to them, notwithstanding the written constitution in their favour. I do not think that is possible. I object to that argument being used in the smallest degree to divert us from the true path which we ought to pursue. The Constitution is an absolute compromise. Compromises are not always good; sometimes they are good; I venture to think that this compromise is a bad one. First I plead that we shall discuss as fully and exhaustively as we can the question whether we shall strike out the 100 mile limit, and give to the members of this Parliament the right to say if they like that Sydney and not some place in the country shall be the federal capital. Secondly I plead for a full discussion on the point as to whether it is wise to select the site now or to delay the selection.

I am strongly in favour of delaying it, and of the suggestion that I saw made some time ago in one of our morning journals, to the effect that after Parliament has sat for six years in Melbourne, it should sit for a similar term in Sydney. I, for one, think that we should take time to consider what we shall do with regard to the capital.

Senator GLASSEY.—That suggestion is contrary to the Constitution.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that it is not.

Senator DRAKE.—That is what they call repudiation by delay.

Senator DAWSON.—What about those members of Parliament who come from distant States?

Senator DOBSON.—I do not see how those who come from distant States will be affected.

Senator DAWSON. — Does not the honorable and learned senator see that it means making another home in Sydney.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not see that. If you had the Parliament sitting in Sydney it would be in the very State in which the Constitution says it shall be. The Constitution says that until the seat of government is fixed, the Parliament shall sit in Melbourne, and all the criticism I have heard of delay and neglect on the part of Ministers in not bringing forward definite proposals for the establishment of the capital are absolutely baseless. How any man in New South Wales, whether he is in Parliament or out of it, can think that we can consider the question of the capital until we have passed the very Acts which are the foundation of our Commonwealth, I do not know. I think that Melbourne has to be considered, and if for six or twelve years the seat of government is in Melbourne and is established for all time in New South Wales, will any one say that Melbourne gets more out of the Constitution in this respect than she is entitled to? No one can say it; and yet by the arguments used by some people it is being asserted. Some Members of Parliament seem to think that we shall do well by settling the question of the locality of the capital once for all, with the intention of delaying the building, or proceeding slowly with it. Now, there are two grave objections to that course. The first is that I never heard of any man binding himself to a particular line without allowing reasonable time for consideration; and I object altogether to fixing the capital and saying that you are going to postpone the building of it. The fixing of the capital would be a great mistake until we are ready to proceed with the building. Because every hour we live the world is changing. The Commonwealth is changing, ideas are changing, trade and settlement are changing; and it would be a great mistake to select a site for the capital in 1903, and not to build until years after. The second objection I have is that, however wisely you may talk about having a reasonable expenditure, the forces outside will not allow you to do anything of the kind. You have the unemployed in every city knocking at the door not only of your State Governments, but of your Federal Ministry. You have them going to bishops and other influential people begging for work, and urging for schemes of employment to be set in operation, as they have a right to do. Do you suppose that when you have the capital site fixed, and plans ready, there would not be immediately an agitation to start the building of the capital? Then our friends the labour members would say—"Start it by day labour"; and a nice mess we should make of it, I think. We should not be able to build by sections, and in a leisurely manner, as some people imagine, but we should be pushed into spending money—because when money is to be spent Parliament is simply pushed and pushed until it carries out the work to a far greater extent than was at first intended. I shall read with great pleasure and interest what the commission have to say with regard to the capital site, but I cannot alter the opinion which I have formed. I hope that we shall not take up too much time this session in discussing the site, because we have far more important business to do—not more important in one way, as affecting the interests of Australia in the long run, but more pressing and urgent, and more ready to be dealt with now. With reference to the proposed naval agreement, I listened with considerable astonishment to the criticism of my honorable and learned friend Senator Symon. I cannot bring my mind to agree with one single idea which the honorable and learned senator expressed when he told us that he intended to oppose this agreement. It appears to me to be the very thing that the Commonwealth wants. It carries out practically the ideas that suit our circumstances. I think that the Prime Minister is to be congratulated upon having initiated the agreement. If we regard the matter from the aspect of continuity of policy, we have the policy which we started with carried on. We are to have better ships and more of them. It is true that we will have to pay a larger amount of money, but how any man can object to voting £200,000 for this purpose is a matter of mystery to me. The Imperial navy costs £35,000,000 per annum, and on a population basis the share of Australia is from three to three and a half millions per annum. If Great Britain were to ask us to pay our full share, or even a quarter of it, I should think there was something in the argument that if we were to pay this enormous sum we ought to have some representation at the Admiralty. But seeing that we are only asked to pay £200,000 out of £35,000,000, I can only assume that Senator Symon, having no sounder argument whatever to bring forward, has brought forward a contention like this. We are getting value for our money 40 or 50 times over, and we should welcome the agreement in the most cordial manner, recognising the generosity with which the Imperial Government has always treated us in this matter. To those honorable senators who want to see, as we all do, not so much a navy of our own established, but sailors of our own trained—to see our young men trained to be employed on board men-of-war and to undertake all the various offices on war vessels—this agreement opens the door to exactly what we want. Two ships of the squadron are to be employed as training ships, others are to be manned by Australian and New Zealand crews, and commanded by Australian officers, and Australian rates of pay are to be adopted. What possible objection, then, can there be to the agreement? It is everything we could desire. To the whole of Senator Symon's criticism there is this one answer: that the sea is one, that trade is one, that the Empire is one, and that therefore the idea of talking about our ships, as apart from the British navy, is about the worst thing we could think about. A navy is required to protect our trade. What is the use of sending home our wool ships if we cannot get back the goods which are to pay for our produce? What is the use of thinking that you can divide the seas? If you wish to break away from the Empire I can understand Senator Symon's arguments being used against ratifying this admirable naval agreement, but that is impossible. We must either belong to the Empire or not. We must recognise that the British Empire would have no existence except for its enormous and magnificent trade upon the high seas. It is idle to talk, as some honorable senators have done, about the possibility of Australia being left undefended in time of war. It is idle to point out to the Defence Committee at Home, or to the Admiral in charge of the Australian squadron, that we do not want the war vessels to go outside Australian waters, for fear that a privateer should pay us a visit. It is idle to think that the naval authorities will not take these things into account when they order the fleet out of Australian waters. With reference to finance, I believe that the wisest decision which the Parliament of the Commonwealth came to during our last session was that by which the House of Representatives absolutely rejected the Loan Bill of £500,000 introduced by the Treasurer. I think that Parliament did a most wise and statesmanlike act in that matter, and I congratulate the leader of the labour party in another place, who brought forward the motion which rejected that Bill, upon the wisdom of his act. I hope that it inaugurates a policy which we shall weigh well before we depart from it. In view of the criticisms in the Daily Mail by our old friend Mr. Wilson, that decision becomes of far more importance. We all know perfectly well that the credit of this Commonwealth was at very low ebb. Our debentures had fallen enormously in value. Although very much of Mr. Wilson's criticisms are absolutely uncalled for and unjust, and although there is no earthly chance of repudiation, and we are in a thoroughly sound position, yet we all know that what he has pointed out about our extravagance, our log-rolling, and our reckless expenditure upon unproductive public works is just and true. I am more than pleased that at the very time when we were being criticised on account of our lavish loan expenditure the Federal Parliament determined to show that it would not borrow for federal public works, and that such works as were urgently required should be constructed out of revenue. The very moment it was seen that the Loan Bill was going to be rejected, votes for works to the extent of £500,000 were cut down to a £250,000. I shall await with considerable interest to see how much money has actually been spent on new Customs houses and post-offices. I have no doubt that the actual sum will be less than £250,000.

Senator DRAKE.—It will not be spent on many Customs houses. They were built before federation.

Senator DOBSON.—When you insist upon works being constructed out of revenue it is wonderful how careful and prudent people are. Remembering that economic reform is in the air, I trust that this Parliament will long remain prudent and careful. It is our bounden duty, if we have any regard for the tone and wishes of the people who sent us here, to keep down our expenditure. In this connexion I am very pleased indeed to know that the Public Service Act, instead of costing £15,000 a year as was estimated, is only costing £8,000 or £9,000 a year. It will be collected that I was not in love with that Act, and I ventured to say that the estimate of cost of its administration was lavish and extravagant. But if the measure is to be administered for some thousands of pounds per annum less, my criticism is, to a great extent, justified, and, at the same time, it shows that federal Ministers are just as desirous as we are of keeping down expenses. It is perfectly plain that the terms of employment set forth in that Act, which on the whole are generous, are attracting young men and women from every State. No less than 4,500 candidates submitted themselves for the public service examination. That examination, although it took a great deal of time, had the condition attaching to it that those who passed were only available for employment if vacancies occurred within nine months. Those who are not employed within that time will have to be re-examined if they desire to enter the service. In my opinion, it would be well to make the period two years, and I think that the Minister for Home Affairs would be well advised in bringing in a measure to set that right. Now I come to the question of the High Court. I have heard many of the opponents of the Government blame them for the delay that has occurred in not introducing this measure earlier. I think the Government are to be congratulated. They have done very little harm—I do not think they have done any harm whatever—in not introducing the Bill before, whereas by this delay we have saved about £30,000.

I am very glad indeed, that we have saved that £30,000. I notice now that because of an accident which befell an unfortunate cabman who was knocked into a "cocked hat"—as the Japanese officers would say—by the electric wires of the Postal department or of the electric tramway in Sydney, some honorable senators have changed their minds, and imagine that the High Court is an immediate necessity. That matter involved only a paltry sum of £80, and it might well have been settled by arbitration or in the State courts. There can be no doubt that the High Court is an important part of our Constitution. It is to be the interpreter of the Constitution, and we must eventually have the best High Court it is possible to obtain. But when are we to establish it, and how are we to do it? We have not suffered much inconvenience in the past from the absence of a High Court, and it appears to me that we ought to see whether we cannot go on saving—I will not say the whole £30,000—but at all events £15,000 or £20,000 a year. There have been so few cases of importance to decide, that I think we might very well confer federal jurisdiction upon the States' courts, and at once appoint a High Court, consisting of a Judge from each of the States, to act as a Court of Appeal from them. There may be objections to this proposal, but I think it is worth considering. Do not let us dogmatise, and do not let us take it for granted that a High Court of five Judges must be appointed. Let us see whether we cannot devise a High Court, which every one will look to with confidence, while at the same time the Commonwealth is saved an enormous sum of money.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Why should not the Supreme Courts of the States do the work?

Senator DOBSON.—I am suggesting that we should confer federal jurisdiction upon the Supreme Courts of the States, and that we should appoint one Judge from each State to form a Federal High Court of Appeal. There would always be the Privy Council behind that tribunal. Why I feel in a dilemma, is that while I am open to conviction at the present time, I am fairly certain that there is not sufficient work to justify the appointment of five Judges. On the other hand, if we have a High Court consisting of only three Judges, we shall have a tribunal—I do not care who the members of it may be—that will not be equal in weight and experience and ability to the courts of New South Wales and Victoria. I do not want to compare man with man, or to enter into any personal matter. But it is rather against human nature to suppose that a court consisting of three of the leading barristers in the Commonwealth, taken fresh from the Bar, and having no judicial experience, could be superior to, or inspire more confidence than would a court of six judges who had been not only leaders of the bar themselves, but had had ten, fifteen, or twenty years' experience on the benches of the States' courts. While I shrink on the one hand from appointing five Judges, on the ground that the expense would not be warranted, I shrink on the other hand from appointing a High Court of only three Judges, which would not command the respect of men of experience who know what the High Court should be. It is for these reasons that I fall back on what honorable senators may call a make-shift court. It may be a make-shift court, but let us see whether by means of a temporary court we cannot secure a better tribunal for federal matters than by the appointment of a High Court of three Judges. I am at present opposed to the proposal, although open to conviction on the question of whether there should be five or three Judges. What might induce me to vote for five Judges, if we were to have that number, is the consideration that we could then combine with the work of the High Court duties which I think we have foolishly relegated to the Inter-State Commission. I do not think there will be very much of that work to do, but if the High Court could deal with it there might be some excuse for appointing five Judges. Perhaps, however, the Constitution would forbid the relegation of that work to the High Court. I have always opposed the Inter-State Commission, and I do so now. If you have three or four of the best experts to settle questions of differential rates, without any judicial experience to guide them, it is far better that they should go before the High Court, and that the Court, with its judicial knowledge and on the evidence of the experts, should decide the questions at issue. I think the provision for an Inter-State Commission is an absolute blot upon the Constitution. It involves a totally unnecessary expense, which we might avoid if the States which are now fighting about preferential and deferential rates would agree to submit the matters to arbitration.

Senator DAWSON.—Then the honorable and learned senator believes in arbitration?

Senator DOBSON.—I believe in everything that is good, within certain limits. I come now to the question of the transcontinental railway. I hope my honorable friend, Senator Pearce, and his brother senators from Western Australia, will not think that I fail to sympathize with them in their aspirations, and I trust they will bear with me while I give the Senate the benefit of the little experience I have had in public life in regard to matters of this kind. My experience is that whenever you have a rich Parliament and plenty of money to go and come upon, and whenever you want a public work in which a great many people are interested, you will gain your end if you only keep at it long enough, if you only talk loud enough, and if you only come armed with a sufficient array of facts and figures, whether relative to the subject or not. I take it that those who come from the States Parliaments, and who are conscious of the enormous sum of loan moneys which we have put into unproductive works—I believe many of them were known to be unproductive when we persuaded ourselves that they would be productive—will be traitors to the electors unless they judge this proposal absolutely and entirely on its own merits. We must guard ourselves against going in for an enormous loan expenditure, unless we can see great indirect advantages to begin with, and advantages which give promise that the railway will be able, at no distant date, to pay pretty well the interest—I do not say the whole interest—on the cost of construction. I admit that there are indirect advantages to be gained from the construction of such a line, but in the States we have traded on these indirect advantages until some of the non-paying lines in Victoria and Tasmania are really, to my own knowledge, a disgrace to our statesmanship. I do not know that the strength or the weakness of Senator Pearce's case has yet been proved. It is not yet known, but when you have a weak case for the construction of a railway the first thing you do is so say to the Government—"We shall be content with a flying survey." You get the necessary vote passed, and thus secure one very important step towards the construction of the line. A flying survey is made. Then you are told that you cannot get estimates of construction, that the plans cannot be laid on the table of the House without another survey, and finally the flying survey becomes something in the nature of an engineering one.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable and learned senator is very suspicious.

Senator DOBSON.—I am not. I am not at all hostile, but I am bound to give the Senate my experience, and I say that I shall judge every fact and figure brought before me in the light of that experience.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable and learned senator is throwing cold water on the project.

Senator DOBSON.—That remark illustrates what I have already said. Any one who professes to criticise a proposal, who yearns for knowledge, and wants to know more about the whole subject, is simply sneered and laughed at. While Senator Pearce was speaking I asked him what I thought was a very pertinent question, and he gave me a very straight answer. This railway will be a very costly affair—it will involve an expenditure of five or six million pounds—and the question I put to Senator Pearce was whether the cost was to be “new” or federal expenditure, to be borne by the States of the Commonwealth on the population basis, or was it to be entirely a State affair. I do not think it should be a State affair, but I wish to know whether there is going to be a kind of compromise, in which the two States most interested will pay more than their share, the Commonwealth making up the balance, when that share has been arrived at by means as fair as we can obtain. It appears to me that Western Australia, if it wishes to be absolutely fair and just, is bound at the very beginning to offer to pay more than its simple share in proportion to its population. The railway, if constructed, will run through an enormous part of that State’s territory. It will open up—I shall not say a desert, because Senator Pearce tells me there is good grass land along the line of route—what is really an unexplored, uninhabited country. If the Government of that State got their country opened up in that way, they could afford to pay more than their share on a population basis. Indeed, if they were to pay only their proportion per head of the population they would make an enormous gain that would be unfair to the rest of the Commonwealth—certainly unfair to the little ocean State which I represent. Before we vote the money, I think it would be much better for Western Australia and South Australia to pass a vote for an absolute trial test to determine whether water can be obtained along the route. If water cannot be obtained—if we cannot have dams and artesian wells along the route—a considerable damper will be put upon the whole scheme. But I hope that water will be found, and that that difficulty will be removed. Coming to the Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, I find myself face to face with the whole industrial problem. I do not think any one can approach a problem of that sort unless he is a man of broad sympathies—a man who understands something about humanity and its wants—and is prepared to look at every question from every side, and particularly from the standpoint of the worker, if you put the worker as the weaker man. It seems to me to be absolutely essential to the industrial life of the Commonwealth that our workers, mentally, physically, and industrially, should be put in the best possible position. But when you reach a point at which you are going to violate the teachings of history, when you are going to act contrary to all human nature, every friend of the working man should speak out and say—“No; you can go so far but no further if you want to bring about prosperity in the place in which you live.” It is useless to try and gull the working man into the belief that the tail is going to wag the dog. The brains are in the forefront of the animal, and not in the tail. We have had some experiences lately in all parts of the world—and not very far from the place in which I now speak—that show that all of us would do well to recollect the principle on which capital is invested—the principle on which confidence can be restored and retained, and the principle on which even a democratic Government must be carried on. That principle is that there must be absolute faithfulness on the part of the employés to the Government who employ and pay them. It appears to me that any measure is worth passing that is likely to do justice, and give to some extent reasonable promise of putting an end to the disastrous disputes which do so much to injure our prosperity. I was particularly pleased with the account which Senator Pearce gave us of the working of the Arbitration Act in Western Australia. The working of the Act in New Zealand is not quite so satisfactory. Here, perhaps, I am treading on debatable ground; but I would remind my honorable friends in the labour corner of Premier Seddon's criticism and irritation. He said that the Arbitration Act of New Zealand was being availed of for settlement of the most petty disputes—I do not know whether he was referring to the employers or the employes, or to both—and that if a stop was not put to this practice he would have to introduce legislation to put an end to it. Here we have the Premier of New Zealand, a fully-fledged democrat, I suppose, saying that the Arbitration Act in that colony is being used as a means for the settlement of matters of a most trivial description, which ought never to be brought before such a court. So that there is now an agitation going on in New Zealand, which has absolutely been aroused and created by the Arbitration Act itself, because men take advantage of it to come before the courts with every grievance. It must be recollected all the time that they are trying in some way to dictate to their employers as to how the industry in which they are engaged shall be carried on.

Senator DAWSON.—Is not a case before the court every day better than an industrial war for a week?

Senator DOBSON.—I am only reminding honorable senators that Premier Seddon has said that the arbitration court is being abused in this direction, and that matters have now got to such a pass that if the practice is not stopped he will introduce legislation to stop it. There is in New Zealand an arbitration court to settle all disputes, and, as a result, either the men or the employers are making and creating disputes.

Senator DAWSON.—Did Premier Seddon say he would abolish the courts?

Senator DOBSON.—No, he said he would in some way define the disputes which might be brought before them. Let us have some more evidence from New Zealand, given, I think, by a gentleman named Wright, to whom Senator Pearce has referred. He says that ever since the establishment of the arbitration courts in New Zealand, that colony has been prospering and has been on the up-grade, and, therefore, most of the applications to the court have been applications for the raising of wages, the shortening of hours, and the granting of privileges. Mr. Wright points out that any arbitration court will be more or less of a success in any country in the world in which the conditions are prosperous, but he says also that, when New Zealand is on the down grade—as she certainly will be, for all countries have their ups and downs—and there occur times of depression, it remains to be seen whether compulsory arbitration will ever be availed of by either men or employers. I am going to give an illustration of action taken by employers. The other day we read that upholsterers in New Zealand were awarded 1s. 3d. an hour, a rate which increased the cost of furniture by from 15 per cent. to 22½ per cent. When the award was given the employers said they could not pay those wages, and they told the men that if they did not go, under the Act, to the officer appointed and get a certificate that they were worth only so much less, they would shut their doors. The men were not going to be “choused” out of the award which had been given in their favour, and they said to the employers, “No, we shall not get a certificate, and we want you to carry out the award.” The reply of the employers was—“No, we shall shut our doors”; and shut their doors they did, with the result that it is said that 100 men—though I believe the number was only some 50 or 60—have been thrown out of employment. There is a case in which the employers took up the position to which I was alluding a few minutes ago, and said—“We, as the employers, who risk our capital, put up our buildings, and have the whole financial responsibility upon our shoulders, will not allow our men, or any court in the world, to dictate to us the terms upon which we shall carry on our business.” The moment the court fixed a wage which did not suit them they shut their doors. That is bad for all parties; but do honorable senators suppose that it is not worse for the unfortunate men? Of course, it was far worse for the men who were shut out than for the employers who shut their doors. Referring again to this question, and I get my information from different papers, I read of a meeting held in Wellington by socialists and union men, who were very much annoyed because the arbitration court dared to fix the lowest wage in their employment at 1s. 6d. an hour. Because the court dared to do that this meeting of socialists and unionists carried a resolution—unanimously, I suppose—"that the court of arbitration is unworthy of confidence, and we cannot advise any other country to adopt such a court." If that is true it is certainly a very grave matter. Here are workers and union men who, because of a decision giving them fair wages, but not the enormous wages they asked for—raising the price of furniture by 22 per cent.—set to work to decry a court which, according to our friends opposite, makes for happiness and peace, and they absolutely publish to the world the statement that this arbitration court is unworthy of confidence.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not the honorable and learned senator think that it is unwise to adopt the most extreme opinion on either side?

Senator DOBSON.—I quite admit that it is, but I think that some of my honorable friends do not see the gravity of their position. What would be said of our Supreme Court if a certain class of litigants every time they did not get a verdict in their favour, held a mass meeting, and declared by resolution that the Supreme Court of Victoria or of Tasmania is unworthy of the confidence of the people? Do not my honorable friends see that if this sort of thing goes on no arbitration court will retain the confidence of either one party or the other. We must uphold the dignity, honour, and justice of our court. The whole structure will tumble about our ears if every time an adverse decision is given the men against whom it is given begin to accuse the Judges of unworthy conduct.

Senator KEATING.—In what trade did that occur?

Senator DOBSON.—I think it was in connexion with the carpenter's trade.

Senator BEST.—That is a solitary instance, and the courts have given numbers of decisions both ways.

Senator DOBSON.—There has been conciliation and arbitration in England since 1896 without any compulsion, and in the United States of America, with its 80 millions of people and its up-to-date methods in every direction, they have not thought fit to adopt this principle, while the trades unions of England have, by a large majority, voted against it. The subject is a very complex one, but I have quite an open mind upon it, and I shall be glad to hear anything that Senator Pearce can tell me about the admirable New Zealand court.

I believe the court in New South Wales is doing fairly good work, and has to some extent obtained the confidence of those who have had occasion to go before it. All I plead for is caution and prudence in passing such a measure. It appears to me that we have so much work in front of us that we shall be likely to pass a better Act if we delay dealing with the matter until the next Parliament, so that we may in the meantime have a little more experience of the New Zealand Act, that we may know what its defects really are, and that we may have the benefit of a larger measure of the experience which is coming in so fast from the court in New South Wales. In referring to the question of preferential trade, I get upon very debatable ground, but I do not think we shall be doing good service by passing over the question lightly and saying that it is not for argument now, or that we should wait until a scheme is brought forward before discussing it. It appears to me to be the one question, above all others, of most momentous importance, as it affects the whole prosperity of the Empire. It is a question upon which, in my opinion, we cannot have too much discussion. Until we have hours, weeks, months, and years of discussion upon it I do not know how any scheme is to be formulated. I believe we should have some discussion, and that we should try whether we cannot suggest some scheme. My honorable and learned friend, Senator Symon, was, in my opinion, quite off the rails when he talked of Mr. Chamberlain starting this idea as an electioneering cry. Mr. Chamberlain started the idea years ago. Honorable senators will recollect also that only a few months ago, the colonial Premiers met Mr. Chamberlain in London, and the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth came back pledged to introduce not a specific Bill, but some form of preference which was left undefined.

Senator DRAKE.—To consider the matter, I think.

Senator DOBSON.—Yes, to consider the matter. Mr. Chamberlain having had the benefit of the views of the statesmen who came before him from different parts of the Empire, thought out their ideas and his own and has now made a most important announcement upon the subject in England. The best thing the Commonwealth can do is to consider most seriously the suggestion which he has made. If we are going to allow ourselves to be steeped in the dogma and doctrinaire opinions of 50 years ago we shall probably do as Senator Symon has done and pass the question by as impracticable and hopeless. I am going to do nothing of the kind. However good free-trade may be in the abstract, however well it may have served old England, and however sound its principles may be at bottom, it is a question whether the abstract theories of free-trade can be applied to meet all the adverse conditions with which the ingenuity of all the nations of the world can surround the mother country.

Senator KEATING.—Why did the honorable and learned senator try to apply them to Australia?

Senator DOBSON.—The cases are quite different. I take it to be one of the great features of free-trade that it stands for antagonism to all monopoly in trade and commerce. We shall find that some men who have written thoughtfully refer to the United States of America as one of the greatest free-trade countries of the world. If for the moment we leave out of the calculation its high protective Tariff, and consider the States with their 80,000,000 of people, we shall find that they include the largest free-trade area in the world. It was looking at the enormous prosperity of the United States, with its free-trade within and its protection without, which made me such a warm advocate for the federal union of the colonies of Australia. I saw at once that if we could get free-trade throughout Australia by knocking down those terrible fiscal barriers, which ought never to have been raised, we should obtain for ourselves an enormous prosperity, and if we were to have, as we are having, a policy of protection against the outside world, I felt that we should still have an enormous amount of free-trade within to give us a start. With the enormous amount of free-trade within the United States, with the best soil almost that the globe knows of, with almost every kind of climate and production, combined, if honorable senators like, with their protective Tariff against the world, the people of that country have been able to progress at such a rate as the world has never previously seen the like of. Their operations have enabled many of the citizens of the United States to acquire gigantic fortunes, of which few of us can form any idea. But the operation of the two policies of free-trade within and protection against outsiders has led to the establishment of rings, combines, and trusts, which, as a free-trader, I am bound to say are opposed to all the principles of free-trade. We cannot discuss this matter without recollecting that these trusts and combines must either be fought or knuckled down to, and we have to consider the best way in which to deal with the matter. The Dominion of Canada has commenced by giving a preference to English goods of one-third of the duty, and the Times, in reference to that, says—

Canada's action is a step towards Imperial co-operation and unity which will be generally lauded throughout the Empire.

I desire to state here the question I asked Senator Symon, and that is, "Can you have a federated empire unless you have some system of federated trade." My answer to that question is, no. If you do not unite in some way the trade of the Empire you sow the first seeds of disintegration in the Empire. In this connexion let us look at the position of Canada. It is now refusing to take any part in the suggested scheme of naval defence. Why? Great Britain is now taking off the small registration duty on wheat, and Canada thinks that that remission ought not to take place, and that the contribution to the navy for which it is asked would under the circumstances be money thrown away. The Canadians may be right or they may be wrong; but here, I submit, is a beginning of things which, if carried to a logical conclusion, may end in the Empire breaking up, or it may end in our never uniting or trying to consolidate the trade of the Empire.

Senator KEATING.—That is not Canada's reason.

Senator DOBSON.—Canada refused to contribute before. I believe that it would have changed its mind, but it is persisting in its refusal on account of the fiscal question.

Senator KEATING.—That is only an added reason to its objection to the naval subsidy.

Senator DOBSON.—It is a very significant added reason, and if they admit that it is an added reason it still backs up the argument that it is the beginning of a state of things which I should like to put a stop to if I could. I desire in some way to unite the Empire by uniting its trade. I wish to see a bond of union between the Empire and the colonies in regard to trade. As regards Mr. Chamberlain's ideas on the subject, as long ago as 1900, he used these words :—

An imperial Zollverein with free-trade within and duties against outsiders is the only fiscal arrangement likely to be viewed with the slightest favour by Great Britain.

Here at once is a policy to which free-traders or revenue tariffists surely can look forward. If we do not have absolute free-trade we may approach as near to that policy as we can get. We can have revenue duties between all parts of the Empire with higher revenue duties, or if you like protective duties against the outside world. Supposing that a 5 per cent. duty is imposed on all food supplies which go into Great Britain from the outside world, apart from Australia—I do not know that it would raise the price of food very materially—and supposing that in return we gave a 5 per cent. preference to the goods and manufactures of the old land, there is a start. I do not profess to know where it will land us, but it appears to me that it is better to try to do something to counteract the attacks which are being made on our trade, than to sit idly by and say—"No. Free-trade covers the whole of the ground, and we intend to do nothing."

Senator KEATING.—I wish the honorable and learned senator had thought like that last session.

Senator DOBSON.—I am not talking about free-trade in the abstract, but about applying free-trade to the conditions which exist in the nations around us. On the one hand, there is America trying in every possible way to grasp the trade of the old country. She has got some of our iron and steel trade, and she is taking away some of our cotton and woollen trade. On the other hand, there is Germany trying to take away our trade. Although old England's trade is increasing, and although old England is progressing, still at the same time she is not progressing at the same rate as are Germany and America. When these nations are by almost unfair means trying to wrest our trade from us, are we to have no policy of retaliation? If America cannot obtain our trade by the imposition of a duty, what does she do? She subsidizes her own ships. She says that 10 per cent. more duty shall be levied on all goods which arrive in foreign bottoms.

What does Germany do? If she cannot, by a high protective Tariff, shut out our goods and get entrance of her goods into our free-trade markets, even if she finds that she is undersold in our free-trade markets, what does she do? She gives a bounty to her sugar producers. I am not prepared to say what redress we can get, or what retaliation we can have; but I think it is very foolish to say that we can do nothing, and decline to discuss the matter. If men like Mr. Chamberlain and a hundred writers on this subject think that we ought to try to make the trade of our Empire one, to be more self-contained, more self-supporting, I am not going to be frightened out of considering the project, because a 5 per cent. duty, or a 7½ per cent. duty, is said by our free-trade friends to be protection. Let it be called protection. We have been told by political economists for ages past that protection is a very good thing under certain conditions, and I do not suppose that any free-trader will deny that. It is a very good thing to start a young industry, but it is a very complex thing to know where protection should begin and where it should end—Victoria has found out that it can never end—or what amount of duty you should put on. All these questions are complex, and because they are so complex they need the greater discussion. I desire to refer to a section in the Post and Telegraph Act, which is, I think, very embarrassing to the Commonwealth. For some time past I have been wondering that the authorities in England have not objected to the provision. It is a most mischievous one. It cannot do the slightest good to Australian seamen. In England there is a scarcity of seamen; there are not enough sailors to man our ships; and in time of war when stokers are urgently required, these 30,000 lascars may be of the most infinite advantage to the British navy and British people. This provision in our law is really embarrassing the British Government. Why should we not bear in mind that these lascars are our fellow subjects? They own the sway of the union jack; they are under the crown of Great Britain. Considering that we do no good to our workmen by this legislation, why should we slap these unfortunate men in the face, embarrass Mr. Chamberlain, and try to enforce legislation which people at the other end of the world will not have. The Postmaster-General, in obedience to the law, is trying to get other steam-ship companies to tender for the conveyance of his mails. I do not believe that there is a single steam-ship company at the other end of the world which will tender on the same terms as the P. and O. and Orient Companies. I do not believe that there is a single steam-ship company other than the two I name which could carry the mails between Great Britain and the Commonwealth. I think it would be a makeshift to try to get the mails brought to Colombo, and then run down to the Commonwealth on a steamer which did not carry a black cook or a black stoker. If this legislation embarrasses old England, why can it not be repealed? It is not as if it deprived 30,000 or 30 men in Australia of a job. It does nothing of the kind. I hope that steps will be taken this session to repeal the provision, which is nothing but an embarrassment and a mischief. I join with my honorable friends in hoping that the session will not be too long, that we shall return in good time to meet our electors, and that whatever the work of the session may be it will be well done, and that so far as regards justice and common sense we need not be ashamed of our legislation.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—In contributing my quota to this debate I feel impelled to mention a remarkable thing that attracted my attention. In their criticisms the mover and the seconder of the address in reply absolutely destroyed the Government and its policy, past and present, while on the other hand the criticism that was offered by the leader of the Opposition and the lesser luminaries that sit behind him, rehabilitated the Government. The debate on the Address in Reply is always very useful in that it gives the Government and members an idea of how the country receives the administration of affairs; whether it is viewed with satisfaction or dissatisfaction. In this respect this debate so far has been very interesting and very instructive. I have a clear recollection that from the prorogation of Parliament until its re-assembling, from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, the daily press, as the champions of the free-trade party, kicked up a great noise. The members of the Opposition took advantage of every opportunity to utter the most violent threats of what they intended to do by way of destroying the Government as soon as they met Ministers face to face. They had all the big drums they could commandeer, and a great blare of trumpets, and it seemed to me that it was only the meeting of Parliament which could stay their frenzy and fury and save them from a quick death by apoplexy. When the critical moment came, and they had an opportunity of facing the body they had denounced and derided, what happened? Instead of this warlike attitude, instead of the desire to take the scalps of Ministers, we found these critics as silent as the sphinx, as gentle as cooing doves. The beggarly array of empty benches on my right hand is a good evidence of what these brave warriors are doing now that Parliament has met. Being struck in this way, I was worked up to a state of great excitement. I rather like to be an onlooker in a row. I expected to have a time of thorough enjoyment after the 26th May, but I have been sadly disappointed. I have failed to discover the reason for this sudden change of front on the part of the critics of the Government—so brave when they are a long distance away from the subjects of their criticism. I cannot discover a reason for this change of front in any explanation which they have tendered here. The leader of the Opposition in this Chamber, Senator Symon, took advantage of a few remarks made by the proposer of the motion for the adoption of the address in reply. Senator Downer, in the course of his remarks, in that happy, genial, amiable style that only he knows how to use—and when he does use it he seduces us all—said that he knew of cases in the administration of the Customs Act that were harsh and cruel; but viewing the general administration as a whole, he said that it was creditable to the Minister of Trade and Customs, and the Government with which he is associated. Senator Symon took the first portion of that remark and said, "Here is a condemnation from the Ministerial bench itself, and therefore it is not necessary for me or any of my following among the Opposition to offer a word of adverse criticism." What a slender bush behind which to hide so burly a form! My goodness! I never heard anything so trivial or anything so unsatisfactory in all my public life. If there were the least tittle of genuineness in all the loud proclamations which the Opposition made as to their intentions when Parliament met, surely a mere stray observation from the mouth of a friend of the Government ought not to have stopped them—unless they had some special reasons for refraining. Senator Symon, in sheltering himself behind a word or two which fell from Senator Downer, forgot that Senator Downer said that Parliament, in passing the Customs law, had done better than it knew. Every one of Senator Symon's followers has, however, forgotten that remark. In looking for a reason for this extraordinary change of front, I believe that, without being charged with prejudice in any way, I might reasonably say that the Opposition lacked the courage when it came to the supreme moment, and they were to meet face to face in this Chamber those whom they had accused outside. But from experience of those gentlemen, I do not think they are lacking in courage. In fact, I am under the impression that no one particular reason will fully account for this extraordinary change of front, but it may be explained by a variety of reasons. I believe that discretion had a great deal to do with it, and that discretion takes this form: The criticism has gone forth from the public platform; the adverse criticism has been published in the press; it is not easy on the floor of the House to repeat those attacks, because discretion says—"If you do, the persons whom you criticise may put their side of the case, and the country will see both and judge between them." So, discretion says—"Don't do it." Discretion says—"Wait until Parliament rises, and you get back to the country again, and then you can use the platform and press and tell the same old tales, and no reply can be uttered." We are led to these conclusions, which are reasonable, because it is absurd to think that it is purely from lack of courage that the Opposition have refrained from making their attack. But it is not absurd to say—and our knowledge of these gentlemen teaches us—that they are both astute and very discreet. I think there was another cause, and I may mention it—I mention it deliberately—why there has been, lately, a modification of those fierce and savage denunciations of the Minister for Trade and Customs, which were so bad until there came a total cessation of them. I believe that one of the main operating causes, was that a Judge and jury of this Commonwealth have absolutely vindicated the position of the Minister for Trade and Customs. Had that Judge and jury not vindicated his administration the same ruthless persecution, the same savage desire to destroy Mr. Kingston would have been followed right up to the very meeting of Parliament, and we should have been at this moment in the midst of an electric battle over the corpse of that particular individual. Between astuteness and discretion, and the finding of a legal tribunal, I believe we shall find an exact explanation of the extraordinary change of front on the part of those who are opposing the Government. I wish to say here, as a careful observer, not having the opportunity of running a daily newspaper in which I can express my opinions about the conduct of any particular administrator in the Commonwealth Government, that I think the people of Australia have been singularly fortunate in the possession of a Minister like Mr. Kingston, who has administered the Customs department with great success, and in a manner highly satisfactory to the general public of this country. Australia will never have any reason to complain if she always has as courageous and capable an administrator as she has now in Mr. Kingston. I am perfectly satisfied with his action. It has saved thousands upon thousands of pounds to the Treasury of the country, and it is largely due to his vigorous and firm action that the Government, in the Governor-General's speech to the Parliament, are able to congratulate the country that our finances are upon a very sound and satisfactory footing. There is no doubt, either, that by his administration he has improved the commercial morality of this country and protected honest traders. For this reason I feel, as a member of this Parliament, very much indebted to Mr. Kingston. A great deal had been said outside and inside Parliament on the well-worn subject of the six hatters. Quite lately I have heard Members of Parliament saying that there has been so much said about the matter that we may as well let it drop. There are some people who are always inclined, without rhyme or reason, to condemn everything and anything, every one and any one, in whom the labour party have manifested any interest or had any belief. But my position is that the last of the six hatters' episode has not been heard—that whilst those on the other side have had their say, have printed their libels, have circulated their slanders, the public is sure in the long run, when they have an opportunity of expressing a decisive opinion, to know exactly the full facts of the case. It will be our business to see that the episode of the six hatters is not dropped in this Parliament, even though those who have made every use of it up to the present time so desire. Official explanations which have been made are absolutely ignored, both by the press and in the Federal Parliament. I was very much surprised—though I ought not to have been if experience could teach me anything—to find that the careful, well thought out, precise statement or explanation that was made to the other Chamber by the Prime Minister on Tuesday night was carefully cut out of the morning papers, whilst the old stories were published in full. Not only that, but honorable senators who have spoken in this Chamber, and have referred to the same incident, have absolutely ignored the full and clear explanation of the Prime Minister, and have continued to circulate the old story.

Senator KEATING.—The leader of the Opposition did so.

Senator DAWSON.—The leader of the Opposition did so precisely, and it appears to me to be a peculiar thing. But I am especially concerned about another statement made by Senator Symon. I regret that he is not present, but I presume that that is no reason why I should refrain from alluding to anything that has been said or done here by him. In that full, rich, and expressive language, of which he is a perfect master, he laid it down clearly and distinctly in this Chamber and to the country that a despicable act was committed by the officials of the Hatters Union, when the six hatters landed in Melbourne—that those union officers by pretending friendliness, by grasping the hand of the strangers, and worming themselves into their confidence, obtained possession of the contracts that they had entered into, and sent them on to the Prime Minister. It was alleged that those officials had extended the hand of friendship for the express purpose of getting possession of those contracts in order to use the information so obtained to exclude the hatters from this country. If that had been done it certainly would not have been creditable. The alleged conduct was denounced in severe terms by Senator Symon, and I heard it denounced in the House of Representatives by the leader of the free-trade party there, as the most contemptible action he ever heard of. Had those facts been true there might have been some justification for the indignation of these gentlemen, but when Senator Symon was challenged he would not listen, and I venture to say that there was not a tittle of truth in anything he said concerning that matter. The thing is an absolute fabrication from beginning to end. The simple facts are that when these hatters came here—the union officials knew they were coming—they were invited to visit the Trades Hall, and they agreed to do so. In the meantime, however, they met some members of the Employers' Union who fêted them, and they did not put in an appearance at the Trades Hall. On the eve of their departure by train for Sydney the secretary saw them and asked one of their number whether he had any objection to showing his agreement. The man replied, "No, you can have a look at it, and do what you like with it." The hatters knew before they left England that they would run a risk in coming out under contract, but they, together with their employer, were prepared to take it. These are the whole facts, and as they are known, and have been told times out of number, it is not particularly creditable for a man to insinuate improper conduct on the part of others, more particularly when there is not a tittle of evidence to substantiate it. Apart from that aspect of the question, it strikes me that those who are denouncing the administration of the Government, deliberately suppress the main reason which justified the Government in acting as they did. It was not because they had a desire to shut out a trades unionist, or a fellow British subject, or that they wished to take any harsh view of their powers and to harass or embarrass any one seeking to make a home on our shores. The particular objection was that these men were coming out here under contract; that they were bound men, who came here in violation of the express provisions of an Act of Parliament, when the ink was hardly dry on the paper on which that measure was printed. It was the conditions under which they came out that gave rise to the objection, and when it was shown that they were not debarred by any express provisions of the Act they were immediately admitted. As far as I know, they are still in the Commonwealth, and they were so particularly well skilled that there is only one of them at work now.

Senator PEARCE.—One did not think the Commonwealth good enough. He has gone to New Zealand.

Senator DAWSON.—Yes. Our objection to people who come to this country under contract is not based wholly and solely on considerations of whether they are white, black, yellow, or of any other colour, nor whether they are Britishers or Boers, Italians or Hungarians. It is the particular conditions under which a man comes out to which we object. We say that if a squad of Italians comes to Western Australia under an agreement to work under conditions that would tend to undermine the standard of living and comfort of those who are engaged in a similar occupation there, they are undesirable immigrants, and we look to whatever Government is in power to prevent them from landing. A party of Englishmen coming out under the same terms and conditions, to give us precisely the same result, would be equally undesirable on the soil of Australia.

Senator KEATING.—There is no national line in the whole Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—No. That was a matter which was keenly debated. Senator Symon, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of his followers, said last night that he was determined to embrace the first opportunity of repealing the section of the Act in question. He was asked why he did not take some objection to it when it was before the Senate, but he was not sure whether he was in the Senate.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable and learned senator was here.

Senator DAWSON.—Yes ; and Senator Pulsford raised the very question of contract labour by moving an amendment providing that as long as a man did not come out under contract to work for less than the prevailing rate of wage there should be no embargo against his landing. That amendment was negatived without a division. These honorable senators thought so little of fighting on that principle that they did not even call for a division. I know that Senator Symon was here, because on referring to the records I find that his name appears in a division immediately before and in one immediately after that amendment was negatived.

Senator KEATING.—And Senator Macfarlane also spoke about the position of domestic servants.

Senator DAWSON.—Exactly. When Senator Symon said he would take advantage of the first opportunity to repeal this particular section, because under it the hatters had been embarrassed for a day or two, it struck me that I should like to know—and if he were present now I should ask him—whether he thought the Government were right after all in admitting the hatters. If the section did not empower them to exclude the six hatters, or any one else who came to Australia in like circumstances, what can be the necessity for repealing it? There can be none. But if the honorable and learned senator had a haunting suspicion that the Government had no right to admit these hatters—that they had power to exclude them—he should have moved a vote of censure on the Government for maladministration, and submitted it to the decision of the Senate. That was his plain and evident duty. But it appeared to me that right throughout the whole business these honorable gentlemen—just as in their criticism of the Minister for Trade and Customs, whom they desire to rend and tear—were uncomfortable when the moment came and did not care about doing it.

Senator KEATING.—If the Government went beyond the law there is no necessity to repeal it.

Senator DAWSON.—Quite so. I come now to another question. These debates are valuable in helping us to determine whether the administration of the Government is suitable or not. I have always found that debates of this character are also valuable in testing the sincerity of opinions such as we hear expressed from time to time by some honorable senators. Because the Postmaster-General has intimated to the Home authorities that he intends to put into effect certain provisions in the Postal Act, a perfect storm of indignation has been raised amongst honorable senators who speak on behalf of the lascar—"our coloured brother." Honorable senator after honorable senator has entertained us with very fine phrases about the "ties of country," "the ties of blood and kinship, and all that kind of thing. When such phrases are well delivered, when they are uttered with intense patriotic fervor, accompanied by graceful gestures and heroic pose, they have a very striking effect upon those who hear them, but I find that those who are in the habit of using these particularly pat phrases are willing to sacrifice their country, their loyalty, and their patriotism according to the exigencies of their pocket. Whenever loyalty or patriotism conflicts with the amount they earn from day to day, or week to week, it has to go to the wall. Pocket is the first consideration with them. This leads me to the conclusion, and I feel compelled to say so, that this continual trumpeting forth of the claims of kinship, of the ties of blood, and of loyalty and patriotism is merely lip expression and empty mouthing without anything in substantial in heart or mind to back it up. Senator Dobson gave us a little address on the subject to-night. Senator Symon did so last night, and perhaps the most fervent speaker of all was Senator Gould, who took particular pains to point out what was our duty to our "unfortunate lascar brother." He told us about the ties of Empire, and of various matters of that kind, but I should like to know from these honorable senators, if their statement is true that by displacing the lascars on the mail ships we shall not give employment to Britishers, but to foreigners, who is responsible for that state of affairs? If it is true that the British mercantile marine is not manned by British sailors, but by foreigners, and that if we put out the lascars we shall only give employment to foreigners, who is the responsible party? What particular section in this community or in other parts of the Empire is responsible for that state of affairs?

Senator CHARLESTON.—The prosperity of England really is responsible for it.

Senator DAWSON.—Nothing of the kind. I venture to say that the responsibility rests absolutely on the shoulders of the particular class which Senator Gould and many other honorable senators in this Chamber truly represent. They are the true representatives of the commercial men, the Stock Exchange men, and the large employers generally, who are prepared to sacrifice every thought of loyalty to race and country, and every thought of patriotism, so long as their pockets are well lined. They will employ not only the foreigner and the lascar, but anything that crawls upon earth, if they can only get it cheap enough, and if by getting it cheaply they can increase their dividends. That is a fact. It must not be thought that because labour men point this out we are particularly prejudiced against these persons. It is because we labour men have been forced to find out the rights and wrongs of these things, and our investigations have led us to this discovery. Other people have also made the discovery that the real reason why British ships are manned by foreigners is that the conditions of life, the housing, the food, the health arrangements, and the pay on British merchant ships are such that the best British workman will not follow the occupations of the sea. And it is the foreigner, who is willing to submit to that kind of treatment and that rate of pay who takes his place. I venture to say that these shipping companies do not employ lascars because they are their coloured brothers, because of any ties of kindred, or of any thoughts of building up this great Empire. They employ them because they find them cheaper even than the foreigner, and because they find that they will put up with worse conditions.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They would employ Chinese if they were cheaper.

Senator DAWSON.—They would employ anything. If they could only train a lot of wild animals taken from the jungles of Africa, they would get them to do the work if they were cheaper. That is the main consideration. I remember reading some time ago an article written by F. T. Bullen, a man amongst those most capable of writing with authority on this subject, for nobody will dispute his knowledge of the sea, of seamen, and of merchant shipping. He says that the fact is that the conditions are such that neither the Britisher nor the American will stand them. If the conditions were good, and we could not get British seamen, we could have their places filled by Americans, but they are filled now by foreigners, who will accept conditions with which neither Britishers nor Americans will be content. All honour and credit, I say, to the men of the British race who will not come down lower than they are, but who will still continue to struggle and strive for the higher and better life. It is an absurdity to say that Britishers are leaving the sea because they are tired of it, or because they find that they are not better sailors than foreigners. They have proved when opportunity has afforded that they are better sailors. They have proved that often in the history of the race, and they have also shown that they are going to follow the particular avocation, in the country in which they can have access to it, in which they can lead the higher and the better life. The more the attempt is made to trample them down by bad conditions, the fewer British sailors we shall have to man our ships. Senator Gould, in a grandiloquent sort of way, told us that all disputes should be settled by agitation, by waiting, and by having patience. Though the honorable and learned senator did not say that entirely with regard to the employment of foreigners on British ships, yet the relation was there when he brought it up in connexion with the strike which recently took place here in Victoria. I shall apply it somewhat in the same way. I wish to point out to this particular class of people that they must understand that the sailor, in combination with his fellow-men, endeavours to get better conditions such as he would like to live and labour under, and to get a decent reward for his work; and when he cannot get it by any tribunal offered to him by the law of the land, and tries to enforce those conditions by his combinations, it is the class represented by Senator Gould and many other honorable senators in this Chamber, who immediately use all the force and strength of the community to suppress them. They have the press absolutely at their disposal, and it refers to these men as rebellious, disloyal, unpatriotic, traffickers in turmoil, destroyers of property, and disturbers of the peace. Every denunciatory phrase and uncomplimentary expression which can be used is applied to them. When these sailors are fighting for conditions which will keep our merchant shipping open to Britishers, the very people who complain now of our ships being manned by foreigners, use all the forces at their command, and all the forces of the civil law to gaol, and otherwise punish those individuals. We know and realize these things, and we say distinctly that the manning of our merchant shipping by foreigners is absolutely and entirely due to that class of the community, and that whatever disaster may overtake the Empire as the consequence of such a state of affairs, the responsibility for it will be theirs alone. We further say that the employment of lascars is not the way to remedy the evil of the preponderance of foreigners in our merchant shipping. It is not by employing an inferior class, but by making the conditions such that a Britisher who lives as a Senator Dawson.

Britisher ought, may follow the occupations of the sea. I, for one, on every occasion on which I am afforded an opportunity, will endeavour to resist the employment of inferior labour either upon sea or upon land wherever the Commonwealth has any control. Senator Gould, in a taunting mood, said last night, that while he could understand and respect our desire to have a white Australia within our own borders, it was absurd for us to think that we were going to enforce our views on the whole of the civilized world. If we ever attempted to do anything of the kind it would be absurd. We have not attempted to do it, and the particular provision in the Postal Act, to which objection has been taken, is not an effort to convert the whole world to our way of thinking, but an expression of our national sentiment. It is an expression also of our determination to do what in us lies to make the conditions of life and labour within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth such as a white man may accept. It is an expression also of our determination to refuse to allow any race or any particular class of individuals to come here from any country for the purpose of making the conditions of labour lower and the comforts of life less than they are here at the present time. When this provision is included in the Postal Act we say to the shipping companies—"If you desire to trade with us, if you desire to have our good-will, and if you want to get the subsidy we are willing to pay for services rendered, you can only secure these things by respecting our national sentiment. If you refuse to do that we shall, so far as we can, refuse to have any truck with you." We are perfectly justified in taking up that attitude. If it is true that by taking up such an attitude we shall cut ourselves off from reasonable or continuous communication with the rest of the world, we shall have to cave in, because we cannot carry out our national sentiment at the expense of a continuous communication with the rest of the world. But we have yet to learn that that is the position of affairs. If I understand the Postmaster-General aright, he distinctly declares that communication between Australia and the old country is not dependent on any one, or any two lines of steamers; that the trade of Australia has become of so much importance now that numbers of different lines of steamers are competing for it, and that the limit of time is now the essential thing, not for the carriage of mails altogether, but for their passenger and cargo traffic. Is it not an absurdity to say that we cannot get our mails carried continuously at express speed when we know that passengers and cargo are being continuously carried at express speed? It is clear, therefore, that that particular objection falls to the ground. In the discussion on the motion for the adoption of the Address in Reply mention has been made of the Navigation Act. I regret very much that no mention has been made in the Governor-General's speech of a short Bill dealing with one or two matters of urgency connected with shipping and our internal trade. It is not possible to introduce in this session a comprehensive Navigation Act, which must contain about 700 clauses if it is to be of any use at all, with any hope of getting it passed. But there are a few urgent matters of supreme importance which might be embodied in a short Bill, which the Government might very well introduce, with every prospect of being able to pass it within a very short time, because the provisions to which I specially refer are so reasonable that I think they would provoke no opposition. I shall briefly enumerate some of them as they deal with matters of concern to our sailors. Under our Immigration Restriction Act, a coastal trader has to comply with certain conditions as to rates of wages and other matters; but an oversea trader which trades between our ports is not subject to those conditions. A coastal trader has to pay a sailor, say, £6 10s. per month, and to comply with other stringent conditions regarding food, quarters, and other matters, which all affect the cost of the trade; but an oversea trader which is trading between our ports is not subjected to such conditions, because the Attorney-General has ruled that it does not come within the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act. It is alleged that the oversea traders do not trade between ports, but, as a matter of fact, they do trade between Newcastle and Melbourne, Newcastle and Adelaide, and, on occasions, between Newcastle and Brisbane; the rate of wages they pay is about £3 per month, and they have not to comply with the other conditions I have mentioned. In the interests of Australian seamen that condition of affairs should be abolished. As a matter of fair play to Australian ship owners it should be abolished. Sooner or later the competition of these big ships in our coastal trade is sure to result in a reduction of wages, and such reduction may mean at any time industrial trouble, which is to be avoided if it is possible. In this connexion, I desire to mention a practice which ought to be stopped at once. No coastal vessel lands its crew on the wharfs to do lumping work, but the Japanese boats that trade down the Queensland coast from the east—and I believe some of the boats that trade to Western Australia from the west—land their crews to do lumping work, and the result is that a large body of white men along our coast, who depend upon the arrival and departure of ships for their livelihood, are displaced with the low-paid aliens. That is not fair to the lumpers on our wharfs, and it is decidedly unfair to our ship-owners. I have only now to express my very deep regret at the hasty and undignified retreat of the critics of the Government. I congratulate the Government very sincerely on the very strong position in which they stand. I congratulate the country upon the weakness of the Opposition, and I feel sure that if the Government continue to show the same intelligence in legislation, and the same capacity and courage in administration, and they ask the electors for a renewal of their trust and confidence it will be given.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Senator Drake)—

That the Senate, at its rising, adjourn until Wednesday next, at half-past two o'clock p.m.

Senate adjourned at 9.51 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 28 May, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Report (No. 1) presented by Sir JOHN QUICK, read by the Clerk, and adopted.

VICTORIAN POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. SALMON.—I wish to know from the Minister representing the Postmaster-General if some steps cannot be taken to render more regular the postal service in the country districts of Victoria. Owing to the recent trouble in the Railway department of this State, a number of people find themselves almost entirely cut off from postal communication with the metropolis. In many cases numbers of letters are left lying within a few miles of their destination for as much as 24 hours before being forwarded. In the town of Avoca, where over twenty mails are made up each day, they have only three mails a week instead of a daily mail as heretofore.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I need not say that Ministers very much regret that, through force of circumstances, the postal services of the State of Victoria have been so disarranged by recent events; but every effort is being made to bring them back to the conditions prevailing before the railway service was dislocated.

THE VONDEL CASE.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister, without notice, if he has received any additional correspondence with reference to the Vondel case, and whether, if so, he will lay it upon the table of the House?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There is official correspondence with reference to the case, but I do not think that it is complete. I shall be glad to lay it on the table as soon as we can make it complete.

DRAYTON GRANGE INQUIRY.

Mr. PAGE.—Has the Minister for Defence any objection to lay upon the table the decision arrived at by the Government upon the report of the commission which inquired into the Drayton Grange case?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall be very pleased to lay the whole of the papers upon the table to-morrow.

INTER-STATE DUTIES.

Mr. THOMSON.—I desire to know from the Minister for Trade and Customs when the decision of the Attorney-General in reference to the adjustment of Inter-State duties upon goods exported from one State and consumed in another prior to the 8th October, 1901, was given?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I cannot give the exact date, but I shall be happy to look it up, and give the honorable member the information to-morrow.

COST OF IMPERIAL CONTINGENTS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Twelve months ago this House carried a resolution ordering the preparation of a return showing the comparative cost of the Imperial contingents sent from the various States to South Africa. I should like to ask the Minister for Defence whether he intends to comply with that resolution, and furnish the House with the information asked for?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not remember the resolution, but I shall look it up, and, if possible, give the information.

LIEUT.-COLS. BRAITHWAITE AND REAY.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House a copy of all papers and documents concerning the matters connected with the proposed retirement of Lt.-Cols. Braithwaite and Reay?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answer to the honorable member's questions is as follows:—

The Government is of opinion that no good purpose would be served by doing so, and would suggest to the honorable member not to press the question.

I might say that it seems to me, subject to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that requests for the production of papers should be made on motion. I do not know if honorable gentlemen expect the Government to lay upon the table any paper they may have in their possession at the mere request of any one member. In a case such as this the Government is in no way adverse to the production of the papers asked for, but it might not be in the interests of the persons concerned that such papers should be produced.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The standing orders would prevent any form of question being placed upon the notice-paper the answer to which would of necessity involve the production of a paper or document; but the question which has just been asked is perfectly in order. What the honorable member for Bourke seeks to know is whether the Government object to the laying upon the table of certain papers. If the Government have no objection, it will be competent for him to move, on notice, for their production, and even if the Government did object, he would still be at liberty to take that course if he desired to do so. There is no reason why a question such as this should not be asked.

FEDERAL MEMBERS' VISIT TO WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Mr. KIRWAN asked the Minister for Home Affairs, upon notice—

Whether in view of the allegations of extravagance concerning the visit of Federal members to Western Australia, he will state what was the total cost of that visit to the Commonwealth?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

The only cost incurred was for the conveyance of Federal members between Adelaide and Fremantle, £172 10s.

MAJOR LENEHAN.

Mr. THOMSON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Has the Government had communication with the Imperial authorities regarding the claim of Major Lenehan, of the New South Wales Military Forces, regarding arrears due to him; and, if so, what is the result of that communication?

2. Has the Government applied to the Secretary of State for the Colonies for a copy of the record of the proceedings of the court martial through the finding of which Major Lenehan was reprimanded for neglect of duty? If so, what is the nature of the reply?

3. Will the Minister lay a copy of any correspondence and papers connected with each of the foregoing matters on the table of the House?

4. Did Major Lenehan report himself to Major-General Sir Edward Hutton on his return in March last year?

5. Has Major Lenehan discharged any military duties since his return? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. No.

2. The Government is in possession of the record, but not of the evidence.

3. The communications are not yet complete; and, as it is not in the public interest to lay the papers on the table, I will ask the honorable member not to press for them at present.

4. Yes.

5. No, pending result of communications.

FEDERAL PATENT BILL.

Mr. FULLER asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. When is the Federal Patent Bill likely to be introduced?

2. Is the Government aware that numerous inquiries are being made from all parts of the world as to when the Federal Patent Bill is likely to come into force?

3. Is the Government aware that numerous inventors in all parts of the world, as well as in the Commonwealth of Australia, are not filing applications in the States because they are waiting for the Federal Patent Bill to become law?

4. Is it a fact that many of the indices and records in the several States' Patent Offices are in a state of incorrectness and incompleteness; and, if so, is it the intention of the Government to take immediate steps to rectify and consolidate these indices before the Patent Bill is passed?

5. In reference to the fourth question, has the Government considered the advisability of appointing a small commission of gentlemen, with the requisite technical and departmental knowledge, to investigate, rectify, and consolidate these indices and records, prior to the Patent Bill becoming law, so that the public may thereby be put to the minimum of inconvenience when the Federal Patent Office is opened?

6. Has the Government considered that unless some immediate steps are taken to rectify and consolidate the indices and records, prior to the passing of the Federal Patent Bill, the department may, from the start, be in a state of chaos, and the public be hampered in their investigations as to the novelty of their inventions?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Federal Patent Bill is likely to be introduced into the Senate within a month. The other questions pertain to the department of the Minister for Trade and Customs.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

2. There have been some inquiries on the subject.

3. Probably some inventors are pursuing this course.

4. The Government are not aware of any necessity for attempting interference before they are clothed with the proper legal authority.

5. The Government do not consider this necessary.

6. The Government will do whatever is necessary for preventing any state of chaos.

PAPER.

Sir EDMUND BARTON laid on the table—

New regulations under Post and Telegraph Act 1901.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH :
ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 27th May (vide page 180) on motion by Mr. L. E. GROOM—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted :—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the Speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).

—I have no desire to lengthen this debate beyond reasonable limits. Knowing that we are to have, in all probability, a very short and somewhat busy session, I shall be pleased to see the debate terminated within a few days, in order that we may get to the solid work proposed in the programme presented to us in the speech of His Excellency the Governor-General. I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition and of the Prime Minister, and also to those of other honorable members, including particularly those of the honorable member for Gippsland. I was somewhat surprised at the remarks of the last-named honorable member, and at his seeming astonishment at the enormous cost to the Commonwealth of the rebates upon the sugar excise duty.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I was not astonished. I knew about it all along.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The honorable member seemed to be almost horrified at the great cost that would be involved, and I was the more surprised at his remarks when, on reference to Hansard, I found that when the proposal for these rebates was under discussion, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, proposed to strike out the condition that the rebates should be continued till the year 1907, the honorable member for Gippsland voted in favour of levying this enormous tax upon the people of the Commonwealth for a period of five years.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I mentioned that yesterday, but I said that it is only fair that the people of the country should know the exact cost.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I think that upon that point the public were fairly well informed. In South Australia, the matter was fully debated before the elections, and the people understood exactly the position that would be created if sugar from New South Wales and Queensland were to be admitted into other States free of duty. However, I am sure that the honorable member for Gippsland need feel little alarm, because even when the excise rebate of £2 per ton is absolutely abolished, as it will be in 1907, a sufficient encouragement will be offered in the £3 difference still remaining to enable competitors from outside to maintain sugar at a reasonable price. There is nothing with which to find fault in the Government programme, except perhaps its enormous length. It is a programme which might very well be introduced at the beginning of a three years Parliament, and occupy the whole of that period to complete. There are many measures of considerable importance, and I hope that, for the sake of economising time, the Government will tell us exactly what proposals they intend to push on, and then stick to the work in connexion with such measures until they are carried or defeated. With a host of measures before honorable members, a large amount of attention is diverted from matters of first importance to those which cannot possibly be brought to finality. I agree with the Government proposal for the establishment of a High Court, and, as I said in the early part of last session, I consider that this is one of the measures that is absolutely required to complete our Constitution. The question whether the court shall, as suggested by some honorable members, be constituted from the Chief Justices of the various States, or whether it shall be an independent body, is one which I am free to admit is open to much debate. At the same time, after fairly careful consideration, I think that we should create a body entirely apart from our State courts, even though it may involve considerable expenditure. I do not for one moment suggest any want of faith in the ability or integrity of the Chief Justices or other members of our States judiciaries, but I cannot see how important questions of constitutional law, involving an enormous amount of work, can be dealt with by our States Judges, who are, even under present conditions, frequently overworked. We have expended a great deal of money upon the machinery of this Federation, and we should not now "spoil the ship for a ha'porth o' tar," and lose dignity as a Federation by having to resort to a casual court constituted of the Chief Justices of the States. At the time when Federation was before the electors, a promise was made that a High Court should be constituted of Judges, appointed subject to the will of both Houses of Parliament, and removable only for misconduct—a court to which the people might have easy and speedy access, at a cost much smaller than that which is now involved in carrying appeals before the Privy Council. I think this promise should be carried out, and I shall therefore give my hearty support to the Bill foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech. Of the other measures to be introduced, the one next in importance is that for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission. Here, again, is another missing link which is urgently required to complete our Constitution. Many questions of the utmost importance can only be properly and fairly dealt with by such a body. Matters involving rival railway rates, fair trade and commerce, and the use of river waters are among these. It was stated yesterday that, although every effort had been made, by fair means and by friendly approaches, to bring about an understanding between the Railways Commissioners of the various States as to the rates charged on their respective lines, in several cases, notably in Western Australia, preferential railway rates were still in existence, and there is no possible means of dealing with this question except by the appointment of an Inter-State Commission. I need only direct attention to the two sections of the Constitution dealing with the Inter-State Commission to show that it is absolutely necessary that such a body should be established. Section 101 can hardly be termed permissive. It reads as follows—

There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary for the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and of all laws made thereunder.

Section 102 reads—

The Parliament may by any law with respect to trade or commerce forbid, as to railways, any preference or discrimination by any State, or by any authority constituted under a State, if such preference or discrimination is undue and unreasonable or unjust to any State, due regard being had to the financial responsibilities incurred by any State in connexion with the construction and maintenance of its railways.

The concluding paragraph is the most important—

But no preference or discrimination shall, within the meaning of this section, be taken to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State, unless so adjudged by the Inter-State Commission.

I do not think that I need go further to prove the absolute necessity for proceeding at the earliest possible moment with the Government proposal. The next in order of importance in the Government programme is a measure which most honorable members will welcome, namely, the Defence Bill. We had a measure before us last session, which was ultimately withdrawn, and I think it was well that it should have been so dealt with. We are now promised a new Bill, and from what I can learn there is every prospect of it proving workable. It is urgently required, because, judging from the state of affairs in South Australia, a great deal of dissatisfaction exists regarding the manner in which the defence forces are being managed. The feeling there has become so strong that many old and valued officers who have devoted years of their life and hundreds of pounds of their own private money to the service of the State have, in spite of their love for their profession, handed in their resignations. I know that South Australia is not alone in this respect, and that the same conditions exist to a greater or less degree in other States. Under these circumstances I shall indeed welcome the new Bill. Following upon this item in natural sequence, we come to the proposal for a new agreement in regard to the naval subsidy. We have not yet had an opportunity of seeing the exact text of the agreement, and I think it is rather a pity that we should not have received fuller information. However, as this is an occasion upon which we can deal with the subject only in mere outline, we must be content with the statements which have been made in reference to its conditions. I have heard opinions expressed by some very able naval and military authorities in favour of the establishment of a purely Australian navy, but I have come to the conclusion that the time is not yet ripe for this young community, of about 4,000,000 of people, to contribute the money necessary to provide a navy. There are more reasons than one why we should not do this. First of all, the expense would be enormous at the outset, and we should have continuous demands made upon us to renew ships and armament as the old vessels became obsolete. This is one of the strong arguments in favour of our continuing to rely upon the protection of the British navy in a somewhat better form than we have had it in the past. The additional contribution is a mere nothing compared with the expense to which we should be put if we dared at the inception of the Federation to start a naval defence of our own. I know that a very large section of the community, with their patriotic ideas, are very keen upon the establishment of an Australian navy, but when the question of cost comes to be considered, together with the new conditions under which our contribution is in future to be made, I feel sure that the balance of the argument is all in favour of the naval agreement. I say this, however, without having had an opportunity of very carefully studying the proposed agreement. I am relying upon the outline of it which has been published in the newspapers, and upon the statements of the Prime Minister, so that if the agreement proves to contain different terms from those which I have been led to expect, I still reserve to myself full liberty to alter my opinion. On the other hand, if—as has been stated—it contains reasonable conditions for the training of our own men and cadets, and for a thoroughly efficient defence of our coast line, I shall give it my hearty support. The matter of the uniform patent legislation has already been dealt with by questions, and honorable members are promised that a Bill dealing with it will be introduced at an early date. Questions were answered to-day regarding the condition of the patent indices in the various States. I am able to answer those inquiries, at any rate, so far as one State is concerned. In South Australia the indices are in a hopeless state of confusion, and it is absolutely impossible to ascertain what patents have been registered and what have not. I know of several inventors who are merely waiting until they can take advantage of patent laws, under reasonable conditions, which will be uniform throughout Australia. Another important subject with which Ministers have promised to deal—although somewhat indefinitely, I suppose when the time suits them—is the conversion or taking over of the States' debts. This subject is not a new one. It was considered in the Federal Convention, and was the subject of attention in some of the State Parliaments even prior to that. The advantages to be gained by the conversion of the States' debts have already been put before both Parliament and the people by able financiers who understand the subject very much better than I do. Amongst the great benefits which would be derived by taking over the various States' debts would be the ability to convert them as they became due, and not before, into Commonwealth stock at a considerable saving of interest. The total indebtedness of the Commonwealth to-day is, in round figures, about £220,000,000, and the urgent necessity for dealing with this question at the earliest possible date is evidenced by the fact that from the return of the debts due by the various States I find that during the next seven years—that is, up to 1910—a sum of approximately £28,000,000 will become repayable. Something approaching that amount will have to be repaid by the different States for existing bonds and stocks. Unless we arrive at some arrangement with the States it will be rather awkward if we find three or four of them each requiring £1,000,000, £2,000,000, or £3,000,000, simultaneously going upon the London money market at a bad time, competing against each other, and eventually being forced to pay for their accommodation, in the way of interest, a great deal more than they are paying at the present time.

Mr. KINGSTON.—By bidding against each other?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Yes. We know in the past how anxiously the Agents-General of the different States have watched each other, like so many cats watching a mouse, in an endeavour to be first upon the London market with a loan of £1,000,000. Unless some arrangement is made by which the Commonwealth can take over the States' debts, how much worse will the position be with £28,000,000 falling due within the next seven years, and with the knowledge on the part of the foreign bondholders that the States are bound to have the money with which to redeem their existing liabilities? Instead of having to pay 3½ per cent. interest it is quite upon the cards that they will be required to pay 4½ per cent. Of course if we take over the whole of the liabilities of the States, we have the security —as was pointed out by one speaker yesterday—of the Customs revenue for the payment of the interest. But another question arises in my mind—namely, whether the foreign bondholder will not want to know that the Federal Government possesses as security the assets upon which the great bulk of this £220,000,000 has been loaned—namely, the States' railways. The bulk of this money was borrowed for the construction of the railways, and it may be considered that they should not remain in the hands of the States when the liability upon them has passed over to the Federal Government. This is a question which I leave to wiser heads than mine to consider, but it is undoubtedly worthy of close attention.

Mr. REID.—If the matter is to be complicated in that way, any arrangement will be postponed for I do not know how many years.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I recognise that that is a difficulty, and I thank the leader of the Opposition for the hint. I recognise also that there would be perhaps considerable delay in arriving at an arrangement between the different States for a transfer of the railways. Complications would arise as to their original cost and their earnings, and there would also be present a jealous feeling on the part of the States that by handing over their railways to the Commonwealth they might be prevented in the future from extending them within their own territory for the purposes of development. Still I put the position fairly, in order that it may be considered. Personally I think that the whole of the Customs revenue should constitute quite a sufficient security, and if the States can be induced to hand over their debts to the Commonwealth, and at the same time to give an assurance that no further borrowing will be undertaken by them without the consent of the Federal Parliament, a very large saving could be effected.

Mr. REID.—That is another stipulation that would have the effect of postponing any settlement indefinitely.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—To my mind it is a stipulation that ought to be made. It would be folly upon the part of the Commonwealth to take over the whole of the liabilities of the States if any individual State might subsequently for the purpose of undertaking perhaps some fancy public work which might not be reproductive, go upon the money market again and pile up a new list of debts against its taxpayers.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does not the honorable member think that we ought to do something to knock out the underwriting system which is applied to State loans?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—That is a mere matter of detail. The underwriters have proved very useful upon some occasions. They have saved many a loan from failure. The leader of the Opposition suggests that it would be difficult to obtain the consent of the States to refrain from further borrowing. I am not at all certain that it would, because I believe that their position presently in regard to the repayment of loans will become so difficult that the electors in the various States will force them to accept the proposal of the Commonwealth Parliament—if we are willing to undertake the work—and to hand over their debts to the Federation. I do not see that much harm could result to them from the adoption of such a course, because, after all, if they wished to raise money for any purpose of reasonable development the Commonwealth Parliament would be only too anxious to assist them, and, moreover, the Federal Government would be able to obtain the necessary money for them upon very much better terms than they could secure for themselves. However, that is one of those questions which I should be pleased to see taken up with a great deal of energy, not only in this Parliament, but in every State Parliament throughout Australia. Now I come to some questions of administration. The administration of the Customs department has been specially commented upon in the various newspapers, and so many cases of harshness have been cited that I desire to say a word, or two upon it. I can do so with a very much clearer conscience than can some honorable members, because at the time the Customs Bill was being considered I think I can be credited with having exhibited a very lively interest in it, and with having warned the House again and again that its provisions were altogether too stringent. Those provisions might have been suited to the requirements of England 50 years ago, but they were utterly unsuitable to the present state of our commerce. I fought the question of the imposition of a minimum fine as strenuously as I could, and went so far as to call for divisions upon that matter. I attempted to secure a reduction of the minimum penalty for an infraction of the Act from £5 to £2. I also urged that no minimum fine should be provided, but that magistrates should be vested with absolute discretion as to whether they should fine an offender either 1s. or £100. Had my proposal been carried, instead of men who are guilty of merely technical offences being fined a minimum amount of £5, we should have witnessed a magistrate in some of the prosecutions instituted by the Customs department imposing a fine of 1s. without costs. Then the disgrace of the police court prosecution would have disappeared. The presiding magistrate could have expressed his opinion upon the merits of any case. He could have said, "This is merely a technical offence, and I fine the defendant 1s., and will not allow any costs." I am sorry that that course was not adopted. I do not believe in the present limitation of a magistrate's powers. We may provide a maximum penalty, but to limit him to a minimum fine is ridiculous. I wish to quote one or two cases in this connexion. One of the first cases—a very stupid one—which I remember, goes to prove the absurdity of imposing a minimum fine. It was the case of a well-known and highly-respected gentleman in Adelaide—a horse-owner and a breeder of horses—who received as a little present from a friend in India, a bottle of mustard oil for the treatment of horses. This oil came by ordinary ship, and, after inquiry, it was proved to have been manufactured in an Indian prison.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That was so stated on the bottle.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Yes; there was no attempt at fraud, but the man was prosecuted, and the minimum fine of £5 was inflicted, although the bottle represented a value of 1s., or less.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is not so much as a similar offender would have been fined under the law in England.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I do not know what is done in England, but I do not think we should do anything so foolish as to fine a man under such circumstances. A good many of the sections of the Customs Regulation Act were taken from the old English law, which was extremely useful in the old days of the Coastguard, when small quantities of goods used to be smuggled into England from France, Germany, and Spain.

Mr. CROUCH.—The English law to which I refer was passed in 1899.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—That is not my point at the present time, but I know that one has only to touch on a subject like this in order to stir up the honorable and learned member for Corio. I have no desire to see prison-made goods imported into Australia, and I am merely showing the absurdity of compelling magistrates to inflict this minimum fine when it is felt that no fine should be inflicted, and when, but for the stringency of the law, it would not be inflicted. If the Government had acted in the same spirit that they did in regard to the boy Tingey the other day, this fine ought to have been refunded.

Mr. REID.—That was the case of the Bible; there was a difference in the Cabinet about that.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—In order to give another instance of the peculiar anomalies of the Act, I wish to refer to section 53, which reads—

No spirits, opium, tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes shall be imported, except in packages as prescribed. Penalty: £100.

The Minister has the power of prescribing the size of the packages by regulation, and this provision is also taken from the old English laws, which, as I say, were highly useful at one time, but are now absolutely ridiculous when it is considered that every article imported has to be manifested and remain in the charge of the Customs until the entry has been passed and duty duly paid. Why should not a man be allowed to import a package of tobacco weighing less than 20 lbs.? Should I desire to import a package of 5 lbs., that package would be held under the Customs seal until the manifest and invoice had been examined and duty paid. I have shown the absurdity of the law, and now desire to show the absurdity of the administration. I received a telegram a few days ago, which I am sorry to say I have mislaid, from a solicitor of Port Darwin, informing me that a Chinese storekeeper there had imported 40 lbs. of tobacco in one ship, but, for convenience sake, had divided the commodity into two packages, one containing 25 lbs. and the other containing 15 lbs. The packages were duly manifested, and the invoice was produced, but the storekeeper, on seeking to clear them, was informed that while he could obtain the package of 25 lbs. on the payment of the duty, the smaller packet must be seized, because it was under the prescribed size, and the importer was fined the minimum of £5. It is absurd that a Customs official should be so absolutely without discretion as to be guilty of administration of this sort. Does the Minister say that this storekeeper deserved to have any fine inflicted on him?

Mr. KINGSTON.—He would have got it hotter under English legislation.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—No doubt he might have "got it hotter" under Russian legislation.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Is Imperial legislation to be compared to that of Russia?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Our legislation is getting pretty close to that of Russia; at any rate, I should say that a man could not be worse treated in that country. If the Minister cannot see his way to give his officers a little more discretion, the sooner the House takes the matter in hand and amends the Act the better. I am sure that the common sense of many members would support an amendment in reference to such cases as that of the cartridges the other day, in the direction of allowing more discretion in the administration of the Act. In the case I have mentioned I am sure no ordinary magistrate or justice of the peace—and we have some curious specimens of the latter—would have dared to fine a man £5 for an offence so nominal, if the law allowed any discretion. While saying all this, I must acknowledge that the Minister has had to perform most difficult work. As a Customs agent for many years, I can appreciate the difficulties with which he has to contend. Even in one State, with one set of officers, those troubles would arise, but when dealing with six States and six sets of officers the difficulties must be enormous. I am condemning the administration for which the Minister cannot be personally responsible, unless he can put a week's work into a day.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I take all the responsibility; I have very good officers.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I know that the Minister has to take all responsibility, and he may have very good officers, but they must be lacking in discretion or afraid of being dismissed if they, in the slightest degree, lean to the side of justice. Everything the Minister has done has been with a view of conserving the revenues of the Commonwealth, and his task has been a hard one; and I am sure that if any one else had occupied the position, probably just as many mistakes would have been made. I say this with the idea of inducing him to give his officers more discretion in removing some of the anomalies I have pointed out, and permitting them to treat trivial cases as such, and not as subjects for police court prosecutions.

Mr. SALMON.—Does the honorable member mean that the cases should be treated departmentally?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—No; there have been great abuses under that system. What I mean is that it would be a good thing if in such cases as those to which I have referred, the Minister were not quite so firm—I believe his friends called it firmness, though it has been described as obstinacy—and if he were to bring down a short Bill in order to remove anomalies. Such a Bill, I feel sure, would pass both Houses almost at one sitting. If the Minister even gave an indication of a reasonable desire to deal with such cases in a different spirit, those who have reasonable complaints would point out the difficulties caused by the law, and show how amendment would be advantageous. In such a step the Minister would receive hearty support from honorable members.

Mr. McCAY.—How would the honorable member legislate in order to meet such a case as that which occurred at Port Darwin, unless it had to be dealt with departmentally?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—First of all, the section providing for a minimum fine might be altered, because it is unreasonable to force a magistrate to inflict a penalty when there has been no attempt at fraud, and no absolute wrong done.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The objection of prescribing the size of the packages is that they may be seen.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—My main point is that the magistrates should be given fuller discretion.

Mr. PAGE.—Who is to prove that a mistake is honest or dishonest?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The magistrate, I presume, is the best judge of that. It is absurd to compel a magistrate, in a technical case, to fine a man £5, when otherwise the penalty of 1s. might be imposed. It is unwise to have an Act which places control upon the magistrate's sense of justice. If a magistrate can be trusted to fine a man £100 surely he can be trusted to fine him 1s.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member means in cases of error.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Yes, in such cases as that of the bottle of oil, where there was a mere technical breach of the law.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No exception is made by the act in cases of prison made goods.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I suppose that if I went on a visit to India and sent to the Minister of Trade and Customs a present, which on being opened after he had passed the entry—as he would, being an honest trader—was found to have been made in Calcutta gaol, he would immediately fine himself £5.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I should wait and “run in” the honorable member.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Now I come to the Immigration Restriction Act, though I am not going to deal with the six hatters, of whom we have heard enough. I shall refer to that case only in order to point out that when sub-section (g) of section 3 was passed, I for one was quite ignorant of the extent to which it would be used. I listened very carefully to the debate, and later took some part in it myself. Sub-section (g) of section 3 was inserted on the motion of the leader of the labour party, and provides that—

Any persons under a contract or agreement to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth shall be regarded as “prohibited immigrants.”

The object of the insertion of those words was, I understood, to prevent the introduction of large numbers of men under contract to perform work at unfair rates of pay, and to prevent interference during the existence of some strike or labour trouble. The honorable member for Bland, speaking in support of his amendment, said—

When I first gave notice of this amendment I proposed to cover all classes of labour performed in the Commonwealth. But, in view of representations made by some honorable members, it is, I think, desirable for the time being to restrict the classes prohibited to artisans and labourers. There are one or two other classes of labour it would have been advisable to cover by the sub-clause, but the difficulty of providing for efficient exemptions of classes that should be exempted, and the possibility, perhaps, a little later, of a number of new industries being commenced within the Commonwealth, point to the necessity of minimizing the operation of the amendment in the meantime. The amendment will cover most of the classes of labour likely to be affected through people being inveigled into unfair agreements in ignorance of the conditions obtaining in Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not depart from that statement.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—That argument undoubtedly obtained the sympathy of honorable members on both sides of the Chamber. In speaking to the amendment the Attorney-General stated that—

The persons to whom the honorable member alluded when he made his concluding reference to the possibility of the establishment of new industries in the Commonwealth are excluded under the amendment as it now stands, and it is necessary to make provision to permit skilled labourers to enter the Commonwealth if they are of such a character as to be able to add to the industrial wealth of the community.

That is the interpretation to be placed upon the proviso which, on his motion, was added to the amendment. What has occurred is very much to be regretted. I am sure that a blunder has been committed, and that it was not the desire of the Prime Minister that the men concerned should be treated as they were. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, speaking on the same subject, said—

There is no desire to exclude men who voluntarily seek to make their home here for the purpose of engaging in manual labour or anything else, so long as they belong to a civilized white race, and are themselves desirable immigrants. As I understand it, we have never in Australia taken up that narrow view of saying that we must keep Australia for ourselves and our children.

Mr. WATSON.—Oh, no.

That was the belief under which I, for one, consented to allow the clause to pass. It is difficult to know how the Act can be amended so that it will still contain the safeguards desired, and yet give an opportunity for desirable immigrants to enter the Commonwealth; but I think that it should be amended so as to attain that end. There is another matter in connexion with the administration of the Act to which I wish to draw attention. It was never intended by Parliament that the operation of the Act should be retrospective, so as to do injustice to persons—whether English, Irish, Scotch, Chinese, or Japanese—who were living within the Commonwealth for years before the inauguration of federation. But a case has occurred in which injustice of that kind has been done; and although I have directed the attention of the Prime Minister to it, I have not yet heard his decision upon it, and so far he has been adamant to my representations. The case is that of three Chinamen who were assistants in and part owners of a store at Port Darwin, and had resided in that town for fourteen years prior to federation. They were engaged in business there during the whole of that period, and had the cleanest of records ; and certificates were obtained by them from both the police and European merchants in the town as to their respectability and integrity. They applied to the Customs officer at Port Darwin for domicile certificates to enable them to visit their original homes in China for a few months. The officer did not see any difficulty in the matter. He told them—"I cannot give you certificates, because they have to be sent from the head office in Melbourne ; but I have no doubt that there will be no difficulty in the matter." Acting upon that assurance, the men left their business and went to China. I think that under sub-section (a) of section 3 of the Act, they were entitled to fairer consideration than they have received from the department. That sub-section provides that amongst those who shall be exempted from the operation of the clause is—

Any person who satisfies an officer that he has formerly been domiciled in the Commonwealth or in any colony which has become a State.

These Chinamen satisfied the Customs officer that they had been living, had had their homes, and were in business in the State of South Australia for fourteen years before the advent of federation, and yet on a mere technicality as to the meaning of the word "domicile"—upon which any half-dozen lawyers in this House could raise a vast amount of argument—they have been denied the right to return. An injustice has been inflicted upon them which is a disgrace to the Commonwealth.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Would the honorable member like me to lay the papers on the table ?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I shall be only too pleased to have them laid upon the table. I am speaking from the communications which have been made to me, and I am sure that the facts are absolutely as I have stated them. Parliament did not intend the Act to be retrospective, or to inflict injustice of the kind I have mentioned. I wish now to deal with the paragraph in the Governor-General's speech which refers to the construction of the Western Australian Railway. I received yesterday from the Prime Minister an answer in reference to the suggestion that the Northern Territory be taken over by the Commonwealth which puts that matter entirely at rest. The South Australian Government, naturally becoming tired of waiting for some reply in regard to the proposal for transfer, have decided to sanction the construction of a line which will join the existing system in South Australia to that in the Northern Territory.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The South Australian Government did not tell us of their intention to do anything in the matter until they had a Bill upon the table.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—At the beginning of last session I laid before the House a proposal which I supported by considerable evidence, and all the information which I could obtain in reference to the Northern Territory, and that proposal was actually shelved. The people of South Australia having waited for some reply on the subject for some fifteen months became tired of waiting. If the matter had been taken up when I brought it forward, and it was fresh, and the people of South Australia were favorable to the transfer of the Territory to the Commonwealth, the thing would now be an accomplished fact.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Are they not favorable to the transfer now ?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—No. They are now in favour of the construction of a transcontinental line upon the land grant system, and that line will be made. There are a dozen capitalists who will take the matter up on the terms dictated by the South Australian Parliament.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Government never had any indication from the South Australian Government that they were tired of waiting for an answer.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The South Australian Government were not likely to make that intimation, but that is undoubtedly the fact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the people of South Australia let their Government part with the land ?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Undoubtedly. At considerable pains, I brought a great deal of information upon the subject before the House, but the only reply to my proposal was the speech of a Government supporter, who got up, or was put up, to make it a subject of ridicule.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—He was certainly not put up.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—His speech was ably answered by the member representing the Territory, but no other answer was given to the proposal, which was indorsed by the bulk of the electors of South Australia before ever I entered this Parliament.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—Are the majority of the electors of South Australia in favour of the construction of this line upon the land-grant system?

Mr. KINGSTON.—No.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I think that they are. At any rate, their representatives are. I wish now to refer to the Western Australian Railway.

Mr. FOWLER.—I hope that we are coming to it very quickly.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—That will depend a good deal upon circumstances. A proposal in relation to that railway has already been put before the House, and we have been informed of some kind of understanding, which is perfectly unofficial and unwarranted by parliamentary sanction, between some of the members of the Western Australian Government and the Minister for Defence. We have been told that the line must be constructed, because Western Australia would not have come into the Federation had not her people believed that the Commonwealth would undertake its construction.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There was never any compact.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I am glad to hear it. If there had been it would not have been of much value.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Those who were advocating a Federation not then in existence could not make a compact.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—No, perhaps not; but I am sure that, if it had not been for assurances of support for the railway, the Minister for Defence would not have advocated federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hear, hear; that is so.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Then I was perfectly right in my statement. There is no doubt a very strong feeling in Western Australia with regard to this line, and the report of the engineers with reference to it is being anxiously looked for. It is questionable whether the country is of such a character as to justify the construction of a railway, except for defence purposes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is better than much of the country in the north of South Australia.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—If it is not better than some of our country north of Port Augusta it is very poor, and in that case I should advise the construction of the line upon the land grant system. The proposed railway will cover a distance about equal to the gap between Oodnadatta and Pine Creek, which is not yet bridged over by the transcontinental line, and the cost is estimated at about £5,000,000. Several matters will have to be considered before the construction of the line can be approved of. Whilst fully recognising the importance of defence considerations, and those relating to the isolation of Western Australia, of which so much has been made lately, we have to remember that if the line is constructed it will involve a very heavy annual interest charge upon all the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Oh, no.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Then we have to consider the position of South Australia in regard to the line.

Mr. FOWLER.—She will derive great benefit from it.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I am inclined to differ from the honorable member, because a line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta will, in the natural course, join on to the line to be constructed between Cobar and Broken Hill, and the traffic to the eastern States, instead of going through South Australian ports as at present, will be diverted to the railway route.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is the honorable member opposed to that?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I am simply putting the position as it affects South Australia. The Minister is jumping before he comes to the hurdle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Victorian traffic would still pass through Adelaide.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I believe that the railway will operate to the great detriment of South Australia. It is all very well for the representatives of Western Australia to talk about the benefit that will accrue to the State which I represent; but I shall be very much surprised if the South Australians permit the construction of the line through their territory unless they are assured that some benefit will be derived by them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a fine federal spirit.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The same federal spirit that animated the Minister for Defence and others in Western Australia in preventing the proper opening up of the port of Esperance by rail to the gold fields, and thus depriving South Australia and Victoria of the port which best served their purposes in connexion with the trade in that direction. I may tell the Minister for Defence, and those in sympathy with him, that unless the Esperance Bay Railway is built, and Esperance is made a port for Victorian and South Australian trade, instead of compelling traffic to the gold-fields to pass over several hundred miles of sea and railway at unnecessary expense, the people of South Australia will be fools if they allow the railway to pass through their territory.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member should not make himself a laughing-stock.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The Minister knows that what I am saying is a fact. Before this line can be constructed, the South Australian Parliament will have to look at the whole position, and they will undoubtedly want some quid pro quo before they sanction it. They are not going to permit their traffic to be diverted to other States unless some reasonable consideration is shown to them in connexion with the construction of the railway from Esperance to the gold-fields, or in some other direction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a good federal spirit.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The same federal spirit as induced the Minister to demand the promise of a special railway before he consented to advocate federation; the same spirit as induced the demand of New South Wales for the capital site. South Australia did not demand anything upon entering the federal compact. She did not even ask for reasonable consideration in regard to the immense sums of money spent upon the transcontinental telegraph line, which has been a source of loss to her for years. That was the largest national work ever constructed in Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—South Australia will be paid for the line as a transferred property.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—But she will not be recouped the losses which have been involved in the working of the line ever since it was constructed.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Did the Government institute the line because they thought of the losses.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—They instituted it in a courageous manner which might well be imitated by other States. They instituted it without regard to their own direct benefit, knowing that for years it must involve a loss. Whatever their main idea may have been, they have certainly conferred a great benefit upon the whole of Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why should they not exhibit the same feeling in regard to the railway?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I do not say that they should not, but whilst injustice is being done to South Australia and Victoria by the opposition which is being shown to the opening of the port of Esperance, I say they would be foolish if they consented to the construction of the railway, and thereby committed themselves to a contribution of probably £15,000 or £20,000 a year towards the maintenance of it. I think I have occupied a fair share of the time of the House, and I shall now conclude by assuring the Government that they will have no factious opposition from me. I shall do my best to assist them in passing those measures with which I am in sympathy, and I hope they will let us know at the earliest possible moment the Bills with which they intend to persevere, so that all other measures may be relegated to some future session.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I intend to make my remarks as short as possible, because I recognise that we have not a great deal of time to devote to the consideration of the large proportion of important measures promised in the Governor-General's speech. I think there is no escaping from the position indicated by the leader of the Opposition in regard to the dissolution of this House, so that we may go to the country at the same time as a proportion of the members of the Senate. I admit that this will involve the sacrifice by honorable members of a portion of the period for which they were elected, but I think that we should, if possible, avoid incurring the expense that would be involved in holding a second election. Moreover, I think that it is unwise to ask the electors to devote their attention to federal politics upon two occasions divided by only a few months. Whilst it may not follow from the coming elections being held together that on all subsequent occasions they will take place at one and the same time, we should, as far as possible, try to simplify matters for the electors, and to study economy. If the course suggested is followed, we shall have but a short time at our disposal during this session, and the number of very important measures forecasted in the Governor-General's speech renders it necessary that we should address ourselves to business at as early a date as possible. Before passing to the matters dealt with in the Governor-General's speech, I should like to refer to one or two matters of administration. One of these is in connexion with the Immigration Restriction Act, not in regard to the admission of the six hatters, but in reference to the question of coloured immigration. I notice from a return published a few days ago, that a considerable number of coloured people have recently been admitted into the Commonwealth notwithstanding the operation of the Immigration Restriction Act; and it seems to me that if we can do no better than the return would indicate under the law as it stands, the minority of the members of this House who asked that the colour line should be drawn absolutely, and that all coloured aliens should be excluded, took the proper course. In the first place, I find that over 30 coloured immigrants passed the education test. These included Burmese, Eurasians, Filipinos, Hindoos, Japanese, Mauritians, South Sea Islanders, West Indians, and one black from St. Helena. I understood when the Act was under discussion that the Government intended to exercise such discrimination in the application of the law that no person would be able to pass the education test so long as he was held to be an undesirable coloured immigrant.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We took a very strong step when we changed the test every fortnight.

Mr. WATSON.—Perhaps so, but we were assured by the Attorney-General that the test could be made so restrictive as to exclude undesirables with as much efficiency as the course proposed by the labour party. I submit that the Act would not have passed in its present shape if it had not been for that assurance, which weighed with some honorable members.

Mr. CONROY.—Do not some of these immigrants leave again after a short stay in the Commonwealth?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think so.

Mr. CONROY.—Then there is practically no exclusion.

Mr. WATSON.—No. I see that 653 persons were excluded, but the Act is not effective whilst any number of undesirable persons come in.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Will my honorable friend observe that the departures are very largely in excess of the arrivals?

Mr. WATSON.—I have observed that, but I do not see that it assists the case of the Government in the slightest degree. It does not show that we should admit any more of these undesirable races than we can possibly avoid. It merely evidences that no increase has taken place in the number here, but that is not all that was asked by the people of Australia when the matter was placed before them. Another fact which requires some explanation at the hands of the Government is that a total of 1,300 odd Chinamen have been admitted during the year covered by the last return, irrespective of those included in the 33 I have mentioned as coming in under various provisions of the law. In this connexion I would point out that 1,079 were admitted upon State permits, 564 upon tonnage regulations, and 168 in conformity with the Immigration Restriction Act I presume that the 168 consisted of those who had been previously domiciled in Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Is the honorable member quoting from the returns regarding any particular race?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; from the returns relating to the Chinese.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I understand that those are cases in which domicile was proved.

Mr. WATSON.—I presume so. I understood, some time before the prorogation took place, that the possibility of Chinese and others being admitted under State permits would cease within a very short period after the question was raised. That was many months ago, and yet I find that a considerable number in excess of that which was given at the time have been admitted.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—They are all persons who were settled here previously.

Mr. WATSON.—That statement is open to cavil and doubt. It is not certain that many of those who present permits are the persons who originally obtained them from the State authorities, and I think, therefore, that some limit should be put upon the operation of these permits.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Their operation is largely diminishing now.

Mr. WATSON. — From the number given it would seem there is a necessity for it. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how it is that any Chinese have been admitted under tonnage regulations. We abrogated that portion of the State Acts when we passed the Immigration Restriction Bill.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — We did not abrogate it, but we left those Acts to be applied in addition to the new Act. We applied the new Act. There may be some cases in which Chinamen can comply with the educational test, and consequently the necessity arises for the application of the tonnage regulations. Some of the State laws were very lax in that respect, and did not prescribe any poll-tax.

Mr. WATSON. — It seems to me that the law is very lax indeed if it will permit of Chinese coming in under the tonnage regulations. I admit that the presence of 50 or 100 Chinamen does not make any very great difference to Australia, but it is as well to stop a leak in the beginning, lest it may assume large proportions at a later stage. With regard to the admission of some 500 odd Japanese, I understand that 246 of them came in under a treaty which is now void — a treaty which was made between the Governments of Queensland and Japan prior to federation. I should like to ascertain whether the equivalent number of Japanese had left Queensland to allow of the 246 individuals in question coming in under that treaty, which provided that the Queensland Government would raise no objection to the admission of sufficient Japanese to maintain the maximum number that had previously been there.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Those already in Queensland were assessed at a certain number.

Mr. WATSON. — Precisely; and that number was not to be exceeded. Is the House to understand that there had been an emigration of 200 odd Japanese prior to the admission of the 246 in question?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — That agreement involved the admission of those who had passports from the Japanese Government, and included some who had permits to return from the Queensland Government. At the time we thought that the total number of these was 208, but it has now proved to be 246. That is the end of that matter.

Mr. WATSON. — Of course that is a satisfactory statement, but it does seem to me that the Act might be administered with a great deal more stringency than it appears to have been during the past year. I think that a number of honorable members who voted for the Government proposal, in the belief that it would prove effective, would be relieved to know that the Ministry are now taking such steps as will absolutely exclude these undesirable people from Australia. Another phase of the Act upon which a great deal of attention has been bestowed has reference to the admission of the six haters. It is somewhat refreshing to hear the confessions of parliamentary ignorance and innocence which are put forward as excuses under the plea that honorable members "did not know it was loaded." I have a very vivid recollection that the amendment which I proposed appeared upon the business-paper for a very considerable time, not exactly in the same phraseology as that in which it was eventually carried, but the principle involved was before the Chamber for a protracted period. When the matter came up in a concrete form, the debate upon it occupied eight pages of Hansard. So far as the leader of the Opposition is concerned, I wish to point out that though he was not present when the amendment was actually carried, he was present while the proposal figured upon the business-paper, and also upon the recommittal of the Bill, when the very clause in question was under discussion. The right honorable member therefore had every opportunity of protesting against either the principle involved or the phraseology employed in giving effect to it. But not one word was uttered by the right honorable member against the proposal. It was practically passed unanimously, although the honorable member for Wentworth gave to it only a qualified sort of approval, and the honorable member for Capricornia did, I understand, offer some objection to it. So far as I am concerned — and I think the remark is also applicable to the members of the party with which I am associated — I have no objection to any number of Britishers or other white people coming to Australia to make homes for themselves, or to assist in the development of the country. Our insistence upon the principle contained in the amendment which I moved must not be construed into any protest on our part against immigration. I hope that it will be a long time before any section of the community takes up the attitude of objecting to others coming to Australia, and assisting in developing what, after all, is an enormous territory compared with the few people who at present occupy it. But what we say is that those who enter the Commonwealth shall be free from any control of their movements after their arrival, free to make the best of the conditions in which they find themselves, and to compete upon even terms with those who are already here.

Mr. F. E. McLEAN.—The honorable member does not object to their swelling the army of unemployed, but he does object to their coming here to obtain work.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not accept that idea at all. A very large proportion of those who come here of their own free will are supplied with sufficient means to maintain themselves till they get an opportunity of taking part in the development of the country. We have already provided that paupers are not to be admitted to the Commonwealth. That is laid down in the same section of the Act to which I am referring.

Mr. CONROY.—Then a section invalidating contracts would be sufficient?

Mr. WATSON.—No. That is the suggestion put forward by the leader of the Opposition, and, though it would be better than nothing, I hold that it would not meet the case. Instances have occurred in New South Wales—one at Joadja Creek, and two others near Newcastle—in which men were imported from England under contract to work in the mines. In one case the men went to gaol rather than carry out their agreement, whilst in another they were only prevented from leaving their employment by the fear of imprisonment, because they found, upon their arrival, that the conditions obtaining were not such as had been represented to them. Some of them absconded rather than work under those conditions. In my judgment, it would be better to have such an agreement abrogated than that the men should be bound by it after their arrival. That suggestion, however, would not meet the case, because if men are imported under contract, they might practically be paupers upon arrival. Landing in a new country without friends, prospects or advice, what would be the result if the contract were rendered void? In nearly every instance, unless some organization got hold of them, they would re-enact it on Australian territory and it would be as operative as if they had entered into an agreement outside. The men would never have an opportunity of learning the nature of the conditions of their employment before the alternative was presented to them either of starving or accepting the conditions under which they were imported. It does seem to me that the outcry which has been raised in regard to the case of the six hatters is somewhat farcical. In the first place, it was a press-created trouble. Most of the newspapers were naturally anxious to take advantage of anything which could be used as a lever against the labour party, and some of them, animated by a similar desire against a Government of which they do not approve, were only too ready to manufacture a boom of indignation against the treatment meted out to those hatters. This agitation was raised only by the press and a few politicians, who had every opportunity of voicing a protest in this House, and did not take advantage of that opportunity. The leader of the Opposition at Maitland got into a seething state of indignation at the treatment accorded to these Britishers, and said—"We require administration with discrimination." We have had in New South Wales a number of instances of discrimination in administration, and we found that the discrimination was in favour of the big people rather than in favour of the ordinary citizen, and I do not think too much discrimination is a good thing for the working of our administrative departments. Allowing, however, that we do require discrimination, the leader of the Opposition at Maitland went on to say that if he had been Prime Minister when the collector reported the detention of these men at Sydney, he would have immediately—mark the phrase—"flashed across the wires" an order to release them. Is that discrimination? Does discrimination involve inquiry, or does it not? Can there be discrimination if no inquiry is made, and there is no attempt to ascertain what the conditions are? That is administration without discrimination, and administration against the law. The case, it seems to me, was easy of solution.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Inquiry would cause too much delay.

Mr. FOWLER.—The hatters themselves did not apply to be released.

Mr. WATSON.—There should not have been the delay which did occur in dealing with the question ; but at whose door lies the responsibility for that delay ? It lies at the door of Mr. Anderson, the man who sought to import these men. It is quite possible that Mr. Anderson when he first made arrangements to bring these men from England was not aware what the provisions of the law were, but surely, when the question was raised, if he were anxious to have the men exempt, he should have looked up the law and made application at once. Instead of doing that, he allowed, I think, five or six days to elapse before he made any application to the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPENCE.—That was to allow time for the newspaper agitation.

Mr. WATSON.—We must recollect that something else is involved or was involved apparently in the attitude of Mr. Anderson, besides the mere desire to get these men admitted. That gentleman a few months previously had stated that rather than pay duty, he would send back to England the machinery he was then importing for his hat factory. I do not say that Mr. Anderson was not justified in being annoyed at having to pay 12½ or 15 per cent. duty on his machinery—that is a matter for him—but he was evidently so incensed against the Government for their administration generally that he took up the attitude that he would not be bothered, or would not humble himself to make application to the Prime Minister—that he would insist on these men being liberated without the law being complied with.

Mr. CONROY.—But we should not break down the independence of these men.

Mr. WATSON.—A man's independence is always subject to the law of the country, and the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, who is a prospective Judge of some court or another, ought to remember that fact. The law states that exemption has to be applied for, and under the circumstances I can conceive of no Minister refusing exemption if requested to do so. If the Government, having been asked for exemption, had refused to give it, they would have been worthy of blame at the hands of honorable members and the public. It was specially for instances of this kind that the amendment or addition to the section was made on the proposal of the Attorney-General. That proposal was that persons possessing special skill, and necessary in the Commonwealth, should be admitted ; and I, for one, have no quarrel with that position. However, as I have indicated, some gentlemen have attempted to work up an extraordinary amount of indignation over this matter, and amongst those the honorable member for Gippsland, who stated last evening that it was a desecration of the terms "free men" and "bondsmen" to apply them to the case of the six hatters. I do not know whether the honorable member thinks that a person is free, or has any liberty remaining in him, if he signs such an agreement as these men did with Mr. Anderson—an agreement binding them on the one side to serve Mr. Anderson for three years at what is admittedly a fair wage, but leaving the determination of the agreement at any moment to Mr. Anderson. That seems to me a most one-sided sort of agreement, when it can be terminated at a moment's notice after the arrival of the men.

Mr. CONROY.—But under the law there there must be reasonable notice given or cause shown.

Mr. WATSON.—The agreement specifically provided that Mr. Anderson might dismiss the men at any time, if they did not give him satisfaction ; and it is clear that they might cause him dissatisfaction at any moment. Even the fact that a man curled his lip up instead of down might not satisfy Mr. Anderson, and then the agreement could be made null and void. On the other hand, however, the men were bound for three years, or for as long as Mr. Anderson chose to keep them in that period, no matter what their own feelings might be. On this question the honorable member for Gippsland strikes me as having suddenly become a free-trader. He believes, as a protectionist, I understand, in shutting out the cheap goods of other countries, even though the goods may have been manufactured in the great motherland, unless a heavy duty is paid. But he does not believe, on the other hand, that there should be the slightest inquiry as to the conditions under which workmen from Great Britain are allowed to land here ; and that to me seems a most inconsistent attitude.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—If the honorable member knew anything of business, he would know that good skilled men cannot be brought here at low wages.

Mr. WATSON.—I know quite the contrary. What are high wages in England may be very low wages here, and I can instance the case of the men who were brought to the Joadja Creek, the Borehole, and the Catherine Hill Bay collieries, and some of whom went to gaol. These were skilled men, and they were brought out from England on terms which were much lower than those obtaining at the Australian collieries.

Mr. KINGSTON.—And the same was the case in the Peninsula of South Australia.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The very best skilled men, who can get plenty of work in England, will not come to Australia unless they are sure of getting work here.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so; but under what terms and conditions? The honorable member, it seems to me, misses the point. This is not merely a question of men coming here, but a question of the terms and conditions under which they come. We do not believe in men being brought here under any false impression as to the conditions obtaining, and it is impossible for them to get a proper idea in England. It is only in Australia that they can get all the information as to the cost of rent and food and the standard of comfort which is maintained here. It is most inconsistent for the honorable member for Gippsland to say that he will bar British goods, and yet raise an outcry because a few words of inquiry are addressed to a number of Britishers who desire to land here apparently in contravention of the law.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I never agreed, and I never shall agree, to debar reputable British subjects under contract or otherwise.

Mr. WATSON.—It is just as well to know where the honorable member is. I, of course, welcome every Britisher here, but if Britishers come under conditions likely to work to the disadvantage of Australia or of our own people, we should, at least, ask them to explain what the terms of their agreement are.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Would the honorable member call a man who came into this House, bound to a particular platform, a free man or a bondsman?

Mr. WATSON.—A free man, because he can retire exactly when it pleases him, whereas these hatters were not able to retire for a period of three years.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Except to gaol.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so; but that is an alternative to which even the honorable member for Gippsland would not care to consign them. I have no objection to men under contract being admitted if it is shown there is any necessity for them.

Mr. WINTER-COOKE.—But when they had been admitted under contract, they would still remain bondsmen under the agreement.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so; and I personally should prefer to see all agreements invalidated on the arrival of the men, even though the latter be admitted. But, in addition, we should have some guarantee that the men are of special skill, and are required in the Commonwealth before they are admitted under contract.

Mr. CONROY.—The State laws would prohibit the men being sent to gaol in New South Wales and in Victoria.

Mr. WATSON.—The law of New South Wales, if the honorable and learned member knows it as he should, is that all agreements are validated, even if made outside that State, and an attempt to repeal the Agreement Validating Act was unsuccessful.

Mr. CONROY.—But men cannot be sent to gaol under the circumstances.

Mr. WATSON.—But men were sent to gaol; that is like telling a man he cannot be hanged, and then stringing him up next morning. I am convinced that the good sense of the people of Australia has not been outraged so far as the six hatters are concerned. I believe, further, that if it could be conveyed to the people, free from that hysterical indignation which there has been an attempt to stir up, that the men were merely required to explain the conditions under which they were coming, and that when exemption was applied for, it was granted within three days, there would be doubt as to what the public feeling would be. I am quite willing to leave it to the electors to express their opinion on this matter. I believe that if an attempt is made to materially alter or to abrogate this provision in the Act, a number of honorable members will see that they have made considerable error as to the opinion of the people. Another matter I should like to refer to relates to the administration of the Military department. This House succeeded in substantially reducing the Military Estimates on two occasions, and it was distinctly understood, at least by me, that one result of the reduction would be the very material cutting down of the central staff and other expensive adjuncts of the military system. Yet we find, as set forth in a circular recently issued by the Minister for Defence, that the central staff of the General Officer Commanding has been retained at practically its original strength. The staff is still costing, I think, some £15,000 a year, and those who insisted on retrenchment in the military forces are being blamed for all the trouble that is occurring in connexion with the forces in New South Wales and other parts of Australia. Personally, I take no responsibility for the disposition of the money which was placed at the disposal of the Minister for Defence. He had under his charge a sum in excess of the amount available for defence a few years ago, when the departments were under State control, but he seems to have spent a very large part of it upon the almost useless features of a military force. While I am convinced it is not necessary to spend in the training of men more than, if as much as, the sum now allotted for that work, I believe that it is necessary to expend a very considerable amount in improving our defences. A great number of our forts have obsolete guns. We have comparatively few modern rifles, and no effort has been made, notwithstanding a half promise by the Government some time ago to establish an ammunition factory within the Commonwealth, though it has been stated in the press that a contract is about to be entered into with the Colonial Ammunition Company for the supply of some 12,000,000 rounds per annum.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That company has a contract which cannot be broken, and which extends over a number of years.

Mr. WATSON.—That contract only affects the Victorian supply of ammunition, and would not prevent the Government from establishing factories in other parts of the Commonwealth. I think that they should have already taken steps for the establishment of an ammunition and also of a small-arms factory. It is imperative for the adequate defence of Australia that we shall have arms to put into the hands of our people in the event of war occurring. We are training a large number of men more or less efficiently; but, if war came, most of them would have to be armed with obsolete rifles, and, although the Minister for Home Affairs has told us that a Martini-Henry rifle is a dangerous weapon if one comes within range of it, we cannot be sure that an enemy would do so before attacking with guns of a longer range. The Minister for Defence ought to be able to assure the House that he has prepared some scheme for providing the Commonwealth with an adequate supply of rifles, ammunition, and other munitions of war. I shall resist any proposal to give the Colonial Ammunition Company a larger order for ammunition than they now receive. Major-General Hutton, I understand, has recommended that factories for the supply of ammunition be established in different places throughout the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Mr. WATSON.—I obtained my information from the press. If such a recommendation has not been made, I think that something of the kind should be done. We should not rely upon one factory. I do not know if the Colonial Ammunition Company make the cartridges which they turn out, or only roll and fill them with material brought from abroad. If they do the latter, the existence of the factory does not make us independent of oversea supplies, and the people are being lulled into a false sense of security.

Mr. CROUCH.—The company make everything but the cordite which they use, and it is made under patent in Victoria.

Mr. WATSON.—Is the brass work done here?

Mr. CROUCH.—No.

Mr. WATSON.—We should have factories capable of making everything necessary for ammunition, and we should supply them with sufficient work to keep the employees efficient. With regard to the proposal to increase the naval subsidy to the Imperial Government, I think we are bound to consider how far it is practicable for us to provide a sufficient sea defence for Australia at the present time. I am inclined to take the view that, even if we increase our subsidy to the Imperial navy, we shall not thereby obtain any adequate defence for our coast line. Could one squadron be reasonably certain of intercepting every hostile fleet that might descend upon our shores? Only recently, during the English navy manœuvres, the attacking fleet, operating in the narrow confines of the English Channel, got through the defending fleet, and entered port unobserved. If such a thing is possible in the English Channel, how much more likely is it to occur in the broad waters which surround Australia? It seems to me that we cannot rely upon any one fleet, whether locally-owned or under the control of the British Admiralty, to safeguard us from sudden piratical attacks by a foreign navy. To make our position sure, we should have to provide for naval defence upon a scale which our financial condition is not likely to warrant for some years to come, and it is worse than useless to depend upon an inadequate defence. That being so, I think our better plan is, first, to insure that we have a sufficient, efficient, and properly-armed land force, and, secondly, that our ports and exposed positions are defended by position guns, and by other means of defence such as modern science is continually inventing. It may not be a completely demonstrated fact, but it seems nearly certain that submarine vessels provide a port defence which is superior to the older methods. In conjunction with them we might, if necessary, utilize gunboats of light tonnage but of a fairly heavy armament. It would be hopeless to expect one squadron to efficiently protect 8,000 miles of coast line.

Mr. HUGHES.—I apprehend that the squadron would have to defend only the capital cities of Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—I believe that that could be better done by preparations such as I have just referred to. I do not pretend to be an expert in these matters, but my remarks are based upon what I have learned and read of the opinions of those who profess to have knowledge.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What about the protection of our sea-going commerce?

Mr. WATSON.—If we could protect it, well and good, but I do not see how that is to be managed. Supposing the Australian squadron contained six or eight vessels, they could not be separated without weakening the fleet so materially that one portion or other of it would be liable to annihilation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They would give a good account of themselves to the attacking vessels when they met them.

Mr. WATSON.—No doubt they would hold their own; but to guard the whole coast line the ships would have to be separated, and separately they could do nothing against an opposing fleet. If they were not separated, and I do not think they should be, I fail to see how they could adequately protect our shores. That being so, I do not think it worth our while to sacrifice other means of coastal defence to inadequately protect our sea-going commerce.

Mr. CONROY.—The expense would be greater than it was worth.

Mr. WATSON.—I believe so. I believe that we can more cheaply defend our ports, coaling stations, and exposed positions by land defences, with the assistance of torpedo boats or similar vessels, than by a squadron of our own, or provided by the Imperial navy. We cannot expect Australia to have much money available for the purposes of defence for a long while to come. For many years we shall be constrained by circumstances to contribute more, proportionately, to the other expenses of government than many other communities do, because of the greatness of our territory and the sparseness of our population. That being so, we should adopt those means of defence which are most likely to prove effective for the money spent upon them. I see no immediate prospect of the formation of an Australian navy. I believe that we can get Australian seamen to work for the protection of our ports against hostile attack; but I do not think that an efficient naval defence for Australia is practicable. Therefore, I feel under no obligation to vote for the proposal to increase the contribution to the support of the Imperial navy. It is our business to provide as well as we can for our own defence, and if we do that we shall have done our duty to the Empire. If we relieve those in power at home from anxiety as to our position in time of trouble, we shall do all that can reasonably be expected from a small community settled in an immense territory. I think, therefore, that we should expend what money we have to spend for purposes of defence in efficiently protecting our ports and other exposed positions. There is another feature of the proposal to which I object. It seems extraordinary that, although we are asked to increase our contribution to the Imperial navy, the squadron is to be liable to be called away from Australian waters, so as to leave us without any protection for our sea-going commerce.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would not be worse than what the honorable member is suggesting.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, it would, because every pound we give as a contribution towards the Imperial navy will have to be deducted from the amount available for safeguarding our own ports.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But we should have no communication with the outer world.

Mr. WATSON.—In any case we should probably be deprived of that. If we were to bring into existence a navy such as the United States possesses, which, although it is not as large as some European fleets, is a very efficient one, we should accomplish a great deal. This might not be sufficient to adequately protect our ocean-going commerce, but I do not think any navy could do that to the fullest degree.

Sir JOHN FORRESTER.—We should have the whole British navy to protect our commerce.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; but at a considerable distance. I trust that we shall have that in any case, even if we do not subscribe towards its maintenance. If we take our share of the responsibility in the defence of the Empire by providing for the safety of this portion of it, we shall still have the protection of the British navy for our commerce in other parts of the world, if not in these waters. The objection I have raised seems to me to be a grave one, and I do not see how the provision for taking the fleet away from Australian waters can be held to be of any value in connexion with the defence of Australia. Amongst other matters to which I desire to refer is the question of the High Court. During the discussion as to the desirability of adopting the Constitution Bill, I adopted the view that we should have a Federal High Court, or that we should have an Australian Judiciary to interpret Australian laws. With all respect to the members of the Privy Council, I have always held that we should be able to interpret our own laws, and better understand their spirit than any outside tribunal. During last session I shared the desire, manifested by many other honorable members, to economize as much as possible, and I hesitated to vote for the immediate passing of the Judiciary Bill, with a view to ascertain whether it would not be possible to find some less expensive way out of the difficulty. I thought it possible that we might appoint Australian Judges, not specially detailed and paid for the work, to the High Court, but on consideration I do not see that we could rely upon that method for the establishment of an Australian judiciary. I feel that even if we appointed the Chief Justices of the various States to constitute a High Court we should have to recognise the fact that they would still be responsible to the States and not to the Federal authorities.

Mr. CONROY.—They are not responsible to the States authorities, they are irremovable.

Mr. WATSON.—Their positions would still depend on the good-will of the States Parliaments.

Mr. HIGGINS.—They are absolutely independent of the States Parliaments, and cannot be removed except for misconduct.

Mr. WATSON.—However that may be, I trust that the Federal Parliament will retain control over the Judges appointed to any court that may be established. We should have the power to dismiss the Judges for misconduct. I do not pretend that the Federal Government or Parliament should have the right to revise their decisions. But we should at least have a greater degree of control over Judges appointed by us, than over Judges who were responsible only to the State authorities. Further, I think that if the Chief Justices of the States were appointed to act as Judges of the High Court, they would be liable to be influenced—I do not say corruptly—by the fact that they were still the officials of any particular State that might be interested in a dispute before the court. I think that might occur with regard to a number of questions that are likely to be submitted to the Court. It has been urged that we shall have very little business to submit to such a tribunal. But I judge that, although the number of cases may not be great, some of them will be of extreme importance. For instance, there is the question of the interpretation of the section of the Constitution which affects the using of river waters. This point has already been dealt with by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and in all probability it will have to come before some court before the question is finally settled.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—When?

Mr. WATSON.—The sooner it is brought before a competent tribunal and settled, the better it will be for the people of Australia, and the less will be the risk of friction.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No difficulty can arise for the next five years.

Mr. WATSON.—Judging from the attitude of some State legislators in New South Wales, it is not at all certain that the agreement recently entered into with regard to the river waters will be ratified.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If it is not, what is likely to happen?

Mr. WATSON.—The trouble will then be revived in a more acute form than a few months ago, and certainly all the circumstances point to the desirability of effecting a settlement. I think it is likely that some difficulty will arise in connexion with the contemplated legislation for the settlement of industrial disputes affecting two or more States. It will be necessary to ask some tribunal to decide how far Parliament will be justified in going, and to give its ruling as to what would really constitute a dispute affecting two or more States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That can be settled by the Privy Council.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think it is right to have recourse to the Privy Council in regard to matters arising out of our Constitution.

Mr. CONROY. — The Privy Council is less likely than an Australian court to be biased.

Mr. WATSON. — I do not know as to that, but I have a firm conviction that the Australian court is more likely to be well informed. I do not think that any special bias is likely to occur among members of the High Court.

Mr. McCAY. — Why does the honorable member fear that it will exist in the minds of the Judges of the State courts?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not wish to imply any doubt as to the bona fides of the State Judges. I believe that we have excellent Judges in all the States, but I cannot help thinking that a State Judge sitting in the High Court would be unconsciously biased even from the fact that he was a State Judge.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The same people will be affected in either case.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that; but I claim that we are more likely to find Judges actuated by a federal spirit, if we create a purely federal tribunal, than if we rely upon a makeshift court composed of State Judges. Perhaps my point may be illustrated by the attitude which the members of the States Governments take towards the Federal Government. These gentlemen are actuated by the very highest motives, but they are influenced by the mere fact that they are State officials, and feel it incumbent upon them to urge the State as against the federal aspect of affairs at every opportunity. I do not say that this reflects discredit upon them, but simply point out the spirit by which they are actuated.

Mr. McCAY.—The Judges of the High Court must be chosen from the various States.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; but the fact that they are chosen to form a part of the federal machinery will influence them to take a federal view.

Mr. CONROY.—Has the honorable member any idea of the number of cases with which the High Court will probably be called upon to deal?

Mr. WATSON.—No. I have already mentioned one or two matters, and doubtless there are many others which will arise as time goes on, and fresh legislation is passed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the meantime, then, we are to keep the court waiting for some business to come along.

Mr. WATSON.—The High Court will not have to wait very long for something to do, if one may judge from the number of questions which have arisen in connexion with customs and other matters up to the present. However, I am prepared to support the High Court proposal, notwithstanding that it will involve the outlay of a fair sum of money. I do not consider it wise at this stage to enter into details as to the number of Judges to be appointed and the salaries to be paid. I am inclined to be as economical as possible consistently with the efficient discharge of the work. There is another matter which I hope the Government will be able to push through, namely, the measure which they propose to bring forward dealing with compulsory arbitration. I think that recent occurrences have made clear the urgent necessity for passing a law which will prevent the recurrence of disastrous strikes. I have always favoured the system of arbitration as against strike methods. While it is true that trade unionists may have to give up some portion of their liberty under a compulsory Arbitration Act, the experience gained in New Zealand and New South Wales has convinced me that that loss of liberty was a small thing compared to the greater security enjoyed by the men and the great benefits conferred upon the community as a whole. At present there is a great deal of friction—and this is a matter that will probably have to come before the High Court—amongst business men in Sydney, because they are compelled to pay certain wages to women workers, whilst Brisbane manufacturers, who compete with them, are allowed to employ females at sweating rates.

Mr. MAUGER.—The same contrast exists between the Melbourne jam manufacturers, who have to pay fixed wages, and the Tasmanian jam manufacturers, who are free to do what they please.

Mr. WATSON.—Just so. There is no doubt pressing necessity for a measure which will tend to equalize the conditions of work throughout the Commonwealth, due regard, of course, being paid to climatic and other varying conditions. Concerning courts of conciliation, as an addendum or preliminary to the court of arbitration, I may say that the unionists in New Zealand, to whom I spoke in reference to their working, seemed to be satisfied that they were doing good. They said that in quite a number of instances the issues had been narrowed down by the courts of conciliation. Those tribunals did not in all cases settle the trouble, but the issues were narrowed down so as to minimize the amount of work which had eventually to be done by the court of arbitration. When we consider that in Australia any court of arbitration would have to embrace the entire Commonwealth in its operation, it will be seen that anything that will tend to minimize the issues that come before that court is a step in the right direction. It is necessary, I think, to have one court only as a supreme head, otherwise we shall have varying decisions under similar circumstances in different parts of the Commonwealth. We want something in the nature of uniformity in laws such as these, and therefore I feel there may be a reason for courts of conciliation in this connexion that does not exist to the same extent in any single State. I trust that the Government will see the necessity of pushing this matter forward, because I assure them that the whole question of the equal competition of people in the various States under a common tariff will never otherwise be satisfactorily settled. It is possible that the High Court may rule that we have not power to deal with cases such as those I have mentioned, but I believe that even under a reasonable construction of the Constitution we have that power, because it must be manifest that if the wages paid to the women workers, of whom I spoke, in Brisbane are so low as to constitute sweating, that fact must affect the wages paid in Sydney, Melbourne, and every other town in the Commonwealth.

Mr. MAUGER.—In Brisbane they pay them 50 per cent. less.

Mr. WATSON.—I know that they pay them considerably less. I do trust that the Government will push this matter forward. It is desirable that the lack of method in the conduct of public business which was displayed last session shall not be exhibited this session. I hope that we shall take up one Bill and dispose of it, instead of discussing several measures, dropping them, and again taking up their consideration at a later stage. It must be remembered that although we transacted a large amount of business last session, the period occupied in accomplishing it was extremely long, and I believe that we could have economized time to some extent if measures had been proceeded with consecutively. However, that is a matter for the Government themselves to arrange, and I refer to it only because I believe that this session we should endeavour to curtail as much as possible the time occupied in considering the various subjects which will come before us with a view to accomplishing a maximum amount of work. There are many other matters in the Governor-General's speech to which I should like to refer, but I fear that I have already broken my promise to make my observations shorter than usual. However, later on I will take an opportunity of referring to some of the Government proposals when they are actually before us. The programme which they have put forward contains many more matters than we are likely to deal with this session. Still I am in accord with them in their desire to pass a number of these important measures with the utmost expedition consistent with giving them fair consideration in the interests of the community.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I think that the advice of the honorable member who has just resumed his seat is upon the whole very sound, and doubtless the Government, seeing the quarter from which it comes, will pay attention to it. I trust that they will endeavour to curtail the programme which they have put before the House with a view to the enactment of certain necessary legislation, so that honorable members may go to the country. I am sure that we are all anxious to get to our constituents, and I fear that the beautiful programme put before the House is saddened and tintured by the recollection that there is hanging over us a veritable sword of Damocles in the shape of a dissolution. It may be that we shall survive the feeling until one or two of these imperative measures have been placed upon the statute-book, and that we shall then be able to go to the country and fight out the fiscal question, for however much the honorable member for Gippsland may desire that it should be allowed to rest, and however much the Prime Minister may denounce its re-opening as an outrage upon the people of Australia, it is already inevitable that it must be re-opened. The sooner, therefore, that we set about deciding it the better. In the meantime the Government have put before the country this manifesto in the shape of the Governor-General's speech. There is no doubt that they had their eye upon the country whilst they were concocting it. I have seen the speeches of some Governors at the opening of the States' Parliaments which were long enough in all conscience, but for length, to say nothing of its supreme importance, this speech "takes the cake." I cannot believe that the Government ever seriously entertained the opinion that they would accomplish a tithe of the work included in this programme. But, of course, they were shrewd enough to omit nothing lest some recalcitrant member of the House—and particularly one of their own supporters—might rise and say something unpleasant. Honorable members have already seen this Government in the most complaisant moods, and we know that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty to induce them to make up their minds concerning either their legislation or their administration. They postpone matters until they cannot do so a moment longer. That is a charge which applies to their administration even more than to their legislation. I will deal with their administration first. Take the case of the federal electorates—a matter of supreme importance, not only to the country, but to every honorable member of the House. We are now told that the electoral rolls for Victoria cannot be completed before the middle of July. I submit that this delay will take us right up to a point at which discussion, fair survey, and revision, will become impossible, to say nothing of the impossibility of honorable members becoming thoroughly acquainted with the new electorates as they may be arranged. I can speak all the more freely upon this matter, because the draft of these electorates does not affect my position so much. But I submit that this matter should have been dealt with long ere this. The Minister for Home Affairs has been guilty of culpable negligence in having delayed it. Why could not these commissioners have been at work months ago? What has been the hindrance? Only at the very last moment has the Minister appointed them. Thus it comes about that a matter which is of more immediate importance than any other has been left until the last moment to determine. Some honorable members remember their experience with the Minister in connexion with the mapping out of the existing federal electorates in New South Wales. He brought a plan of those electorates down to the State House only at the last moment, when there was no time to discuss it. He will probably adopt a similar course here, if he is not prevented from so doing. There are many honorable members to whom this is a very serious matter. The South Australian and Tasmanian representatives, for example, have to make the acquaintance of entirely new electorates, and it is only fair to them that this question should be speedily settled. There is another matter to which I should like to refer, namely, the payment for the transferred properties. When will that matter be disposed of?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—When the States are good enough to send in their claims.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I think that some pressure should be brought to bear upon the States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We have made all possible endeavours to get the accounts from them, and have failed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Federation has already been in existence for two years, and yet no settlement has been arrived at, or payment made in connexion with £10,000,000 worth of transferred property. Meantime, this matter is vitiating the accounts of the departments concerned. For example, no interest has been debited to the Postal department. Last year that department showed a loss of £80,000, whereas if the interest were added it would show a debit balance of £250,000. I am satisfied that that debit will increase if the present administration be continued. There is another question to which I desire to direct attention, namely, that of the selection of the federal capital site. At the last moment of the last session we were promised that the report of the commission appointed to deal with this matter would be available by the beginning of April. Indeed, the Minister for Home Affairs told honorable members that he would give specific directions to that commission to make every possible use of Mr. Oliver's report, with a view to obviating useless peregrinations throughout the country. Instead of doing that we find them going over every item that has already been dealt with by Mr. Oliver; and when they have done their best their report will not be anything like so useful as the report of that gentleman. In this way the Commission are wasting time and delaying the settlement of a very important question. The Minister for Home Affairs ought to insist promptly on the report being presented at the earliest possible moment, and the sooner Parliament decides the question the better it will be for all concerned. As to administration we were told by the Prime Minister that one reason why the Postal department was taken over early was that the Minister in charge might study its requirements with a view to legislation. If that be so the Postmaster-General made a very rapid study, for almost as soon as the department was taken over the Bill was drafted, and not very long afterwards it was submitted to the House. If the object was patient investigation of the requirements of the whole of the Australian postal service, the Postmaster-General must be a very marvellous man if he did what the Prime Minister alleges. But the Postmaster-General's handiwork is already beginning to show that he cannot have made any such patient investigation. The regulations which are placed on the table from time to time become more irksome as they multiply, and something will have to be done very rapidly to stop their issue if the department is to be carried on with anything like proper efficiency. The Prime Minister, in defending his colleague the other day at Sydney, said the Government were gradually and satisfactorily assimilating the postal services of the various States; but I am afraid that what he said did more credit to his loyalty than to his knowledge of the administration. I would like to call the attention of members to that brilliant regulation which provides that when the post-office loses a letter 2½d. must be paid as a deposit before any inquiry or endeavour is made to find it. What reason there can be for an absurd regulation of that kind I cannot imagine. If the deposit were intended to cover the cost of investigation there might be some reason for the regulation; but as a matter of fact 2½d. would not even meet the expense of the departmental correspondence about a lost letter. That regulation, which was issued recently, has been in operation in Queensland for some time, and it should be known that the postal services of the other States are being harmonized with the same kind of administration that has always been current in the northern State. But we do not appreciate that sort of administration. The deposit may be a small matter in itself, but honorable members can easily realize how irritating it must be to people in the country. It is true that if it is found the loss of the letter is the fault of the Post-office, the deposit is returned; but, all the same, this is a twopenny halfpenny regulation, and the sooner it is abolished the better. There is another regulation, the working of which I can perhaps best illustrate by citing a concrete case which occurred a few weeks ago. Under the Commonwealth, State Government departments must pay all postage on their correspondence carried by the Federal Post-office; and that provision is right enough.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Federal departments also pay for their postage.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the Post-office has made a regulation which makes all State departmental papers chargeable as letters, and the other day the officials of the department of Justice of New South Wales, when they desired to send a packet of documents to another part of the State, were asked to pay 10s. postage. Why, the Minister for Trade and Customs is "not in it" with the Post-office where collecting money is concerned. The officials of the department of Justice met the difficulty by taking the parcel to the railway station, and sending it by train to its destination at a cost of 3d. Surely, that is not the way to make the Postal department pay, displaying as it does a sort of wooden-headed administration. It may be said that the regulation is there and must be enforced, but such a regulation ought to be abolished as quickly as possible. The main point is that the Postmaster-General instead of getting more money, as he desires, for the work he does, is actually getting less, because the people use other means than the post-office for forwarding their communications. There seems a general desire in the Postal department to suppress business, or drive it away, instead of attracting it, although if there is a department which more than another is a business department, it is that of the post-office. This is the department in which, more than in any other, ordinary business methods ought to be applied; and yet, what do we see in connexion with the telephone? All telephonic extension in the country districts is stopped by a ridiculous regulation of the Postmaster-General, which requires any person who wants a telephone fixed to pay in cash three-quarters of the cost of construction, and an amount sufficient to cover five years' expenses. No man in his senses would plank his cash down in such a way.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—What is asked for is a guarantee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The department requires the actual cash to be placed in the bank. There used to be a guarantee, but because we lost a little money, owing to the expansion of an immense business—because as in an ordinary business, we made a few bad debts—the Postmaster-General has by this regulation stopped all further expansion. It is true that now the Postmaster-General will have no more bad debts, but at the same time, he will get no more new business. The other day the honorable member for Canobolas desired to get telephone communication with one part of his constituency. The honorable member already had communication with another part of his district, and for that had given a guarantee for £30. In regard to the new application the Postmaster-General said that it could not be granted unless under the regulation £680 in cash were paid into the bank. I have an exactly similar case in my own electorate.

Mr. SPENCE.—I have several cases.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the case in my electorate the total cost of providing telephonic communication between a number of fruit-growers with their market at Parramatta is £90, and although the post-office officials say that the wire will yield a revenue of £8 to £9 a year, or 10 per cent., the Postmaster-General insists on £60 or £70 being paid down in cash before the work is done. That is not the sort of administration which will enable the post-office to liquidate a deficit, and the Prime Minister had better consider a little before he defends the Postmaster-General. If the postal services are being harmonized it is in such a way as to make the administration more irksome to the great body of the people in the interior of the Commonwealth. I should like to make some reference to the Pacific cable question, which is mentioned in His Excellency's speech. The position is, as I understand it, that the Pacific cable is losing £90,000 a year.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is the estimate; the exact figures have not yet been ascertained.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Australia's share of that loss is a little over £30,000.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I think that that loss will be equally chargeable to the three States of New South Wales, Victoria and Queensland. Under the bookkeeping clause, one-third will go back as a debit to each of the three contracting States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If that is the old agreement, the Government will surely not perpetuate a similar state of things in the new arrangement.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The position arises out of the requirements of the Constitution. During the bookkeeping period the Commonwealth takes over the obligations of each State in respect of any transferred department, and this is a continuance or maintenance of an agreement entered into as affecting the three States mentioned.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I understand that on the Pacific cable there is a loss of £90,000, of which £30,000 is shared by New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland, while South Australia and Western Australia do not bear any share?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The first three States mentioned are the largest partners.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the meantime South Australia and Western Australia are sharing in whatever advantages there may be arising from the Eastern Extension Company's operations. What I complain of is that while the Eastern Extension Company have been given privileges which enable them to turn round and compete as they are doing with the Pacific cable, and threaten the very existence of the latter from the financial point of view, some of the States reap all the benefits and allow other States to bear the loss. In my opinion, the deficit on the Pacific cable could be wiped out with good management. The Eastern Extension Company advertises largely, and is now doing so even on the railway stations. That is only what any business firm would do in an endeavour to induce business ; but one never sees or hears a word, so far as I know, about the Pacific cable—nobody takes any responsibility in regard to the latter, while, so far as I can see, the Postmaster-General stands feebly by.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The whole management is in the hands of the Pacific Cable Board. We have represented to them the necessity for business management, and if they will empower us to hire canvassers in their interests we will do so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—A very great wrong was done when we gave the Eastern Extension Company the special privileges they now enjoy. I quite approve of the new arrangement made by the Prime Minister in taking prompt steps to limit the term of the agreement with that company ; and I cannot help thinking that the step taken is an implied censure on his colleague who, when Premier of New South Wales, entered into the present absurd agreement, and signed an interminable contract with the company. I protested as strongly as I could against it at the time in the press, but without avail. In this respect Victoria set a better example to the rest of Australia than New South Wales did. Honorable members should recollect what the position was. We tried, when the old subsidy expired, to obtain from the company a reduction of rates, but they would give us nothing. They said—"Before we lay down another cable we want a subsidy for a further term of twenty years, and the old rates must continue for that period." We could not obtain any reduction or concessions from the company, and negotiations were broken off. But immediately Mr. Chamberlain gave his sanction to the Pacific cable proposal, the Eastern Extension Cable Company rushed in, and said—"We will give you almost anything you want if you will give us in return the advantages we ask for." New South Wales had no right to treat with the company, except with the concurrence of the United Kingdom and of Canada ; but the Minister for Home Affairs took the bait held out by the company, accepted reduced rates for a short year, and gave them an opportunity to fight the Pacific cable proposal, and menace its very existence. Sir George Turner was faced with the same temptation as confronted the Minister for Home Affairs, but, to his credit be it said, he refused to yield to it. If New South Wales had acted as Victoria did, the Pacific cable would have been placed upon a paying basis from the start, and the cable rates would have been the same as they are to-day.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member admits that the Commonwealth was bound by the arrangement entered into by New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not complaining of anything the Prime Minister has done in this matter ; I am complaining of what was done by his colleague when Premier of New South Wales, which the right honorable gentleman has promptly set himself to undo. I have not much to say in addition about the administration of the Minister for Trade and Customs, though I wonder that he has so suddenly become dumb. During his peregrinations throughout the Commonwealth, he challenged all and sundry. He beat his breast like the Pharisee of old, and told the people of Australia that he was not like other Customs Ministers. He was doing things that should have been done long ago under State administration.

Mr. PAGE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—By that statement the Minister suggested that other Customs Ministers had winked at evasions of the law and connived at improper practices, and that no other Minister had had the pluck to do his duty.

Mr. PAGE.—He was quite right, too. There is no back-stair influence with him.

Mr. MAUGER.—There may have been a lot of bad business going on in the past.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member cannot be sure that bad practices will not continue under the present régime. If merchants find that the department pounces upon them on every conceivable excuse, and that they are forced into the court whatever they do, they will try to circumvent the Minister. In my opinion, the honorable gentleman is not reckoning in his boasting with human nature. It remains to be seen if we have in the Minister a heaven-sent administrator than whom no one could be better. He has undoubtedly exercised a great deal of vigour in the discharge of the duties pertaining to his office, but it is too soon yet to say that he has proved better than all the other Customs administrators who have preceded him. I have every admiration for a Minister who will hunt out fraud and prevent negligence, but there is a reasonable way of administering the Customs Act, just as there is a reasonable way of administering other Acts. If the conspiracy laws were administered as the Minister administers the Customs Act, nearly every man in Australia would be sent to gaol, because whenever two or three persons met together at a street corner they could be indicted for conspiracy. Or what would happen if the law relating to trespass were administered with the same strictness? If one set himself to inflict every penalty possible under the law, and to diligently hunt for victims, they could be found in abundance. The Minister should exercise a little discrimination sometimes, particularly since the minimum penalty provided in the Act for any offence is £5.

Mr. CONROY.—And having regard to the fact that the Act does not allow justice to be done by the courts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister might very well refuse to set the law in motion where cases of error alone are concerned. We should then have less of the friction which has occurred during his administration. He tells us, however, that he makes no distinctions, and that that is a proof of his fairness. The Prime Minister told us that he was as ready to prosecute a man like Senator Reid as a poor man who was bringing in a Bible to give to some one else.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did not mention Senator's Reid's name.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, but he is the typical big man whom we all have in our minds just now. I have nothing to say against the Minister for prosecuting in cases where fraud or gross negligence can be proven; but where a little investigation will show that only an error has been committed, the case should not be taken into court. The Minister himself is not clear as to the meaning of the Tariff in every case. He is feeling his way, and interpreting its provisions from day to day. That being so, we should not haul to the police court people who are groping in the dark just as he is. One is tempted to say something about the administration of the Minister for Defence, but, instead of doing so, I shall wait to hear the details of his proposed reforms. He has, however, begun to retrench at the wrong end in cutting off the allowance to the bands of the mounted regiments.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That has not been done. The allowance has only been reduced.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that the Minister will restore the full allowance.

Mr. McCAY.—What was the original allowance?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—About £225 per band.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I reduced it to £150.

Mr. McCAY.—It might very well be cut down by a large amount. I keep a band of 30 upon an allowance of £50 a year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it a mounted band?

Mr. McCAY.—No, but that does not make much difference.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, it does, because of the up-keep of the horses. The mounted regiments ramify throughout New South Wales, and by the time the band horses are provided for, the bands are at least £50 worse off than the band which the honorable and learned member for Corinella provides. Coming to the proposal to establish a High Court, I wish to hear the Minister justify it. No doubt a tribunal for the final determination of causes is necessary, but the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has told us deliberately that the machinery of the proposed court, and the salaries to be paid to its officials, will cost about £50,000 a year. That seems too large a sum to expend at this stage of our history. These questions of high policy, such as have been suggested by the honorable member for Bland, will, no doubt, come up for the consideration by the High Court; but the time for that has not yet arrived, and the High Court will be created soon enough when its work becomes quite apparent. We may not have to deal with the question of riparian rights for five or six years, nor need we trouble our heads about matters arising out of the proposed Arbitration Bill, because the Arbitration Court may not have to give a decision for some considerable time to come. The establishment of an Arbitration Court, such as has been suggested, should be proceeded with, and we could surely make some simple arrangement for settling any questions which may arise until a Court of the proposed costly character is needed. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has drawn a parallel between the United States Supreme Court and that which it is proposed to establish here, but there is no comparison between American requirements and our own. Our functions are not so extensive as those of the American federation, nor are they so large as those reposed in the Canadian Federal Government. In view of the small powers invested in us, there should be very little work for a High Court to do, and we may very well save the expense connected with the establishment of such a tribunal for many years to come. Nearly all the questions that call for immediate decision relate purely to trade and commerce, and I cannot understand why it should not be possible to refer these points to a more simple tribunal. I am in entire agreement with the Government in regard to the increased naval vote. I think that a very reasonable arrangement has been made by the Prime Minister so far as the amount of the subsidy is concerned. The question as to whether the conditions for the control of the squadron are equally good is arguable, but the amount proposed to be contributed is very moderate indeed. In this connexion, I cannot help being reminded of a speech by Lord Selborne, which was recently quoted by Mr. John Morley, in England. Lord Selborne said—

It so happens, that more of the money provided by the taxpayer of the United Kingdom is spent in the British dominions beyond the seas than the British dominions beyond the seas contribute to the maintenance of the British navy.

I think that this is a point which should appeal to us very strongly. It is important that our commerce should be policed upon the high seas, and that England should look after it for us. England could get along very well if all our commerce were swept from the seas, but it would be a very different matter for us, and therefore we should shoulder a fair share of the responsibility involved in protecting our oversea traffic.

Mr. CONROY.—Supposing we are dragged into wars which are none of our making?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The rude arbitrament of war would expose us to exactly the same disadvantages as if we had a squadron of our own. If the necessities of Empire required the removal of the Australian squadron from our coasts, no arrangement made with the Imperial authorities would enable us to retain it. Moreover, even if we had a squadron of our own, and the Empire were in danger, I am sure that the honorable and learned member for Werriwa would not decline to send it wherever the necessities of the mother country might require.

Mr. CONROY.—No ; I would not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Therefore the question of sending our squadron away in case of a great Empire war is not of very great importance. The provision in the agreement for control over the squadron by the Imperial authorities simply asserts a technical right, which places us at no greater disadvantage in case of a great war than if we had a navy of our own. At the same time, I am in favour of paving the way for the establishment of an Australian navy, and I see the beginning of this movement in the provision which is made in the agreement for the training of 1,600 Australians and New Zealanders in connexion with the squadron. That alone is worth the extra £94,000 which we are to pay towards the maintenance of the squadron. We shall get the full value for our money in the training which will be imparted to our men.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I anticipate that £40,000 of the extra £94,000 will come back to us in the form of pay to the seamen and reservists when the new arrangement is in full operation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, but apart from mere bargaining, the growing requirements of our commerce on the high seas call for an increased contribution from us. Moreover, I see in this arrangement the establishment of some kind of balance between our naval and military expenditure. Our military Estimates now amount, roughly speaking, to about £550,000, and we are told by the Imperial authorities that the cost of maintaining the Australian squadron will be about £520,000.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The amount will be £519,000, including an allowance of 5 per cent. towards interest and sinking fund.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Thus the expenditure upon our naval defence will be upon a footing somewhat similar to that of our military outlay, and we shall be to some extent reproducing the balance between the forces now existing in the old country. We are an island continent, with a long coastline to defend, and we are on sound lines when we are trying to maintain some balance between our military and naval expenditure. Beyond the reasons I have stated, we have the appeal—the urgent appeal—from the old country for an increase of our contribution towards the maintenance of the squadron. This weighs with me more than anything else. The taxpayers of Great Britain find that the burden of Empire is pressing heavily upon them, and, in view of the fact that we share the benefits with them, it is only reasonable that we should make a larger contribution than that hitherto provided for. I do not know what will be the issue in Britain; but Mr. John Morley points out—

Mr. CROUCH.—He does not believe in our paying a subsidy.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is beside the question. There is almost a pathetic irony in the words which I am about to read. After quoting Lord Selborne, he remarks—

Therefore, the taxpayer of the United Kingdom has the privilege, not only of taking on himself the lion's share of the burden, the interest in which is shared between himself and his fellow subjects in our dominions beyond the seas, but also and not less a share of the burdens in respect of interests not his own, but exclusively those of his fellow subjects beyond the seas.

There is almost a pathetic ring in these words, and from Mr. John Morley's point of view there is immense force in them. He goes on to say—and here he bears out the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Corio—that he is opposed to subsidies. He says—

Pray do not think that I am making any ill-natured or carping point of this. Only do let us face the facts as they are. They talk of the expansion of England, and it is a very fine idea, a very fine phrase, a very fine thing. Only do please understand that the expansion of territorial England does not mean the expansion of the contributory area from which the taxation is to come. Now that is all I have got to say upon this main and central point. You will have to bear the burden. As I said, I do not want to carp. I have always thought that the colonies, from their social, economic, and political conditions, could not be looked to by a rational and provident statesman for a serious contribution to the share in our national burdens.

But Mr. Morley is logical. He says—"I do not want these burdens of Empire." He is against increasing them in any way. But we are in a position quite different from that occupied by him. We believe in the maintenance of the Imperial connexion, and in the maintenance and development to the utmost possible extent of every scrap of the Empire.

Mr. WATSON.—So does Mr. Morley, probably; but he does not believe in undue expansion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No. The honorable member is wrong. Mr. Morley would not undertake a war to obtain another bit of Empire.

Mr. WATSON.—No; but he might fight to retain what we have got.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not quite sure even of that.

Mr. CROUCH.—Was he not speaking as a logical free-trader?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Empire is not governed by chop-logic. In the course of the same speech, Mr. Morley pointed out, almost in a tone of reproach, that whilst the colonies were prepared to share the military burden of the Empire, they declined point blank to bear any part of the financial burden. In view of the tremendous armaments of the mother country, which are weighing down the nation, because the taxation for the army and navy amounts to 29s. per head of the population of the United Kingdom, we should offer an increased subsidy, not in any spirit of bargaining, but as a free and generous contribution to the burdens of the Empire. Now I come to the question of preferential trade. I see that the Governor-General's advisers observe with gratification the recent utterances of the Colonial Secretary with reference to this subject. I see no cause whatever for gratification in that utterance. On the contrary, I see nothing in it but an astute electioneering dodge. Mr. Chamberlain returned from South Africa to find that a rot had set in amongst his party, and, as the most powerful and popular member of that party, he at once set himself to stem the tide which seemed to be bearing them on to evil days. That is all the importance that we need attach to this tremendously great speech by Mr. Chamberlain, which has resounded from one end of the Empire to the other. That is all that it means, and honorable members may rest satisfied that we shall hear no more about preferential trade. It will be disposed of in connexion with the amendment which has been submitted by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in the House of Commons. I think that amendment is an inconclusive one that will not settle the matter in the way that it ought to be settled. While it seems the height of presumption on my part to criticise the tactics which are being employed when I am 12,000 miles distant from the scene, the brief cable published in regard to the matter evidences to my mind a very inconclusive and untactful way of testing it. However that may be, this is no new idea on the part of Mr. Chamberlain. It is an old idea which is trotted out periodically. Mr. Huskisson suggested the same idea quite 100 years ago. Later on there was a revival of the old fair-trade controversy, which produced Thomas Farrer's book between 1850 and 1860. But the question never gets beyond the academic stage. The moment it is introduced into Parliament, a blast of the people's common sense is blown upon it and it is heard of no more. We may rest assured that the people of Great Britain will give the quietus to this latest proposal of Mr. Chamberlain, just as they have done to chimerical schemes before. To my mind the moment that Great Britain attempts to make a close trading corporation, that moment it will begin to disintegrate and its decay will set in. In view of the insular position of England, her difficult and bare natural resources, her increasing difficulties in competing with the more favoured parts of the world, I cannot conceive of her people consenting to a scheme which will have the effect of shutting them out from their natural markets.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are barriers against them everywhere.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is wonderful how she has managed to get along so well all these years. If she is decaying it is marvellous that she has a revenue of over £130,000,000. For England, the ability to buy in other markets what she requires to maintain her manufacturing industries is her very life blood, and the moment any movement takes effect to put a ring fence round the Empire that moment her commercial supremacy will be threatened. Knowing these limitations, the people of England are not likely to go back to the old days from which she emerged triumphantly long ago. But I do not attach as much importance to these matters as do the advisers of the Governor-General. If they are "extremely gratified" at the pronouncement of one of the most acute politicians in England they are easily satisfied. No one applauds the eminent services which Mr. Chamberlain has rendered to the Empire more than I do, but for all that he is not the pure-minded statesman alone. He is also the most acute man in the British Empire to-day so far as electioneering dodges are concerned. I have already said that this session should close as speedily as possible in order that honorable members may go to the country and fight out that question, the raising of which the Prime Minister has already declared to be a crime against Australia. I notice one omission from this programme. No mention is made of the benign benefits which have accrued to the Commonwealth in consequence of the Tariff.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Be nine! Why, they are fifty.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Age in which the Minister lives does not say so. The Age says that it is a bastard Tariff; that it satisfies nobody, and should be altered as soon as possible. The Prime Minister himself says that it is a botch.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have never said so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the Prime Minister adhere to that denial?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do. If I had to chase and correct the erroneous reports of my speeches which appear in the Sydney and other newspapers, I should be doing nothing else all day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that the Prime Minister is almost the only man who would charge the Sydney Morning Herald with deliberate misreporting.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not charge them with deliberate misreporting.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is what the Sydney Morning Herald reports the Prime Minister as saying, and it is what the Daily Telegraph also reports him as saying. Evidently there must be a conspiracy among all the newspapers to misrepresent the right honorable and learned gentleman's utterances upon every conceivable occasion.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Because two agree, is there conspiracy amongst all?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There are only four daily newspapers in Sydney, and I suppose that the same remark applies to all. The Prime Minister denounces the whole of them. Yet when he wants to attack the leader of the Opposition he is ready enough to do so on the reports of those very newspapers.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I would accept his denial of their accuracy, and that courtesy is due to me.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Prime Minister did not accept his denial as to his remarks about taxation in Tasmania.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes, I did.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister speaking at one place in his electorate is reported in the Sydney Morning Herald to have said—

The Opposition said that this Tariff is to be swept away and another one substituted. Under that the Opposition would fit a Tariff a little more of a botch than they had succeeded in making this one.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The quotation in itself is sufficient to show what the report is. "Fit" a Tariff—what does that mean?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The present Tariff, therefore, is a botch.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Who says that?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Sydney Morning Herald. I think the Minister knows it.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes, it gives six-forty-sevenths of the truth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I prefer to take the deliberate statement of the Sydney Morning Herald rather than the off-hand statement of the Prime Minister. I cannot believe that he remembers every word that he utters.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not, but an expression like the one you have quoted always strikes me.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No public man can truthfully be held to remember all that he says. At any rate the Prime Minister has described his own Tariff as a botch.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have not. The Sydney Morning Herald's discrepancy is not mine.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable and learned gentleman went to some trouble to show that he kept faith with the Maitland manifesto. If the present Tariff keeps faith with that manifesto, then the Tariff in its original form did not.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I claimed that the Tariff, as introduced, kept faith with the Maitland manifesto, and I said so here the other night.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then this Tariff does not.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It lessens the value of the Tariff on the side of the maintenance of industries.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is the first time in the history of responsible government that I have known a Ministry content to accept such material alterations in a Tariff as were effected in their original production. It is the first time that a Government have consented to more than £1,000,000 being cut away from a revenue of £9,000,000 by the vote of the House. If the Prime Minister is satisfied with the Tariff as it now stands, he must have been very much more satisfied with it in its original form. If he does not believe that it has been improved, and if he holds that it has been made very much worse, the Government are under an obligation to re-open the question at the earliest possible moment, and to have it definitely settled once and for all.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have a better card than that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—By the way, I have heard no mention of all the new industries which have sprung into existence as the result of the operation of the present Tariff. The Prime Minister talks about them very freely upon the platform—

Mr. CHAPMAN.—I can give the names of every one of them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why, the first industry which the honorable member mentioned in his speech at Orange the other day was started and the money spent upon it before the introduction of the present Tariff.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—Let the honorable member ask the people who started it, and they will tell him a very different story.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We do not need to ask anybody; we live near the spot and know. The company that the honorable member has spoken of at Portland began operations eighteen months or two years before this Tariff was introduced.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—But it began operations immediately the Federal Ministry was established, and I can prove that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member may make the assertion, but he cannot prove it, because it is not a fact. That is the company which the honorable member places first amongst those represented in the £1,500,000 worth of industry; but he says nothing about the industries which have been closed up in Sydney owing to the increased difficulty experienced in the purchase of raw material.

Mr. MAUGER.—Let the honorable member tell us about McMillan's circular.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Such a reference only shows the absolute poverty of argument to which honorable members on the Government side are reduced. They have to settle the whole fiscal policy of the continent by what is stated in an importer's trade circular.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Is that the only answer the honorable member can give to that circular?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know anything about the circular; I have never seen it.

Mr. MAUGER.—We can give the honorable member 2,000 copies if he likes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no doubt the honorable member for Melbourne Ports has those circulars stored somewhere, seeing that he has quoted them throughout Victoria; but if Victorian audiences take that kind of political pabulum, they are easily satisfied.

Mr. MAUGER.—New South Wales people will take it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It will be found that the people of New South Wales will not take such pabulum at the next election. A Tariff which satisfies nobody is a standing invitation to unrest so long as it remains in force. How can things be regarded as settled when everybody feels that we have only a temporary Tariff? The Ministry and the whole party behind them, together with the Age newspaper, and the protectionists of Australia, are practically saying—"Give us a chance to feel our feet, and then we will alter the Tariff." Does that show any prospect of the peace for which traders are crying out? What is really meant by the Government is—"Let us alone, and as soon as we have got wind, and come back from the next election with the same free-trade votes that were given to us on a wrong basis at the last election, we will proceed further to undo the trading conditions of Australia." The Government sneaked in the Tariff the last time, but they are not going to do so the next time. This botch, this imperfect Tariff, which satisfies no one, should be submitted for the approval of the people on its merits.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—Are the honorable member and the honorable member for Macquarie prepared to take the duty off cement?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable member addressed that question to some honorable members who have been supporting the Government it might have some point, which it has not when addressed to the honorable member for Macquarie and myself. The honorable member and myself have shown what we are prepared to do.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—A simple "yes" or "no" would answer the question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member would not be satisfied whichever way we answered it, and therefore we shall answer it in our own good time. To claim that the Tariff is one which satisfies the Government only writes them down as political opportunists who would do anything and sacrifice any policy in order to remain in office. I cannot conceive a Government sitting quietly down when its policy has been so mutilated, particularly a Government with such an overwhelming proportion of strength in the House. I could understand the position if it were a Ministry such as that with which the Prime Minister was at one time associated, and which remained in office for two years with a majority of one.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The majority of one in that Parliament was never reached until after I left there. I think I may have been the one.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That Ministry never had more than a majority of four.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The majority was eight at one time.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—And that Government did more good with a majority of four than any Government with which the honorable member for Parramatta was associated could do with a majority of 40.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro did not think so at the time, because he could be heard bellowing like the bull of Bashan throughout the whole of that Ministerial career. I merely allude to this in order to suggest that the Prime Minister may have been led by that experience to his present loose habits concerning Ministerial responsibility. The Government sat still while the Tariff was torn to tatters and made a botch of. Indeed, the Tariff reminds me very much of the knife owned by a little boy, who said it was the same knife that had been owned by his father and his grandfather, except that it had two new blades and a new handle. The Tariff is in that sense the same Tariff, and is the result of a game of "pull devil, pull baker" in this House. It does not satisfy the Opposition, nor does it satisfy the Government or their supporters, and the Ministry cry precavi and plead to be left alone, on the ground that it would be a crime against Australia to re-open the question, knowing that the only result would be weakening of their prestige and position. But, from the point of view of Ministerial responsibility, and for the sake of the prospects of the commercial life of the community, the question should be settled once for all by the people with their eyes open—at the ballot-box. The Opposition intend, as far as lies in their power, that there shall be no more sneaking in of Tariffs, and if the people of New South Wales endorse the present imposts they will do so knowing what the proposals of the Government really are. That is all we ask, and the sooner the question is decided the better it will be for the future of Australia.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I did not intend to speak on the address in reply, had it not been for the matter of the six hatters, which has excited considerable attention throughout the Commonwealth, and has, mainly at the hands of the press, been subject to more criticism than perhaps any other public question. I am supposed, at any rate by some of the newspapers, to have had some connexion with the stopping of these men from landing in New South Wales, and I consider that it is advisable that the facts of the case, from the point of view of the workers of Australia, should be put fairly before the House. The leader of the Opposition expressed the opinion that the Hatters Union could not be responsible for the action of one of its officers, and would repudiate it, in trying to obtain from the hatters a copy of the agreement under which they came to Australia. Further, it has been stated by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that if these men had been coming to Melbourne they would not have been prevented from landing. I am in a position to contradict statements made to that effect, and I can further inform the House that the rules of the English Union prevent men under contract from working in any union shop, so that had these hatters landed in England under circumstances similar to those of the men whose cases we are considering, they would have had to find employment in some establishment not recognised by the union. The action of the union was taken exception to by the leader of the Opposition, but it must be remembered that these hatters were not the first who had arrived in New South Wales under agreement to Mr. Anderson since the Immigration Restriction Act was passed; eight men had previously come out from England under agreement with Mr. Anderson. When that gentleman advertised for men, hatters from Victoria went to him, and others wrote to him offering their services, and it ought to be known that while the hatters who went from this State were given only two or three days' work per week, the men under agreement worked full time. The union were informed that Mr. Anderson distinctly said that he intended to use the men under agreement as a means to burst up the union and decrease wages, and it was then thought high time to interfere and stop him breaking the law, which both Mr. Anderson and the agreement men knew he was doing.

Mr. THOMSON.—Then the Government became the catpaw of the union.

Mr. TUDOR.—The eight men to whom I have referred were allowed to land because the Act was then not rightly administered. If the letters which had passed between the Acting Collector of Customs at Fremantle and the department of External Affairs were produced, it would be seen that the Act was not administered as it should have been, and as it is now administered in America. Altogether there were, I believe, thirteen persons previously allowed to come under agreement and start work with Mr. Anderson, and the whole circumstances show that there was no action on the part of any Melbourne organization with the object of preventing the progress of any Sydney industry.

Mr. CONROY.—Do I understand that the Government had previously allowed men to come in under agreement?

Mr. TUDOR.—The Government did not know the men were landed.

Mr. CONROY.—And the fact was not pointed out to the Government?

Mr. TUDOR.—Not when they arrived, but the fact was known to the Government when these six hatters arrived. The Sydney Hatters Union cabled to the general secretary of the English union on 1st December, 1901, informing him that no men under agreement would be allowed to join the Australian organization. That was done before the six hatters landed in Melbourne.

Mr. CONROY.—Had they started from England?

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes.

Mr. THOMSON.—Was the English secretary not informed that all agreements signed before a given date were to be recognised?

Mr. TUDOR.—The cable stated that all agreements signed before the 1st December would be recognised by the Sydney union, and that cable was sent while the men were on the water. If honorable members see the agreement which was made between Mr. Anderson and these men, they will admit that it is very one-sided. I wish to point out how one-sided was the agreement which was made with the six hatters who landed in Sydney early in December compared with the agreement entered into by the boilermakers in England and the Western Australian Government. Those men, when they signed it, had no idea of the conditions obtaining in Australia at the time. Moreover, I believe they were well aware that they were breaking the law of the Commonwealth. The secretary to the Felt Hatters' Association in England was warned in May last year that after the passing of the Act men coming to Australia under agreement would be prevented from landing. The society here has come in for a great deal of blame for the action which it is supposed to have taken. It has been asserted that they were behind the Government. But if any member of this House or any section of the community knows that the law is being broken, he or they have a right to make the fact known to the authorities, and the newspapers which have denounced the society for what they did on that occasion are those who cry out most loudly about law and order. To prove that the society here did not object to the men coming out, but objected to the manner in which they had been brought out, I will read the first letter written in connexion with the case. The secretary of the society here knew that the Act was being administered by the Customs officials, and consequently thought that the case should be brought under the notice of the Minister for Trade and Customs; consequently he addressed that Minister first. His letter is as follows:—

May I be permitted to submit on behalf of my society the following questions:—

1. Is it legal for felt hatters to enter into agreement in England to serve employers in the Commonwealth?

2. Does the Immigration Restriction Act, section 9, affect our trade?

We offer no objection to the men as journey-men felt hatters, but strongly object to them under contract, as they receive regular work and wages, while men not so placed suffer from lost time arising from fluctuations of the demand for labour, thus giving these men undue advantage over all others.

The society did not set the law in motion until it found that its members were being penalized in Sydney, and were being compelled to walk about in order to find full employment for the contract men who were admitted in contravention of the provisions of the Act. Then they thought it time to interfere. The newspapers knew that thirteen individuals were admitted under contract to whom no exception was taken; but that fact was not made public. One section of the press of Melbourne, and the principal Sydney newspapers, were anxious to strike at the Government, and they saw an opportunity to do so in connexion with the action taken in regard to the hatters. It has been said that if the Prime Minister intended to release the men, he should have released them at once, without detaining them on board the ship. As a matter of fact, they were not detained on board the ship. I have heard from those who worked with them that they were allowed to go on shore every day, and that they never had such a good time before in their lives as when they were supposed to be in durance vile. When the Western Australian Government imported twelve boilermakers under contract the terms of the contract were very different. That contract specified what hours the men should work, what wages they should be paid, and what the rate of overtime should be, and stated that if the men worked for a certain period they would not be charged for their passage out. The contract with the hatters was a very different one. It was in these terms—

1. Charles Anderson agrees to engage the said J. J., as plinker and hardener, for a term of three years at a weekly wage of £3 per week, and the said Charles Anderson advances to the said J. J. for his passage out, viz., £25, which shall be deducted from his wages by amounts of 10s. per week, until this sum of £25 is liquidated. Holidays not to be paid for.

2. J. J. agrees that he is an efficient hand in planking and hardening, and that he is perfectly competent in his work. Also, J. J. contracts to be sober, attentive to business, and to do his work to the satisfaction of the said Charles Anderson.

In the first place there is no limitation there upon the number of hours to be worked per week, so that if the employer desired, he could compel the men to work the number of hours worked in England—56½ hours per week or even a greater number if he so desired. Those were the hours worked there when I was in that country.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There have been great changes since then.

Mr. TUDOR.—I have the rules of the society in my pocket, and if the honorable member likes to read them he will see that the hours worked in 1894 are the hours worked now. These men practically put themselves beyond the pale of their own union in signing the contract. Had they returned to England to work for any employer under agreement, they would not have been allowed to enter any union shop. They tried to take advantage of the fact that the union in Sydney is not very strong. When the press was making such a noise about the matter, it was stated that they had been promised by the trade organizations here a hearty welcome to Australia in February. At that time, however, the only organizations were those in Melbourne and Adelaide. There was none at all in Sydney until May, and I am positive that the men cannot produce any letter showing that a welcome was promised to any men under contract. I have looked through the association's letter-book here to find if such a letter was sent, and I am satisfied that the only letter sent was the warning I have mentioned, enclosing a copy of the Immigration Restriction Act. A paragraph was published in the newspapers circulating in every felt hatter's district, that men coming out here under contract would be breaking the law.

Mr. THOMSON.—They would not be breaking the law.

Mr. TUDOR.—I think that they would. Of the first batch of six hatters, two were practically unknown men, and their expertness is not sworn to in any affidavit produced to this House. Neither Mr. Anderson nor Mr. Sharpley would swear to-day what they swore then, that the men were experts such as could not be obtained in Australia, since some of them have already been displaced by other men who have gone over from Melbourne. The man whose clearance was read out by the leader of the Opposition was made foreman of a particular branch, but he was displaced by another man brought from this State to take his place, so he could not have given satisfaction in that position, and he has since gone to New Zealand. Honorable members can ascertain the accuracy of my statement by telegraphing to Sydney.

Mr. CONROY.—Did he go to New Zealand of his own accord?

Mr. TUDOR.—He is the man who was interviewed by the Sydney Daily Telegraph as to his expert ability and the qualifications he held, and who stated that he thought the country was a grand one, and that he would send for his son to come out, too. I presume that when he was displaced by a workman from this State, he preferred to leave Sydney rather than submit to the humiliation of being pointed out as the man about whom so much bragging was done. My object to-night is to show that the union was justified in the action they took. They were willing that men should come here to compete in the market on the same conditions as themselves, free to get their discharge, and to accept work in any shop they liked. The men in dispute preferred, however, to come out under a contract in which there is no stipulation to the effect that the union conditions either of England or of Australia shall be observed.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member know that the union has been told that if it will pay the expense of bringing these men out here the contract will be cancelled, and that that offer is still open?

Mr. TUDOR.—I have heard a rumour to that effect. But why did not the person who imported the men make a contract with them on terms similar to those contained in the Western Australian contract? I maintain that the organization of which I am a member was justified in the action it took, and that the Government was right in preventing the men from landing until their employer had asked for an exemption. He did not do so until 11th December, and the men were released on the 13th. But according to the facts in my possession, he was not entitled to obtain an exemption, and to prove that statement I will read part of his statutory declaration—

My foreman in my hat factory, one Walter Sharpley, is an Englishman, and learned his trade and became an expert in felt hat making in England, and prior to writing to Messrs. Jepson Bros. as aforesaid, I consulted him and asked him to make a list of the best men he knew of in England in the branches of the felt hat making for which I required experts in my factory.

The said Walter Sharpley thereupon compiled a list of the best men he knew of in England, and whom he could recommend as thoroughly expert.

Of the twelve in all who were brought out under agreement, Sharpley has sworn that he knew only seven. Honorable members are mistaken if they think that only six were brought out. There were another six following those six. If you admit six men in defiance of the provisions of the Act, you might as well abolish the law altogether, as to my mind there is no difference between six and sixty or six hundred, because you will afterwards have to admit every one who chooses to come.

Mr. CONROY.—If they are able-bodied men they will be of value to the community.

Mr. TUDOR.—No doubt, but it is not right that we should allow them to come here under conditions which will tend to make things worse for those men who have been here for many years, and have helped to build up our industries. The Hatters Union were quite willing that any number of men should come in here, provided they were free to accept work wherever it might offer, and to leave any employment with which they might not be satisfied. The first letter which I read made that clear.

Mr. CONROY.—And yet the unions were not prepared to permit men to freely pass from one country to another.

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes, they were, so long as the men were not under engagement. As a matter of fact, the men who came out here under contract could not pass freely from one State to another. They could not, for instance, leave New South Wales with a view to seeking more profitable employment in Victoria.

Mr. CONROY.—According to the honorable member's own story, one of them went to New Zealand.

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes, but he ran away, and could, if his employer had chosen, be brought back again and compelled to work. I believe that the workers should have the same free conditions as the honorable and learned member for Werriwa would desire to see apply to the importation of goods. I hold that a workman should be free to go where he chooses, and to sell his labour as he likes, and to obtain the best conditions possible, and that he should also be protected against entering into agreements which would prevent him from siding with his fellow-workers in time of trouble.

Mr. CONROY.—Would the honorable member permit apprentices to be bound?

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes; apprentices are bound under indentures in the hat trade all over the world so as to learn the trade properly.

Mr. CONROY.—Then they are not free.

Mr. TUDOR.—I believe that even in the profession which is adorned by the honorable and learned member apprentices, or their equivalent, have to be bound under articles. Mr. Sharpley says, with regard to the first six men, that he knew only four of them. He says—

I know, and am well acquainted, with Messrs. Joseph Joules, Frank Pollitt, Fred. Davies, and William Gee, who are at present detained on the ship Orotus in the port of Sydney, having worked and been associated with them as a felt hatmaker in England.

2. Of my own knowledge of these men, I say that they are each specially qualified as felt hat makers, and are skilled artisans in that industry.

If the leader of the Opposition had been attacking the Government for admitting the hatters, he would not have failed to point out that the evidence upon which they were adjudged to be specially qualified was utterly insufficient. At least two of them were not known as experts.

Mr. CONROY.—But they held the union certificates.

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes, but that only showed that they were members of the union. The honorable member for North Sydney remarked that the Hatters' Union had practically made an attempt to "boss" the Prime Minister, but that was not correct. They became aware that the law was being broken, and they considered it their duty to bring the fact under the notice of the Prime Minister, and to ask him to enforce the Act. The union officials did not object to the introduction of workmen, but they had strong reasons for opposing any wholesale importation of men under fixed agreement. Mr. Anderson himself said that he was arranging for the introduction of several more batches of men to follow the six regarding whom all the fuss was made, and the union in the light of their knowledge at the time took an absolutely straightforward course, which subsequent events fully justified.

Mr. CONROY.—They entertained the men and extracted their agreements from their pockets.

Mr. TUDOR.—I do not know whether they entertained the men or not. As a matter of fact, I was not in Melbourne at the time, and I did not see any of the papers regarding this particular question until they were placed on the table of the House, with the exception of one letter which was sent to the Minister at a late stage of the trouble, after a deputation of employers had asked him to break the law. The party of "law and order" had no hesitation in asking the Prime Minister to set aside the law when they thought it was operating to their disadvantage. With reference to the second batch of six men, Mr. Sharpley says—

I know and am well acquainted with Messrs. Arthur Wood, Sam Grimshaw, and William Taylor, . . . having worked and been associated with them for many years as a felt hat maker in England. . . . I am also informed by Mr. Albert Booth, of Sydney, foreman finisher, that he personally knows and is well acquainted with Messrs. Alfred Kennedy and James Redfern.

That is a nice sort of declaration to accept as evidence regarding the fitness of these men for admission to the Commonwealth under special engagement, and would not be accepted in any court as evidence, and I can imagine how the leader of the Opposition would have pulled these statements to pieces if he had been attacking the Government from a stand-point opposite to that adopted by him. There was no reason for bringing these men into the Commonwealth, because there was a sufficiency of labour already here. There is no desire on the part of the Hatters' Union to retain the work for themselves, but they want any tradesman who comes here to be at liberty to pass freely from shop to shop, or from State to State; and they consider they were justified in fighting for a principle. The public have been entirely misled in this matter. The union men were not actuated by motives of jealousy, nor did they desire to prevent the hat-making industry from being established in Sydney. On the contrary, they are most anxious that hat factories should flourish there, as their position will be improved if other factories are started, where they can go for employment. I went to Sydney as a member of the union and formed a branch organization there last May, and one of the men who came out in the second batch from England happens to be a high official of the Sydney union at the present time. We have nothing against the men. All the union were anxious to do was to prevent the law from being broken with impunity, and to guard against the country being glutted with labour under conditions which would tend to the disadvantage of those already settled here. Under the terms of the agreement the men could be compelled to work for any number of hours.

Mr. CONROY.—Nonsense. The honorable member knows very well that could not happen under the provisions of the Arbitration Act in operation in New South Wales.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Arbitration Act does not regulate the number of hours to be worked by the men in the hat trade. No doubt if the honorable and learned member for Werriwa had had his way it would not have been necessary to introduce even six hatters into New South Wales. The industry there has been encouraged by the protective duties, and it must be a matter of surprise to free-traders that a much larger number of manufactories have not been established, because they predicted that the duties which were imposed under the Tariff would prove prohibitive, and that local manufacturers would enjoy a most profitable monopoly. However, the position has not developed as was expected, as we only find one factory started in New South Wales, and the predictions of members of the Opposition during the Tariff debate have not come true. It was said that these men were required because of their possession of special knowledge and skill, but it is singular that whilst they were being engaged at £3 per week, Mr. Anderson was offering £3 10s. per week to men employed in Victoria with a view to secure their services. The honorable member for Gippsland said that there could be no objection to the introduction of these men, because there was no industrial dispute in progress at the time, but disputes might be very easily brought about by introducing men under the conditions which obtained in the case under notice. Under the terms of the agreement the men can be dispensed with at any time that the employer may consider their work to be faulty. There is no appeal from his decision, and thus he could, upon the most trifling pretext, get rid of the most expert men in the world. That would be the best way of bringing about a dispute, and the Government not only did right in detaining those men, but in my judgment they should have required further evidence before admitting them at all. I would further point out that no action was taken to bring pressure to bear upon the Government by any section of workers in the community. The Employers' Federation, however, waited upon the Prime Minister on the 16th December, and urged him to override the law upon this matter. By the way, Mr. Walpole, the secretary of that association, who, I am informed, receives £1,000 a year, goes about the country as a paid agitator, preaching against conciliation and arbitration, and endeavouring to create disturbances. It was this gentleman who made a statement at Lilydale, when speaking there against the Factories Act, that marriage was a luxury for the workers, as were also "long sleepers," attending theatres, and the like, and that it was not fair to compel employers to pay for such things. This paid agitator receives £1,000 a year for stirring up trouble between employer and employé. Yet when the workers dared to engage a paid lecturer for a few months the honorable member for Gippsland denounced the proceeding, and declared that the labour organizations obtained the best men they could from abroad. He stated that the workers had no right to adopt that course.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Did I? Look at Hansard.

Mr. TUDOR.—I was remarking that the Employers Federation, if its members hold the same views as those entertained by its secretary, were anxious that these hatters should be kept in the position of bondsmen, and that all Arbitration and Conciliation Acts should be swept away or not brought into operation, because they know the workers are likely to obtain justice there, and they know that under such an Act the condition of the workers would be improved. Indeed, at a later stage, they urged the Prime Minister not to introduce a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill during the present year. Then it was that the Hatters Union appeared for the first time and asked the Prime Minister to enforce the provisions of the Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—Did not the Union send in an agreement before that?

Mr. TUDOR.—They sent in letters pointing out what was going on, and that the law was being broken. The deputation from the Hatters Union did not wait on the Prime Minister until after the first six hatters had been admitted. Consequently, there was no reason for the outcry which has been made against the union. If honorable members had known the full facts of the case they would not have been led away by the press upon that particular matter.

Mr. CONROY.—The Prime Minister stopped the men at the bidding of the Hatters Union. The Minister for Trade and Customs knew all about it.

Mr. TUDOR.—He did not. The first official intimation which the Prime Minister received was from Mr. Baxter, sub-collector of customs, Sydney, who is neither a member of the labour party nor of the Hatters Union.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I gained my information without either seeing or hearing from the Minister for Trade and Customs.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Prime Minister took action before he had been approached by the Hatters Union. But seeing that these men were coming to Australia under an agreement, members of that organization had a right to petition against their admission. The honorable member for the Grampians stated last night that we had a right to admit as many people as chose to come here under contract. I join issue with him upon that point. I have as much consideration for the man who is free to sell his labour in any factory, the men who are settled here, who have brought up families here, and some of these are unemployed to-day, as I have for the individual who is bound to one employer, and if the honorable member for the Grampians is true to his free-trade principles, he should believe in the worker being able to sell his labour to the best possible advantage for himself. These men admitted that they had no idea of the conditions obtaining here. Why was no provision made in their agreements in regard to the question of overtime or that union conditions would be observed? Probably it was because the employer was anxious to work them longer hours, and give them only £3 per week.

Mr. CONROY.—The Arbitration Act would prevent that, and the honorable member knows it.

Mr. TUDOR.—The society was not registered under the Arbitration Act. The employer could compel them to adhere to the conditions of the agreement.

Mr. THOMSON.—No.

Mr. CONROY.—The men could compel the employer to pay them, irrespective of whether or not they were employed.

Mr. TUDOR.—It does not say so in the agreement. The agreement distinctly states that holidays will not be paid for. The men themselves admitted that if they had been aware of the conditions prevailing they would have come here as free men. Had they done so, even if they had been out of employment for twelve months, not one of the newspapers which created such a fuss about the matter would have uttered a word in their favour. When I came to Australia from England, I walked the streets for about twelve weeks, and the newspapers did not publish a word in my favour. But, because they were anxious to discredit the Government, they gave a great amount of publicity to this matter, and refused to print the full facts. Indeed, I was interviewed by a representative of one of the newspapers, and I told him that these hatters were not the first who had come to Australia under special contract. Did the newspaper in question publish that fact? Certainly not! The press were anxious to make it appear that it was against all British tradition to exclude the men, when, as a matter of fact, I believe that a similar law operates in Canada. I know that similar legislation exists in America; there the authorities are very particular about asking a man whether or not he is under contract. That practice has led to a lot of lying, just as I have heard that many merchants have lied with regard to certain invoices which have come before the Customs authorities. These merchants might have aimed at the truth, but, if so, they were very bad shots. Before closing, I wish to say a few words in reference to the question of the promised Navigation Bill. I regret that the Government have not given more prominence to that measure. Last night the right honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, told the House that the mail vessels which come to Australia remain here only a week or a fortnight, and that we have no right to ask them to pay their seamen the Australian rate of wages. But I would point out that upon some vessels, which trade on our coast to the detriment of Australian ships, the crew are frequently shipped at the Islands. In this connexion, I might instance the Dean line, which has been trading here, month after month, to the detriment of our own shipping. I trust that, if time permit, the Government will endeavour to pass some sort of navigation law, though not for the sake of the employers, who are quite able to fight their own battles. If the present unfair competition is allowed, the rate of wages for Australian sailors will probably come down. Only last December our firemen and seamen had to suffer a reduction in wages of 10s. per month on this account. Some protection ought to be afforded to our shipping industry, which, I believe, employs a greater number of men than any other industry we have. When the honorable member for Bland was referring to the agreement between the Defence department and the Colonial Ammunition Company, I felt that it would be very desirable for a copy of that agreement to be laid on the table before it is finally adopted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That will be done.

Mr. TUDOR.—I know something of the conditions which obtain in the works of the Colonial Ammunition Company, under the present management, and I am anxious to see more protection afforded to the employees. Not many years ago an accident occurred there, and during the consequent excitement many facts were brought out in the press which were not creditable to the establishment. I should prefer to see the ammunition required for the defence forces manufactured by the State, so that we could then regulate the conditions of labour. Last night the honorable member for Grampians said he hoped that the provisions of the Post and Telegraph Act regarding the mail service would receive attention, and that the inconvenience arising from the recent strike on the Victorian railways would not be allowed to recur. In that hope I join, and I trust that the Government will go further and carry a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill this session. Honorable members may say that the Victorian railway strike was a State trouble, but I believe that either the Supreme Courts of the States or the High Court when established, would rule that such a dispute did extend beyond the limits of any one State, seeing that the people of New South Wales and South Australia were prevented from travelling by rail, and had to resort to water communication. The honorable member for Wentworth, speaking on a motion submitted by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne last session, in favour of the Commonwealth acquiring power to make laws regulating the conditions of labour, said—

Since we met in the Federal Convention, which framed this Commonwealth Constitution, there has been a very considerable evolution of thought with regard to certain matters that were then discussed. I confess myself, that by reflection, and by listening to arguments, to be more convinced than previously of the necessity of including certain powers in the Commonwealth which we decided to leave in the States.

These remarks were made on the question of fixing the rates of wages, hours, and conditions of labour. The honorable member for New England on the same occasion, said—

I have always regarded it as a misfortune that the Constitution Act did not provide that the question of conciliation and arbitration, and the regulation of wages, and conditions of labour generally, should be left as matters for the sole control of the Federal Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It was a great mistake.

In any case, I trust the Government will at an early opportunity introduce a Bill to prevent any recurrence of troubles, similar to that lately experienced in Victoria, and I hope that during this session we will be able to do something to prevent a recurrence of this dispute, and bring about better conditions for all employes in the Commonwealth.

Mr. CAMERON (Tasmania).—I have always regarded the debates on the Address in Reply as, to a great extent, a waste of time, unless there was a motion of want of confidence before the House. On the present occasion, however, I think the debate is a little more important than usual, seeing that we are a new Parliament legislating for a number of federated States. In a short time we shall have to give an account of our stewardship, and it seems to me that some of the few measures we have passed will call for hard names from those for whom we have been legislating. There are two measures which most prominently stand forward, namely, the Tariff and the Immigration Restriction Act. The Prime Minister, in his addresses in the different States, has always urged that the Tariff should be left alone in order that the people may have an opportunity of seeing how it works. He has also, I understand, claimed it, in its present form, as the result of his Maitland speech; but we, on this side of the House, have also a strong claim to be regarded as contributors to the Tariff as finally passed. In fact, I may describe the position as an alliance between a young free-trade father and an old decrepit protectionist mother. The result of that alliance is a child, of which the free-trade father is thoroughly and utterly ashamed, while the protectionist mother, knowing full well that from her age and other circumstances, she will never have another, is determined to preserve her bantling to the utmost of her ability. My own opinion is that, as a result of the next election campaign, the protectionist bantling will die, more particularly when the Australians come to realize what they are called upon to pay as a result of its birth. I do not know whether honorable members have realized the result of this protective Tariff, and I desire to call their attention to the item of sugar. Owing to the protection given to the manufacturers or producers of sugar, the amount which the people have to pay, and which does not go to the benefit of the revenue, is over £500,000 per annum. I have carefully gone into the matter, and I find that there are, in round numbers, 8,000 persons deriving benefit from the sugar industry, and honorable members know that there is an excise duty of £3 per ton, and a duty of £6 per ton on sugar coming in from outside sources.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is on cane sugar.

Mr. CAMERON.—So far as sugar grown by black labour is concerned, the cost practically amounts to the same as that on cane sugar produced outside Australia. I understand that a rebate will be allowed on sugar grown by white labour during the twelve months to the amount of £60,000, or about £2 per ton on 30,000 tons of sugar. There are something like 160,000 tons of sugar produced in Queensland and New South Wales.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; that is the consumption.

Mr. CAMERON.—The honorable member for Gippsland last night stated that £60,000 was being paid to the producers of sugar by white labour, and that when the kanakas were deported in the course of some six years, the whole of the sugar produced, which I understand is 160,000 tons—

Mr. KINGSTON.—I said that about 170,000 tons would be the total consumption.

Mr. CAMERON.—Then the Minister ought to have told the House how much sugar is going to be produced in Australia, or otherwise, why was £340,000 mentioned as the amount the Customs were going to lose when the full rebate was allowed? At the present moment, in order to encourage the growth of sugar by white labour, and to encourage the growth of sufficient to meet our own requirements, the manufacturer is at present receiving practically a bonus of £3 per ton. Imported sugar is being landed and sold throughout Australia at practically 10s. per ton less than the price at which the Australian sugar is sold, though it is a fact that in certain cases the price is the same. If imported sugar can be brought in, duty paid, and sold at such prices, then local producers ought to be able to supply the community at £17 or £17 10s. per ton. If the local producers bring the price up to the same as that of the imported sugar, it means that the people of Australia are paying to a small section of the community something like £500,000 per annum, and that payment will go on so long as the present duty continues. We were told that this is a bonus to the growers of Queensland and New South Wales.

Mr. A. PATERSON.—It is a bonus for the abolition of black labour.

Mr. CAMERON.—But the question arises whether we can do without black labour; and in the meantime, until the kanaka goes, the consumer is paying £3 per ton more for sugar than there is any necessity to pay. The Immigration Restriction Bill has excited great indignation over a large portion of Australia. I do not suppose that such a Bill would have been allowed to pass had it been thought that it would be administered as the Government have administered it. From a return laid on the table on the evening before last I find that 680 persons applied for admission under this Act. Of those, 633 were rejected because they were not able to comply with the education test, which consisted in asking them to write a certain number of words consecutively. No fewer than 33 of the men rejected were white men, and I am sorry to say that three or four of them were British. Now, we know that it is only within the last few years that the governments of the various countries of the world have devoted much time and trouble to the education of their peoples, and that there are, therefore, a number of very able and intelligent men who in their youth had no opportunity to acquire the art of reading and writing. It may thus have happened that men who would have made good colonists were rejected because they were not educated. But although 33 white men were rejected because they could not pass the test, the same number of coloured men were admitted because they could read and write. Therefore it seems to me that the test is worse than useless.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Does the honorable member say that, when he knows that 630 coloured people were rejected?

Mr. CAMERON.—I and another honorable member were the only two who strongly objected to the provisions of the Act. It is true that I supported the Government in providing for an education test rather than a colour test, but I did so upon the principle that of two evils one should choose the lesser. When the measure was under consideration I told the House that I was prepared to limit the number of Chinese and Japanese who could come here, not because I was afraid that the people of those races would come here in such numbers as to reduce wages, but because I felt that if they came here, and increased to large proportions, they might eventually menace the safety of Australia. I am, however, no believer in the "white Australia" cry. I told honorable members that I saw no reason why, in order to provide for the continuance of the sugar industry, an arrangement should not be made with the British authorities in India for bringing a certain number of Hindoos or other men of Indian race here under agreement to work in the fields, to be sent back when their term of service had expired. Parliament, however, passed the Act which we now have on our statute book, and the result was the very unpleasant incident which has been so much discussed. It was sought to refuse admission to men belonging to the British race who were in every respect desirable immigrants.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Can the honorable member refer to a case in which such men have been refused admission?

Mr. CAMERON.—The men I allude to were not allowed to land as British subjects ought to have been allowed to land in what is practically a British country.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Notwithstanding the law!

Mr. CAMERON.—If they had been felons or malefactors the law might very well have been put into force against them, but they were refused admission simply because they came out under an agreement by which, although they may not have contracted for the high rate of wages now prevailing in Australia, they were to receive better wages than they were being paid in England. That having happened, I think the sooner the Act is removed from the statute-book the better, and I trust the leader of the Opposition, or some other honorable member, will, before the session closes, take steps to secure its repeal, now that we have seen the mistake which we have made. A short Act dealing with aliens such as the Chinese, would answer all purposes, and would place Australia in a higher position in the eyes of the civilized world. With regard to the proposals contained in the Governor-General's speech, there are one or two which I shall cordially support. I have always held that, Australia being an island continent, a fleet is a form of insurance to us, so that we could not do better than, so to speak, subsidize the British authorities, if they require a subsidy, to provide for our defence. I do not see that great prominence has been given in the speech to the arrangement for the taking over of New Guinea by the Commonwealth. I presume that what we agreed to last session will be ratified, and I ask honorable members who made such a howl about a white Australia a few months ago how they will reconcile their position then with their unanimous approval of the proposal to take over New Guinea? We have been told that if we allow aliens to come into Australia we shall have a piebald population; but if New Guinea is incorporated in the Commonwealth the time must come when its people must be admitted to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the Commonwealth, because it will be colonized largely by men who have gone from Australia. When New Guinea contains a large population of white people, we shall be unable to refuse them the franchise. We cannot say to them—"So long as you remain in New Guinea you will be regarded as aliens, and will have no voice in the framing of the laws of Australia." They will demand, and we shall be compelled to yield, the privileges which are enjoyed by our own people. But another difficulty arises. As a rule when men go to countries which are inhabited by coloured people, they to a certain extent carry their lives in their hands, and most of them go unmarried. But if they settle in such a country they often in course of time make alliances with the natives amongst whom they live, and in this way a mixed population is created. How can the Commonwealth call itself a "white Australia" when it has within its borders such a population as must spring up in New Guinea? The thing is absurd. I do not intend to discuss the other Bills on the programme, because there are many other honorable members who wish to address the House; but I desire to say that I thoroughly approve of the intention of the leader of the Opposition to endeavour to obtain at the next general elections an opinion from the country as to whether we should adopt a protective or a free-trade policy. As the honorable member for Parramatta has said, honorable members were to a certain extent returned under false pretences at the last elections. Many of them were returned, not because of their fiscal opinions, but because they had occupied important positions in the State Ministries and Parliaments, and it was felt by the electors that the ablest men offering should be chosen. The Government have succeeded in passing a very hybrid Tariff, and one which is, I think, unsatisfactory to both parties. I have always been a revenue tariffist. I could not, like an honorable gentleman who spoke yesterday, reconcile free-trade opinions with the advocacy of a duty upon potatoes and oats. The furthest I have gone in the direction of protection—if I can be said to have gone in that direction at all—is in voting for the Bonus Bill when it first came before us. I voted then for the payment of bonuses for a certain limited period. When the Bill came before us on the second occasion, I voted against it, because it had been altered in an important particular. I trust that the battle of free-trade and protection will be fought out to the bitter end. No doubt, honorable members opposite would like the present Tariff to continue in force for a little while to see how it works. I have already shown what the consumer has to pay on sugar, and how he is being robbed. If all the sugar consumed in Australia were locally produced, the manufacturers would be able to pocket the duty of £6 per ton, and the consumers would have to pay £800,000 within a few years. Referring to the question of revenue tariffism, as distinguished from protection, I still feel very sore at the attitude assumed by the leader of the free-trade party with regard to the tea duties. I hold that as a revenue tariffist it was his duty to have supported that impost. One of the arguments used by the right honorable and learned gentleman was that as duties were being levied upon nearly everything, and New South Wales would receive a far larger amount of revenue than it required, he did not feel justified in supporting the tea duty. Whilst, however, the Prime Minister, on various occasions, has twitted the leader of the Opposition upon his attitude, I say that ten times more blame attaches to the Government for the action they took. If the Government had desired to study the interests of the smaller States, they should have called their supporters together and told them that the imposition of the tea duty was a matter of policy by which they would stand or fall, and that if the interests of the smaller States were not studied to the extent they regarded as necessary, they would hand in their resignations. If they had taken this attitude a large majority of the Government supporters would have stood by them, and the duty would have become the law of the land. They, however, left their supporters to do as they pleased, and in spite of the support received from ten members of the Opposition the duty was defeated. Their action was neither more nor less than a sop to the labour party. If it were not so, why in the name of decency was not the duty dealt with in the order in which it appeared upon the Tariff? It was dangled like a carrot at the nose of the donkey, and the donkey followed it and eventually had the pleasure of devouring it. Without detaining the House at any further length, I will conclude by venturing to hope that the remarks which I have made will bear fruit in due season.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—Whilst I highly appreciated the strong and eloquent speech of the honorable member for Gippsland, I cannot say that I was fully in agreement with him. I cannot support the high eulogium he passed upon the Prime Minister's speech. I quite agree that that deliverance was excellent, but excellent only in passages. Like the curate's egg, it was good in parts, but the parts which were bad, were exceedingly objectionable. The right honorable gentleman offered the weakest defence I ever heard, even from a barrister-at-law, in regard to his statements made during the recess as to the action of the Opposition in the case of the tea duty, and in relation to the Immigration Restriction Act. He had the audacity to endeavour to support these statements, although, as has been pointed out, a larger proportion of the members of the Opposition than of the Ministerial supporters voted for the tea duty.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—Is it not a fact that a number of members of the Opposition led the Government to believe they would vote for the duty, and then were wheedled into opposing it?

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not know whether that is a fact or not, but I am not prepared to believe it. I know that when the division came on, the honorable member for Eden-Monaro was looking for the Attorney-General, because that Minister had left the House in the face of an important division without pairing. It was a particularly audacious thing for the Prime Minister to say that there was an alliance between the Opposition and the labour party to defeat the Immigration Restriction Act, and it savoured very much of ingratitude on his part not to acknowledge that six members of the Opposition had actually saved the measure from defeat. Then, again, the Prime Minister made use of base insinuations as to the motives which prompted the Opposition in certain criticisms of the administration. He declared that the Opposition was influenced in its criticism of the Customs administration by a desire to aid the rich importers. He further said that they were induced by a disposition in favour of black labour to adversely comment upon the Government action in regard to the Immigration Restriction Act. He said that they were prompted, not by honest motives, but by spiteful feeling against the Government. He charged them with having in some mysterious way originated and spread the reports in regard to the rejection of the six hatters, which caused such a commotion throughout the British Empire. That statement has been fully answered by one of the Prime Minister's supporters, who condemned the action of the administration in the strongest possible terms. The Hon. Henry Copeland, the Agent-General of New South Wales, who is reported to have stated that the refusal to admit the hatters into the Commonwealth had created a bad effect in England, is a protectionist supporter of the Prime Minister, and protectionists throughout Australia were at one with the free-traders in condemning that action. I do not intend to re-warm virtuals that have become cold during recess, but I must deal with certain acts of administration in connexion with the Customs and with the Immigration Restriction Act, because, owing to the Prime Minister's insinuations, it is necessary to give good reasons, instead of the bad ones suggested by him, for the attitude of the Opposition in each case. In the first place, however, I desire to allude to some of the leading features of the Governor-General's speech. The Prime Minister stated that the leader of the Opposition had discovered very little in the speech from the Throne with which he could find fault. The explanation lies in the fact that nearly all the proposals are with regard to machinery measures required to bring into force those provisions of the Constitution, to which effect has not yet been given. In this category I include the High Court Bill, the New Guinea Government Bill, the provision to be made for the direct representation of the Commonwealth in London by a High Commissioner, a uniform Patent Law, and the proposal to create an Inter-State Commission. The Defence Bill is also a machinery measure, although it is being brought forward very late in the day. The work outlined in the speech is no doubt altogether too much to be dealt with in one session. Some of those proposals which do not come within the description I have given are not open to criticism until we have seen the Bills when they are brought before the House. With regard to the High Court Bill, the proposed appointment of a High Commissioner in London and the Inter-State Commission Bill, I desire to say that whilst I am as anxious as is any other honorable member of this House to limit the expenditure of the Commonwealth, I shall support these proposals, if a good case can be made out for them. Regarding the Inter-State Commission I have no hesitation in saying that if the proposed Bill is founded on the provisions of the measure which was introduced last session, it will have my opposition. I cannot agree to the absolutely unnecessary expense that would be involved in bringing every common carrier throughout Australia—every bullock driver who crosses from one State to another, and every steamer that navigates our coasts—as well as the railways, under the control of that commission. I admit that there seems to be some necessity for the creation of the commission, because preferential rates exist upon the railways in absolute contravention of the Constitution. These rates are really a substitute for the inter-State customs duties, which have been abolished, and we must adjust matters as soon as possible.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The fight is now at the railway stations instead of at the Custom-houses.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes ; it is as the Minister says. At the same time, I do not think we should go further than is absolutely necessary. We should appoint a commission upon the cheapest possible basis, and restrict its work within the closest possible limits. If, in future, it is found necessary to extend the functions of the commission, we may introduce Bills referring other matters to its jurisdiction. With regard to the federal capital site, I am entirely in accord with the terms of the Governor-General's speech, and I hope that the Government will see the necessity and justice of pressing this matter to a decision during the present session. The honorable member for Gippsland alluded to the heavy new taxation which all the States would bear in connexion with certain matters which he mentioned. One of these was that of the sugar excise. But in this connexion it should be remembered that, although the total of his figures was a large one, it does not approach the extra taxation to which New South Wales had to submit to enter the Federation. Nearly £1,500,000 additional taxation had to be paid by the people of that State as a consequence of it entering the Federal union.

Mr. KINGSTON.—They had need of it, too.

Mr. THOMSON.—They did not need it, but like many other people, when they found their hands full of money they became spendthrifts, and incurred expenditure after expenditure until, instead of a surplus, they had a deficiency. That they did not need it was evidenced by the fact that they were before well able to carry on without it. To induce them to accept this burden and consent to the bond of union, provision was made in the Constitution that the capital site should be in New South Wales territory. That was recorded in the bond, and is one of the reasons why the site should be selected at the earliest possible moment. Then there is the matter of the establishment of Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration. It is fully impressed with the desirableness of avoiding those contests between capital and labour which eventuate in strikes; but I have yet to learn how the combined powers of legislation on the part of the States and of the Commonwealth are going to work in unison upon this matter. I think it would have been better to await the results of the working of the Acts in the different States, to ascertain if they require amendment, and then for the Commonwealth to obtain the consent of the States to deal with the whole question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The need for amendment has now been pretty well indicated.

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not think that all the points which require amendment have been indicated. In addition to the clashing of legislative power, I am afraid that we may encourage the frequency of disputes by the multiplicity of courts. I am afraid that there will be a tendency both on the part of masters and men, when defeated in the State court, to take their case into the Federal court. Again, when a decision has been given in the Federal court in regard to an industrial dispute extending beyond the limits of a State, either side may create trouble in one of those States, and the arbitration court of that State may give an entirely different decision from that of the Federal court. Of course, it is possible that the Minister may have found a means to overcome these difficulties, but if his proposals, instead of reducing industrial disputes, are likely to increase them, I shall not be found supporting him. I need not enter largely into a discussion of the naval defence question, because I agree with those who have so ably supported the contribution to the Imperial Government. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, in their opposition to that subsidy, both made a strong point of the fact that if we commit ourselves to such a contribution, we shall eventually be committed to bearing our full proportion—on whatever basis it may be determined—of the expenditure necessary for the naval defence of the Empire. I do not think that that question arises at the present stage. If it comes to that, we are already committed, because we already contribute.

Mr. CROUCH.—Only the States contribute.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Commonwealth itself has contributed. The only thing which we are now asked to do is to contribute a little more than we have done previously, and I think there is reason for that. If we are to contribute at all, I think the amount for which the Government are asking is certainly not too much. In my opinion, it is even too little. We must also remember that all the schemes for local defence which are put forward by experts differ entirely. What one says is necessary another declares is unnecessary. One would employ heavily-armed vessels for defence of our harbors and offings, whilst another recommends cruisers to keep off the fast armoured vessels which might attack our commerce at sea. Which of these plans are we to adopt? To my mind, we require more knowledge of what is required and of the important developments which are at present going on in the way of naval warships. At the end of ten years, when this agreement expires, if there be then any sound reason for establishing an Australian navy, we shall be in a better position owing to the expiration of the Braddon clause to undertake the necessary expenditure.

Mr. CROUCH.—This agreement will never expire unless we terminate it by a deliberate act.

Mr. THOMSON.—Surely, if we have the option of ending it we can do so if we wish.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It continues for ten years, and may be terminated by two years' notice at the end of eight years.

Mr. THOMSON.—Precisely. If we do not see fit to terminate it, I presume it will be because it is to our own interests to continue it. The adjustment proposed of the rebate of the sugar excise duty I shall be prepared to consider when the Ministry bring forward the Bill relating to it. I know that the proposal will confer an advantage upon the State which I represent, but I am quite willing to consider other States in the matter: and, if I see good reason to oppose it, the fact that it will benefit New South Wales will not weigh with me. Another measure which is foreshadowed in the dim and distant future, and which, I suppose, is intended as the pièce de résistance for the elections, is the Navigation and Shipping Bill. I am very doubtful of the efficacy of such a measure. It seems to me that it is intended to support what is already growing on our coast—a shipping ring; and, whilst a measure to deal with rings and trusts is also promised by the Government, I think it will be found very difficult to handle that question in such a Bill. I do not suppose that the Minister will attempt to lay it down that the rates shall not be uniform, and if they are uniform I think this Bill will fail to operate, as similar measures have done elsewhere. The only other matter to which I wish to allude is that of preferential trade. I notice that the reference to this question is put very gently in the Governor-General's speech, which reads—

My advisers observe with gratification recent utterances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, advocating the encouragement of trade relations between various parts of the Empire.

If we can judge from the telegraphed reports of Mr. Chamberlain's utterance—and I do not think we should hold him to them until the full text of his speech is available—it is not encouragement of trade, but compulsion of trade at which he aims. The idea is that trade shall be compelled to go in a certain direction. Now, I have a great suspicion of the compulsion of trade in any form. Just as the leader of the Opposition, in quoting Mr. Gladstone, said that we have been left free to buy our experience in any market, so we have been left free to buy or sell our goods in any market. That is a privilege for which we ought to be grateful, and one which we ought to hesitate before we give up. Under the new system, if it is ever adopted, we shall not be able to decide a Tariff for ourselves in what we consider the best interests of our own country. Word will come from Great Britain and other parts of the Empire that we must not do this or that, or retaliatory steps will be taken. Instead of offering, as it is supposed to offer, grounds for more cordial relationship between the mother country and her daughters, the system offers every opportunity for dissension, disagreement, and perhaps disruption, and its adoption would be the entering on a very dangerous course. I am at one with the honorable member for Parramatta—who put the matter so well—in having no belief that Great Britain will adopt such a system. What would it mean? According to the telegrams it means, not merely arrangement with the States of Australia and other parts of the Empire, but it also means concessions to, in return for concessions from, the other powers of Europe. That implies a Tariff so extensive and so high in Great Britain that I do not believe for a moment the people there will entertain any such proposal. As to the questions of administration to which I have alluded, I should have liked to hear the Minister for Trade and Customs before I spoke, so that I might know, after his tour through the States and his experience at different meetings—very pleasant experience for the most part—and, after his interviews with different Chambers of Commerce, to what extent he is prepared to modify that administration of the Customs which has met with criticism so severe. I shall, however, have to do without the assistance which would have been rendered by that speech. In regard to the remark of the Prime Minister, about rich importers and poor sailors, I have to say that we are bound to look at this question apart altogether from the richness or poverty of those concerned. We desire to see even-handed justice extended to all, and to see no unnecessary interference with trade and commerce, which are the life blood of the community.

Mr. SALMON.—So long as trade is honestly conducted.

Mr. THOMSON.—I quite agree with that remark. I am afraid that in this, as in other matters, Ministers who get extreme powers are inclined to use them to the fullest extent not only in extreme cases, but in the most ordinary cases. In Sydney the Minister for Trade and Customs alluded, rather unkindly, perhaps, to a member of one of these Houses, whose speeches, he said, were like the reading of the Riot Act, inasmuch as every one fled when they began. I do not think that was a justifiable remark, but rather that the Minister and others would have found a great deal of benefit by staying to hear the speeches.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I said the speeches were as good as the Riot Act or "God Save the King."

Mr. THOMSON.—If we gave the Minister a Riot Act he would read it at every street discussion, judging from the way in which he administers the powers already invested in him. These powers are not extraordinary, but may be found in many Customs Acts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister says that he is the only honest Minister for Customs there has ever been in Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. THOMSON.—We will accept it that the Minister is an honest, though not the only honest, Minister. Some of these powers were given to the Minister before the Federal Tariff came into force, when he was administering the State Tariffs. How is it that they were never exercised then?

Mr. SALMON.—For a very good reason in Victoria.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am not speaking of Victoria; there are other States which have equally drastic provisions of the kind. When we gave the Minister the powers under the Federal Act, it was understood he would exercise them with a discretion similar to that he had shown in exercising the powers under the State Acts.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Does the honorable member mean with the discretion complained of in Queensland, which allowed the revenue to be robbed and honest merchants plundered? I did not know of the cases until they were brought under my notice by merchants.

Mr. THOMSON.—Why did not the Minister put in force the powers he had under the State Act?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I did as soon as I got the chance.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Minister had the chance immediately he took over the department, but he did not avail himself of it.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I sent men out to look after the matter.

Mr. THOMSON.—When the Customs Bill was before Parliament, the drastic nature of these powers was recognised by many honorable members, who had not perhaps observed that there were similar powers in other Customs Acts, and they were thought very severe, and, if unwisely used, dangerous. But the Minister assured the House that discretion would be used and that no honest man need fear. Honest men may not fear, but they suffer.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I referred to honest and careful men.

Mr. THOMSON.—In the other Chamber, Senator O'Connor, in reply to an objection that one section might be used with too much severity, and a fine of £5 imposed for a trifling mistake, said—

Of course, with regard to these trifling matters which are always used as an illustration, the answer is, in the first place, in 99 cases out of 100 there will be no prosecution over these small things, and in the second place, if there is it is not likely they will be pressed in any way for the recovery of the few shillings, or the pound or so, which may be involved.

Has there been any fulfilment of that undertaking? There is good ground for reasonable leniency in the administration of such a Tariff at its early stages. The Tariff is difficult of interpretation, the lines that divide different classes of duty being narrow and vague in many cases. The difficulty is proved beyond doubt by the hundreds of decisions the Minister has given, and by the fact that many of these decisions are contrary—that a second decision cancels the first. That shows the difficulty of interpretation even by the framer of the Tariff. There have been prosecutions against individuals for breaches of the Act, and afterwards a decision has been given by the Minister showing that the view taken by the importer was a correct one.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Nay.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Minister stopped the goods of several firms in Melbourne.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member mentioned prosecutions.

Mr. THOMSON.—There have been prosecutions in connexion with cases where a decision was afterwards altered.

Mr. KINGSTON.—To what cases is the honorable member referring?

Mr. THOMSON.—I am speaking from memory, but I shall look up the cases. I could not even tell the Minister now what are his contrary decisions; but he himself knows there are a considerable number; and if any action was taken under the first decision it is patent that under the second decision a prosecution would not stand.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is not so.

Mr. THOMSON.—It must be so.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It is not so; there have been prosecutions only from misstatements in regard to the nature and value of goods.

Mr. THOMSON.—There have been prosecutions of every description of offence, errors involving from 2s. 8d. to hundreds of pounds.

Mr. KINGSTON.—For misstatements of goods or value.

Mr. THOMSON.—And for perfectly evident errors, where no fraud at all was involved. Surely the Minister must never read the newspapers.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not rely much on some of the newspapers.

Mr. THOMSON.—If the Minister sees the newspapers he must know that magistrate after magistrate has regretted extremely having to impose fines in cases which they thought should not have been brought into court.

Mr. MAUGER.—Magistrates say that about every law.

Mr. THOMSON.—I was not aware of that, but I suppose I must take the honorable member as an authority. I may say that Judges have even refused to accept the law, as is shown in a case reported in the newspapers.

Mr. KINGSTON.—What does the honorable member think of such Judges?

Mr. THOMSON.—In the case to which I refer, the Judge said the law was against natural justice; and so it was.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Can the honorable member mention the case?

Mr. THOMSON.—It was the case of an illicit still which was discovered on land over the crop of which somebody had a lien. When the party went to reap the crop he was arrested for having this illicit still, and because he did not bring evidence—though there was no statement or evidence of his guilt—to prove that he was innocent, as he was bound to do under the section of the Customs Act, which provides that persons shall be deemed guilty until they have proved their innocence, he was convicted. On appeal, the Judge said that such a law was against natural justice.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No Judge ever set aside the plain terms of the law on such a ground.

Mr. THOMSON.—The case I refer to was reported in one of the Melbourne newspapers on, I believe, the 23rd of April, and I shall endeavour to get the extract.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It must be from a reputable paper, and further corroborated by the facts.

Mr. THOMSON.—Whenever a member of the Ministry is in a corner, it is newspapers reports which are wrong; and now it appears that the same view is taken not only in regard to reports of speeches, but also in regard to Judges' decisions. I am sorry I have not the newspaper extract here, and I should not have mentioned the case but for an interjection, but I have it on the premises, and I can show it to the Minister. Another reason for breaches of the law is the improper system whereby duties are imposed on goods according to the use to which they are to be put. Certain articles are dutiable if they are to be used for certain purposes; and they are not dutiable if they are to be used for other purposes.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Will the honorable member give me an instance?

Mr. THOMSON.—“Lining” is such an article, and there are many others. I objected strongly to such duties on every occasion when they came before us. I pointed out that an honest man who imported such goods might know that a certain quantity of them would be used for a purpose for which they were not dutiable, and another quantity for a purpose for which they were dutiable, and, with every desire to be just he would be unable to know what duty he should pay on the whole importation. An extremely honest man might pay duty upon everything imported, while a man who was not honest would pass the whole without the payment of the duty, as imported for a purpose which rendered them non-dutiable. That system has given an opening for the evasion of customs duties, and similar openings are given in many other directions. The first case which I will lay before honorable members does not display undue severity in the collection of revenue on the part of the Minister, but rather laxity in that respect. A petition on the subject is already before the House. The Colonial Sugar Refining Company allege that 9,000 tons of sugar have escaped the payment of excise duty, and they have asked for an inquiry into the matter. I know nothing of it personally, but a statement of the facts has been given to me, and I will briefly recite it to the House. The company say—

The Tariff was imposed on the 8th October, 1901, and all the sugar in our stores in Brisbane was taken possession of then and duty levied thereon as it went into consumption. Part of stock consisted of raw sugar bought from other manufacturers, and therefore in second hands: such sugar was also seized in the stores of the Millaquin Refinery.

In addition, all sugar made and bought by us in Queensland—whether on board steamers on the 8th October, or at our mills—was taken possession of, either in the mills or stores, or on delivery at the refineries, the only exception being some 30 tons in a store belonging to a forwarding agent at Mackay, of which no notice was taken.

At the same time five manufacturers in Queensland—one refiner and four mill-owners—held about 9,000 tons of white sugar, which was regarded by the Customs as exempt from duty. It is believed that most of this sugar had been removed from the factories prior to the 8th October, but a quantity was, we have been informed, on steamers in Queensland waters, and the remainder was in the stock, custody, and possession of the manufacturers in Brisbane and elsewhere. In at least one instance the sugar was, we understand, in buildings owned by the manufacturer.

On the 18th October, the Collector of Customs in Brisbane was asked why he had not levied duty on the sugar, and a few days later the matter was reported verbally to the Comptroller in Sydney, further representation being made to him in Melbourne on the 31st October on the subject.

No considerable quantity of the sugar in question had by that time been disposed of, as all buyers had stocked up before the duty was imposed.

As the Comptroller had stated officially that this 9,000 tons of sugar should pay duty, we thought justice would be done to us, so did not appeal to Parliament at the time; but further remonstrances were addressed to the department during November, and on the 10th December we received a letter stating that the matter was under the consideration of the Minister.

Nothing more was heard from the Customs, and, as it was generally supposed in Queensland that the duty collected on the stocks of sugar on the 8th October would be given up, further action was not taken until the sugar duties had been discussed in the House, when the statement of the Minister showed that he intended to retain the money thus collected. An appeal was therefore made to the Senate for an amendment of the Act, so that the legality of the proceedings of the Minister could be tested in the Courts, but the majority voted against such amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Was all this set out in the petition presented to the House?

Mr. THOMSON.—Not all of it. These are further particulars which I asked for—

It is to be noted that all proceedings taken by the department in this matter have been legalized under sub-section (b) of section 5 of the Excise Tariff Act, which provides that the stocks liable to duty were those "subject to the control of the Customs, or to excise supervision, or in the stock, custody, or possession of, or belonging to any brewer, distiller, or manufacturer, or refiner thereof."

The only sugar under the control of the Customs in Queensland was that on board steamers; what we had was seized. It is said that a portion of the 9,000 tons was on steamers at Bundaberg, or in Brisbane, or between these ports; if so, this was not taken for duty.

The stocks under excise supervision were those held by the brewers; in no case, we understand, was duty charged on these. The whole of the 9,000 tons above alluded to were unquestionably in the stock, custody and possession of the manufacturers, and under the Excise Act the Customs could at once have demanded full particulars as to places of storage, etc., so that the duty might have been collected. This was not, however, to our knowledge, done in any instance, and the Brisbane collector was allowed to override the Comptroller, who, as before stated, regarded the sugar as subject to duty, and held that its exemption was an injustice to other manufacturers who were compelled to pay.

The view of the department on this point is set forth in the following ruling, of which a copy has been forwarded to us:—"If this sugar was manufactured before the 8th October, 1901, and on that date still belonged to the manufacturer, it is undoubtedly dutiable under paragraph (b) of section 5 of Excise Act 1902. This applies to all sugar belonging to the manufacturer thereof on the 8th October, 1901, notwithstanding it may not be in his possession on that date, or afterwards returned to his possession."

It is clear that in the last sentence "in his possession," should be read as meaning "in his premises," because the minute referred to certain sugar which had been removed from a mill in September, 1901, and returned thereto a year afterwards; and it shows that the department considered all sugar so removed was dutiable. Why, then, was not any effort made to collect the duty on the 9,000 tons? The sugars seized in Brisbane and elsewhere in Queensland, which belonged to us, were in every instance in buildings free of Customs or Excise supervision at the time the Tariff was introduced.

The suits entered by us against the Customs are to determine the legality of the seizure on the 8th October, and raise a number of difficult points of law. None of them touch or can touch in any respect the question of the exemption from duty of certain stocks here alluded to, which is a matter of administration solely, and cannot be reviewed by a Court as the law stands now.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Has there been any determination to exempt the sugar from duty?

Mr. THOMSON.—The department has not charged duty upon it. The best way of exempting an article from duty is not to charge duty upon it, and to let it go into consumption.

Mr. KINGSTON.—If any one owes money to the department he will be made to pay it.

Mr. THOMSON.—The department cannot collect the revenue upon this sugar if it has been allowed to go into consumption.

Mr. KINGSTON.—If the duty was ever due it can be sued for as a Crown debt.

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not think that under the circumstances it can be recovered. However, it would have been better to collect it ten days after the Tariff was passed.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Undoubtedly it would have been better to collect it immediately it became due.

Mr. THOMSON.—If the statement I have read is correct, the opportunity to collect it was not taken. I am not responsible for the accuracy of this statement, though I asked that every care should be taken in compiling it. If the statement is correct, and the Minister could not collect the duty on the 18th October, 1901, how can he collect it now?

Mr. KINGSTON.—There was no authority for exempting any one from the payment of duty, and any one who owes duty will be called upon to pay it.

Mr. THOMSON.—The time to ask for payment was when the duty became due.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The matter is a subject for inquiry.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, and an inquiry has been several times asked for on the facts alleged. Before the Minister spoke in Sydney the managing director of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company wrote a letter to the Sydney newspapers, drawing his attention to the matter. The letter repeats some of the statements which I have already read, and which I will not read over again; but the writer goes on to say—

Our first petition was to the Senate, and all that the Government could advance against it was a remark by Mr. R. E. O'Connor that our clear statements of bare fact were impossible and incredible.

To the next petition, which was sent to the Governor-General (i.e., the Executive), the reply was that the Minister of Customs—at whose door the charges were laid—had ascertained that no discrimination was exercised by his officers in the collection of the excise duty.

That is not a reply at all. I think that the truth or otherwise of the non-payment of duty on the 9,000 tons should have been alluded to. It should have been stated whether the sugar existed to the knowledge of the Customs' officials, and why, if it so existed, it was not charged with duty.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The petition stated that there had been discrimination. The officer reported that nothing of the kind had occurred, and information was given accordingly.

Mr. THOMSON.—If the sugar did not pay duty, a discrimination was shown.

Mr. CONROY.—The Colonial Sugar Refining Company did not send any one to the Minister to represent their case in a proper manner.

Mr. THOMSON.—In connexion with the next step taken—the passing of a resolution by the four principal chambers of commerce in Australia, calling for an inquiry into the matter—I might point out that the members of those bodies were no more interested in the people who paid the duty than in those who did not pay. The writer of the letter says—

The third step taken was a representation by the four principal Chambers of Commerce in Australia, to the Prime Minister, that an inquiry was called for in the matter, and it is significant that after several months Sir Edmund Barton has not been able to find a word of justification or even apology for his colleague's action.

Another Minister has, however spoken—the Attorney-General—who last week in a newspaper interview is reported to have said, first, that we were moving in the matter because we wanted the money paid by us to be returned, and, secondly, that so long after the event it would be difficult to prove anything.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Did they ask for a refund of the duty?

Mr. THOMSON.—Here is an answer to that question. Mr. Knox writes—

As to the first remark I have to say that it is not true.

This refers to the suggestion that it was desired that there should be a refund of the duty. Mr. Knox proceeds to say—

Mr. Deakin ought to know that the Customs cannot return any duties which have been legally levied.

That is so. The company recognised that if the duty were legally levied they would have no right to escape their responsibility for its payment, on the ground that the authorities had not made a similar levy upon others who might be equally chargeable, and they knew that the question as to whether the duty could be legally levied at all was one to be determined by the courts. The letter which I have read is a very strong one, which should receive the attention of any Minister. It is as much in the Minister's own interests as in the interests of the Customs administration generally that I bring this matter forward. The whole question should have been inquired into at an earlier date. Requests have been made for an inquiry, and yet the Minister has not taken any action. If he is able to say that he has done so, I shall be only too pleased to hear him.

Mr. KINGSTON.—There was no discrimination exercised in favour of any one. My instructions were to collect any duty that was available.

Mr. THOMSON.—I did not say that there was any intentional discrimination, but if the facts are stated correctly discrimination was exercised. I do not know whether that was done by the Minister, or by some one else connected with the Customs, but the Minister must be held responsible for his officers in the same way as merchants are held responsible for the acts of their clerks. There is the strongest reason for inquiry into the points whether the sugar was in store as reported, whether the Comptroller stated that it was liable to duty, and whether the duty has or has not been collected. I do not vouch for the correctness of the statements which I have read to the House, but I have given them as they were conveyed to me. At all events, the case is one which calls for the closest inquiry by the Minister, and information should be furnished to the House as early as possible as to whether that duty was collected. If it was evaded, we should be told why the officers of the Customs or the Minister allowed the evasion, when the matter was reported to one of their departments on 10th October, further reported at a later date, and again on the 31st October, whilst correspondence and petitions have been passing on the matter ever since. There is another point to which I desire to direct the attention of honorable members, namely, the dangerous system that has arisen, partly under the powers given by this House in connexion with the Tariff, of allowing what is practically legislation by the Minister. I find list after list, some of them very long ones, exempting goods classed as minor articles for use in manufacture. Scores of instances might be quoted under this heading where articles are required to pay a duty if they are designed for one purpose, and are admitted free if they are said to be intended for use in manufacture. I took several articles haphazard from a list extending over at least two columns of the Commonwealth Gazette, which were enumerated under the heading of "Manufacture of Vehicles." Included among these are—"Couplings (shaft and pole); hinges (concealed and butt); joints (concealed); shackles; seat slides; staples (breeching). These, and a number of other articles appearing under the same headings will leave hardly any of the component parts of a vehicle subject to duty. Now, that is a very dangerous power for any Minister to exercise. Then we come to the taxation of substitutes, and I think the Minister has taken a wrong view of his duty in this respect. I tested this very question in New South Wales, and a decision was secured in favour of the view to which I am about to give utterance. Articles which were well known at the time the Tariff was introduced, should not be taxed as substitutes for other articles. We had the power to tax such articles when the Tariff was before Parliament; and if the Minister desired them to be included in the dutiable list, he should have applied to Parliament for the necessary authority. If these articles were well known to the Customs at the time the Tariff was passed, they ought not subsequently to be taken as substitutes for other known articles. Just consider for a moment how far the system adopted by the Minister might extend. Any food preparation might be held by the Minister to be a substitute for some other food, and he might in this way impose duties upon articles which had been left free. I have not time to go through the whole of the Minister's decisions upon this point, but I have noticed two articles which, according to the Customs authorities, come within the category of substitutes, but which I say should not be so regarded. For instance there are mica chimneys. These articles have been imported for years, and were well known to the Customs at the time the Tariff was under consideration, and should then have been taxed if they were considered to be fit subjects for duty. Another article is curled fibre, which is also well known, and is now regarded by the Customs as a substitute for curled hair. We had an opportunity of taxing this article if we had chosen, but the Minister did not ask us to do so. Now, however, it is declared to be taxable as a substitute. The case of cartridges and the shot contained in them has already been mentioned. Under the Tariff cartridges were declared to be non-dutiable, but shot was made dutiable. I quite agree that there is some inequality in this, and if the Minister brings in a measure to make dutiable the shot contained in cartridges, I shall support him on the ground of justice. But when the matter was before Parliament it was decided, notwithstanding the fact that they might contain shot, that cartridges should not be dutiable. In spite of this the Minister has taken upon himself to legislate, not merely outside the authority of Parliament, but in the face of the decision of Parliament, and has endeavoured to impose a duty upon the shot contents of cartridges. It has been pointed out to me that cartridges appear upon the free list in the Tariff guide prepared by the Customs department, and yet a duty was sought to be imposed upon them. I am very glad that the Minister has issued the Tariff guide, upon which a great deal of work has been expended, and which will prove very useful to the trading community. I do not intend to weary the House by reference to the various autocratic actions of the Minister to which exception has been taken from time to time. If honorable members want to find instances, let them refer to Senator Pulsford's lists. In regard to many of the complaints, no reply has been given by the Minister, and no doubt Senator Pulsford will direct attention to these cases in another place. I shall refer to only one case, in which a gentleman in Sydney was concerned. This gentleman endeavoured to obtain a hearing at the recent meeting of the Minister in Sydney, but he was not allowed to speak. I do not wonder at his indignation. The facts are these—The Fuller Carrying Company passed an entry for an invoice relating to 22 cases containing 441 separate items. There were two mistakes in the entry, one being an error in excess to the extent of 25s., and another an error under which the duty paid was 17s. short. Balancing one item against the other the department still stood with 8s. to the good. The importer, however, was brought up to the court on account of the shortage of 17s., and was fined. I believe that the Minister has stated that the fact of the over-payment was not brought to light until the case came into court.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMSON.—But when the over-payment was brought to light the case was not withdrawn, and the man who had actually paid the Customs too much was fined. Not only so, but before he could get delivery of his goods, although he had over-paid 8s., he had to enter into a bond, and obtain sureties, that if the goods were forfeited their value would be paid. Further, although the goods were landed in October last, the bond was only cancelled by the Collector of Customs on the 28th of last month.

Mr. PAGE.—How much was he fined ?

Mr. THOMSON.—Five pounds.

Mr. PAGE.—Did not the Minister return the fine ?

Mr. THOMSON.—He had not done so when he spoke in Sydney the other day.

Mr. PAGE.—The money should be returned.

Mr. THOMSON.—Cases of this unjust nature naturally provoke indignation. I do not intend to quote any more of these instances, because they are very numerous, and it would only occupy the attention of the House unnecessarily. At the same time I must admit that the Minister is to some extent moving from the untenable position which he assumed when he first undertook the administration of the Tariff. I do not complain of that, because I think the right honorable gentleman is moving in the right direction without endangering the revenue. But I would point out that the change which he is making, is, in itself, an indication that injustice has been done in the past. At one time the right honorable gentleman said that no discrimination ought to be exercised, that the courts should decide whether the cases which came before them involved fraud or merely error, but that he would not take it upon himself to decide the matter. Only the other day, however, in replying to a deputation from the Sydney Chamber of Commerce—and I congratulate him on the spirit which animated him on that occasion—he said that a discrimination is being exercised. Mr. Rogers remarked—

It was only the intention of Parliament that those extraordinary powers should be exercised, not in cases of trivial error, but in cases where there is an attempt to defraud.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is another incorrect report.

Mr. THOMSON.—I will not be certain, but I think that I saw the statement recorded in both newspapers.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It is wrong. What I told the deputation was that importers must declare to the authorities the nature of the goods and their value.

Mr. THOMSON.—Further on Mr. Wall said—

He (the Minister) should be satisfied with genuine invoices giving the proper values and discounts, supported by a bill through a bank.

Mr. Kingston.—I quite agree with you that no importer should be prosecuted for a mistake in the duty, and I have put that in the letter to you. All I can say is I will sanction no prosecution of any importer so long as he properly describes the goods and gives their proper value. I will look after the rate.

Mr. Wall.—The practice does not bear that out.

Mr. Kingston.—I will look after that.

That is, so far, a step in the right direction.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That was done nine months ago.

Mr. THOMSON.—Mr. Wall is a gentleman who passes hundreds of entries per day through the Customs, and he says that it is not the practice. I admit that the Minister may have given the instruction nine months ago, because on several occasions I have discovered that his instructions have not been properly carried out.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I was sitting with the Collector of Customs at the moment Mr. Rogers read the letter, and he assured me that my instructions had been carried out.

Mr. THOMSON.—Another matter which calls for attention has reference to the long delays which have taken place in obtaining decisions. Frequently six, nine, and twelve months have elapsed. I know of one case in which goods were held for six months when the only thing required was a decision. I admit that the Minister has been burdened with work, and that for a time his health was not good. But there are officers in his department who are quite as capable of dealing with these matters as he is. If the work is getting too much for him some of the higher officials who are familiar with the policy which he has adopted should be allowed to decide them, thus facilitating prompt settlements.

Mr. SALMON.—But the Minister would be responsible.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Minister is responsible for a great many more things than his officers do. Recently we saw in the public press that when the Treasurer took charge of the Customs department, in the absence of the Minister, these decisions on long-standing undecided cases came out in scores, if not in hundreds.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member complained a little time ago that there were too many decisions.

Mr. THOMSON.—I did not say there were too many. I said that the number of separate interpretations by the Minister illustrated the difficulty of reading the Tariff. Then again, I think we should require some consistency from Ministers in the administration of their departments. For example, we find the Postmaster-General administering his department in one way and the Minister for Trade and Customs controlling his in quite another. As illustrating my remarks, I would direct attention to the following notice relating to the administration of the Postal department which appeared in a Melbourne paper of the 25th April, in reference to letters, money orders, &c., being enclosed in packets—

Senator Drake has been exercising the discretionary power given him by the law to fine rather than to prosecute. In some cases he has fined offenders as much as £1, but this regulation has been broken so frequently of late that the Postmaster-General wishes to notify that he may order prosecutions for the future.

These two departments therefore are managed in entirely different ways.

Mr. SALMON.—Does the honorable member suggest that the Minister should deal with those cases himself, because that would be a very dangerous practice?

Mr. THOMSON.—There is not the least danger in what I propose. I do not offer these criticisms from the stand-point of an opponent. The Minister for Trade and Customs knows that I have always been willing to make any suggestions I could to improve the administration of the Customs, and if he chose to adopt them I should be amply awarded by the knowledge that the department was working more smoothly in its relations with the public. But I desire to see all unnecessary friction removed. I am with the Minister in declaring that in all cases in which the element of fraud is present, or appears to be present, the importer should not be spared from a prosecution. But I do say this—that the inequality of Customs administration is not justified. And there is an inequality. There should be less discrimination than there is. There is now a discrimination between fixed duty entries and ad valorem duty entries. If a merchant makes a mistake, say weights, in a fixed duty entry, that mistake is corrected by the Customs, there is an end of the matter. But if he makes an equivalent mistake in an ad valorem duty entry he has to go to the court, because he has signed a declaration as to the accuracy of his statement. The offence is the same; but in the one case there is no prosecution. Why? Because it is claimed that the Customs have the goods there and can weigh them. But they have a far surer way of checking an ad valorem entry. They have the invoice, which is sworn to be the genuine invoice, and they have an opportunity of comparing that with the entry. Surely the sensible thing is for the Minister to say as he has said—although I fail to see that he fully carries out his principle—“I will be satisfied if you give a full disclosure and present to me the genuine invoice and the genuine goods at the wharf.

As to any error in your duty or any error that may enter into a declaration, my clerks are there to check your statements." In transactions between different merchants, if an overcharge is made by one to another, there is no part of the British Empire where that is treated as a crime and the man is taken into a court. The clerks of the other merchant are there to check, and as long as honest data upon which the calculation is formed are given to the Customs the Minister need require nothing more. If it is thought necessary to discourage error in the calculations based on each data, let there be fines for mistakes, and let them be imposed at once, as a matter of rule, by the officers receiving the entry. The Minister has power to impose fines. Let there be fixed fines imposed. The Minister can if he likes fine merchants 10s., £1, or any other sum for each error that is made. That is one way to secure correctness. If he demands full disclosures both of goods entered under fixed duties and ad valorem duties he has full security, and then if mistakes are made let him fine the individuals concerned indiscriminately without dragging them into the police courts. If a person commits an offence with the post-office by insufficiently stamping a letter the receiver is fined. Why should not the Customs adopt the same practice? There would be nothing in it which would assist evasion of duties on the part of those dealing with the Customs. Let the Custom-house be conducted on the most rigid lines as to honesty, but there is no need for all this friction, disturbing the good relations which should exist between the trading community of Australia and the Customs authorities. There are dishonest persons in the community who will try by every means and system to rob the revenue of large sums. At present the proceedings of the Custom-house suggest to me that the Minister and his staff are so busy catching mice that they cannot catch tigers—and the tigers are those persons in the community who will seek by every device to rob the Customs. We want those persons to be exposed, not a multitude of trivial errors which will occur in business. As to the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act, the Prime Minister states that his administration is in accordance with the intent of Parliament, and absolutely in accordance with the terms of the law. He says that he intends to administer the whole

Act in strict accordance with the law. I interjected while he was speaking that I did not recognise the accuracy of that statement. I will now endeavour to show that I was right in my view. If we look at the debates on the occasion of the introduction of that measure we find this statement, which was made by the Prime Minister, and which enabled him to get the powers which the Act conferred upon him. The right honorable gentleman said, alluding to a previous speaker—

He also knows that Governments must be credited with common sense, or it is no use committing to them the administration of such measures at all. This amount of common sense and discretion must be credited to the present Government and its successors.

Then he says further on—

I have told honorable members why we think it necessary to take large power, namely, because large powers are necessary to deal with the cases which we have to meet, and also because it is necessary to give a large discretion to the Government in the belief that they will not act harshly in those cases which are not within the evil we wish to meet.

That is the common covering request which secured the passage of the Act in its present form. Of course the amendment was not then in the Bill, but what did the Prime Minister say as to the object of the amendment. He said—

As to the other question, I think the amendment is a fair one. It tends to prevent the admission into the Commonwealth of persons who especially if they are not well educated, will be probably—or may be at any rate—brought here in ignorance of our industrial conditions, and who will thus enter into bargains which they would not have made if they had had the opportunity of observing the working of our institutions.

That is one thing the Prime Minister said; here is another—

Moreover, this legislation has the further disadvantage of guarding against the making of agreements of which the workmen who made them would repent as soon as they landed on our shores. I think the amendment is a fair one, and shall, therefore, support it.

These are the assurances given to us by the Prime Minister, and the intention of those who passed the measure was never that it should be exercised in the way it has been exercised. Other honorable members have quoted extracts which show that this was the opinion current in the House. When the Prime Minister says that if that is not the intent of the Act it is the law, and that he will administer the law to the letter, I reply that he will not do so, and that he is not doing so; further that if he did do so, then we should have to take out of his hands, or the hands of any Minister, a measure that would work such trouble and be so decidedly objectionable. Other provisions of the Act exclude all persons likely, in the opinion of the Minister, or of an officer, to become a charge on the public or any public charitable institution, persons suffering from infectious or contagious disease of a loathsome or dangerous character, persons who within three years have been convicted of an offence, not merely political, and sentenced to imprisonment for one year or longer and have not received pardon, and prostitutes or persons living on the prostitution of others. But it cannot be doubted for one moment that some members of these classes have come in since the Act was passed. It would be ridiculous to say that amongst the multitudes which have arrived and are arriving here such persons are not included. Does the Prime Minister stop them? No. Is he carrying out the terms of the Act? No.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—How did you learn that? Is it imagination? There is no basis of fact for the statement.

Mr. THOMSON.—I put it to the Prime Minister whether he dare tell me that since the Act was passed he has excluded all the arrivals that come under those descriptions?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Wherever I could find them out, I have done so just as I exclude those who are under contract.

Mr. THOMSON.—But how would the Prime Minister have to act if he wished to exclude all these undesirable persons, or a large portion of them?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That objection applies to all laws.

Mr. THOMSON.—It applies to many laws, but the Prime Minister says that it shall not apply to this law, because he is going to administer it in all its strictness. Is he administering those other portions of the Act in all their strictness?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—To the same extent as in the case of the hatters.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister excludes only those undesirable immigrants of whom he knows.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—How can I exclude those of whom I do not know?

Mr. THOMSON.—I am not saying that the Prime Minister can do so, but I am asking what action he would have to take in order to find out who are undesirable immigrants, of the classes I have just mentioned.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The same action as I would take in other cases.

Mr. THOMSON.—I may say that I have anticipated all the arguments that may be used by the Prime Minister, and I am quite prepared to answer them. In order to see that he was not allowing these undesirable people to come in, the Prime Minister would have to make all persons arriving prove that they were not undesirable. Was that horrible state of affairs anticipated when the Act was passed? What action did the Prime Minister take with the hatters? He made them prove that they were not prohibited immigrants. What I say he should do, if he administers the Act in such a case as he does in the cases of the other classes of undesirables, is to have a good prima facie case before he acts.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Act makes the existence of the contract or agreement a prima facie case.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Act allows the admission of those whom the Prime Minister considers to have the skill required in the Commonwealth.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Not until he has grounds for considering that to be the case.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister has to exclude all those undesirable people I have mentioned, but he does not do so until his attention is called to their entry, and then he only interferes if he has good reason to know that they are undesirable. But in the case of the hatters the men were imprisoned on board a steamer in Sydney Harbor before he had proof that they were undesirable. The Prime Minister may smile at the term "imprisonment," but a night in gaol, although perhaps not very serious or more severe than an all-night sitting of this House, is felt as an indignity, because it deprives the man of his liberty to move about the world like other men, and if wrongful entails heavy penalties on those in fault.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Those men could have walked ashore at any moment if they or their master had shown that they possessed special skill required in the Commonwealth.

Mr. THOMSON.—If the Prime Minister is going to put a specially severe interpretation on this section in response to pressure from anybody, it is time the provision was taken out of the Act.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I give the imputation of pressure an indignant and flat denial.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Or persuasion.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Or persuasion.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister may deny as he likes, but we have the papers before us, and we see that pressure was brought to bear.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is utterly untrue that at any time persuasion or pressure was attempted on me, and I have already said so to the honorable member.

Mr. THOMSON.—The pressure was from certain unions, who made an application.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I knew nothing of any such application until I gave my decision.

Mr. THOMSON.—The application was sent to the Prime Minister.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It may have been sent to another Minister, but I was not aware of it, and the honorable member ought to accept my denial.

Mr. THOMSON.—Did the Minister to whom it was sent not make any representation to the Prime Minister?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Not till after the decision. He simply sent the letter on without comment. I explained that in my speech.

Mr. THOMSON.—I only know that if similar action is to be taken in connexion with every man who comes to Australia, knowing or not knowing the conditions; if he is to be kept in prison—a bondsman on board ship—when perhaps he is perfectly entitled to enter the country, and the Prime Minister knows nothing to the contrary, then this clause must come out of the Act.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If the honorable member calls the ship a prison, each of these men had the key in his pocket.

Mr. THOMSON.—The men had not the key, and they were released only when they proved that there was no right to stop them. The Prime Minister knew that the Act was never intended to apply to these six men. The right honorable gentleman told us that the section is to prevent ignorant men, who do not know the conditions of the Commonwealth, being deceived, and he knew these men were aware of the conditions.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I knew nothing of the sort. I knew nothing but the fact that they were under contract.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister ought to have known.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—How could I know?

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister ought to have made inquiry.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—May I inform the honorable member, as I informed the House, that inquiry was made at Fremantle, and it was ascertained that these men gave the officers there no reason to believe they were under contract?

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not know anything about that, but it is perfectly absurd for Australia to exclude men who are being brought here to start industries, and who, before leaving their native country, have sought to secure their position by entering into an agreement which rendered them freer than if they had come without an agreement. The clap-trap which has been talked about their being bondsmen is a disgrace to the proceedings of a Legislative Assembly. A man is freer when he is free from the danger of poverty and want of employment, and has a secure position, than if he enjoys none of those advantages. The men themselves recognised that, because they asked for the agreement.

Mr. RONALD.—But if six can be brought out, why not 6,000? The principle is the same.

Mr. THOMSON.—The principle is not the same. When these men entered Sydney Harbor, they must have thought—"Here is a land which our forefathers discovered, and helped to settle, and whose people owe their liberty to those from whom we have sprung, and yet we are precluded from landing on its shores, when we are here, not as members of an invading army, or in immense numbers, to disturb its industrial peace, or in any way to injure it, but, on the contrary, to benefit it by the establishment of a new industry. We are not here without the consent of our union, because we carry certificates from our union in Great Britain. Furthermore, our admission has been agreed to by the Sydney union, which resolved that all agreements entered into by Mr. Anderson before 1st December should be recognised." The honorable member for Yarra had to admit that last fact to-night. The men were not objected to by the Sydney union, but some one in Melbourne—I am not going to impute motives, because I do not know them—made representation to two of the Ministers, and the men were stopped. The Prime Minister had his answer ready—"This is not a case in which I should interfere."

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Where is the justice of saying that, when I have already stated that I gave my decision before I knew of the existence of any union? No representation was made to me by any union until my decision was given.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Sydney union passed a resolution favouring the admission of the men. It was the Melbourne union which lodged an objection to their admission.

Mr. F. E. McLEAN.—How did the Prime Minister become aware of the existence of the contract?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Through the sub-collector of Customs in Sydney, who telegraphed the information. That was the only intimation I had at the time.

Mr. THOMSON.—The prima facie evidence that the men were required in Australia was as strong as the Minister could have desired.

Mr. RONALD.—Does the honorable member suggest that the Prime Minister should have winked at the law?

Mr. THOMSON.—He should have done in the first place what he did at the last. Does he intend to exclude all who come here until good reason is shown for not excluding them? The fact that a manufacturer thought it worth his while to send to England for the men, engaged them there at union rates of wages, and advanced their passage money, is prima facie evidence that they were required in Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is equivalent to saying that the contract which was a reason for excluding was also a reason for not excluding.

Mr. THOMSON.—In this case the existence of the contract was a reason as evidence of the need of the men for not excluding. The action of the Prime Minister has made Australia the laughing-stock of the world. If he intends to continue to administer the Act in that way, the sooner we get the section under which he acted expunged, or very materially altered, the better for the whole community, including the working classes themselves; because nothing could do more harm to unionism than an action such as was taken. If the Prime Minister carries out the other provisions of the law in the same way, he will have to make everybody who comes here prove that he is not a prohibited immigrant under the Act, and he is not prepared to do that. The Act is a discretionary measure. The Prime Minister, as I have proved by quoting his own words, asked for it as such. He told us we must trust the Government to administer it with due regard to common sense.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I was speaking of the education test, which is the only discretionary provision in the Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Prime Minister was speaking of the Act. He said "such measures."

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Any one would know from the tone of the debate that I was speaking of the education test.

Mr. THOMSON.—In all other cases the Minister does not exclude until he has the clearest proof that the persons whom his action affects are undesirable immigrants.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member is unable to appreciate the language of the Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am at least able to appreciate the absurd position into which the Prime Minister has got the Commonwealth. It is only too manifest, not only to the members of the Opposition, but to some of his own supporters and to the world at large. The Prime Minister stated last night that the irritation he noticed on this side showed the strength of his arguments. I suppose he is not unwilling that I should turn his remarks on himself.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If I have displayed irritation, it was because the honorable member did not appear to be ready to accept my disclaimer.

Mr. THOMSON.—I accepted the right honorable gentleman's statement, and did not repeat my own after it was made. The Prime Minister has expressed great indignation because he has been charged with having brought down a Tariff which was not in accord with the terms of his speech at Maitland. The Tariff was certainly not such as was expected by many of those who voted for him and for his supporters in New South Wales. I desire to point out further that either the Prime Minister did not know during the electoral campaign what the Tariff was going to be, or that he concealed it from the electors. It would have been easy for him to indicate the character of the Tariff. He might have announced that it would contain duties ranging from 10 to 15 per cent., or from 20 to 30 per cent., or from 40 to 50 per cent., as the case might require; but not one word was said as to the real weight of the Tariff, although questions were asked on more than one occasion. Either it had not been decided upon, or accurate information regarding it was withheld from the public. Therefore it is perfectly reasonable, now that the Tariff has been brought forward and put into force, that the people whom it affects should have a chance of expressing their opinion regarding it. If honorable members do not give the people that opportunity, they will take it for themselves. I know that in New South Wales the electors will not be content to bury the Tariff question, and I am quite in accordance with the leader of the Opposition in his determination to bring it forward. If honorable members on the other side are as confident of victory as they profess to be, why are they so little eager for the struggle?

Mr. RONALD.—We had enough of it here last year.

Mr. THOMSON.—Let me tell the honorable member that the people of the Commonwealth have already had enough of the Tariff, and that they wish to see it altered. I should have been only too delighted if, instead of adversely criticising the administration of Ministers, I could have expressed myself in terms of approval regarding their work. It would have been much more pleasant if the results of the first year of the Federal administration had been more generally satisfactory to the people of Australia, because apart from our fiscal differences, which will have to be settled by the people, much of the perfectly justifiable dissatisfaction with the Federal Government would have been removed by better administration on the part of Minister

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until tomorrow, at 10.30 a.m.

House adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 29 May, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

ST. LOUIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government have considered the matter of the representation of the Commonwealth at the great exhibition to be held at St. Louis next year, and, if so, what decision has been arrived at?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Government considered the matter some time ago, and came to the determination that it would not be desirable to spend the public funds upon the representation of the Commonwealth as such at the exhibition in question.

PAPERS.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—In laying on the table the following papers:—

Papers relating to the refusal of certificates of domicile to three Chinese.

Supplementary papers relating to the admission of certain boilermakers into Western Australia.

I desire to explain, regarding the latter, that I had to obtain the permission of the Premier of Western Australia before I could present them to the House. They consist of a letter from myself to him, and his reply, and although not official papers in the full sense, are, I think, necessary in order to complete the information presented to honorable members.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT ADMINISTRATION.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—The honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. Cameron, referred last evening to three British subjects who had been refused admission to the Commonwealth, and in order to remove all doubt I wish to explain that these three persons were not kept out for any reason other than those specified in the parts of the 3rd section of the Act which follow the provision for the education test. Two were prevented from landing on the ground that they were idiots, and the third was excluded as a person likely to become a charge on the public funds.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 28th May (vide page 291), on motion by Mr. L. E. GROOM—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—It is not my intention to speak at any length upon the Governor-General's speech. I have been informed by gentlemen of large experience in the framing of speeches from the Throne, that for the most part the debate upon the address in reply is regarded as advantageous to the Government, inasmuch as it affords Ministers an opportunity of judging from the speeches delivered by honorable members as to the measures with which they may successfully persevere, and those which may be judiciously abandoned or postponed. I do not therefore think it necessary to say very much regarding many of the Government proposals until they come before the House for full discussion. I think, however, that I might appropriately address myself to matters arising out of the administration of certain measures passed last session. So much has been said in opposition to the administration of the Minister of Trade and Customs, that it is unnecessary for me to add greatly to the volume of criticism directed against him. There is no doubt that he is the most unpopular administrator within the Commonwealth. At the same time, I believe that the course adopted by him will render the work of his successor in the department very much easier than it otherwise might have been. The services of the right honorable gentleman in connexion with the prevention and exposure of frauds are such as to entitle him to our warmest thanks; but the practice followed by him of requiring reports to be sent from far distant places, such as Port Darwin to Melbourne, in order that his decision may be given upon the cases to which they relate, and the tyranny exercised by him in small and unimportant matters will, I am afraid, destroy any moral effect that might have been produced by the honesty and impartiality of his administration. There is no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Customs—to say nothing of the Prime Minister, who seems to have vied with him in annoying the public—deserves the best thanks of the Opposition for having prepared the way for a very successful campaign against the Government, because the whole of the people of the Commonwealth are up in arms against their administration. We have heard a great deal about the successful legislation that has been enacted by this Parliament, and, so far as I can gather, the members of the labour party take to themselves most of the credit for passing into law the Franchise Act, the Electoral Act, the Immigration Restriction Act, and the Pacific Island Labourers Act. As a member of the Opposition, however, I claim to be amongst those who voted for these measures, and I affirm, further, that if it had not been for the attitude assumed by the Opposition, the Acts referred to would not have proved so beneficial in their operation. The Government were not always at the mercy of the labour party, but whenever anything was proposed for the benefit of the Commonwealth as a whole, they had to yield to the influence of the Opposition.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does not the honorable member consider that the labour party did good work?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have the greatest esteem for the members of that party. The liberals among them might very well sit upon this side of the chamber, but some of them are conservatives, from whom it will take some time to rub off the excrescences. This process, however, will be facilitated if they come much in contact with the honorable member for Darling, who is essentially a true liberal, although even he goes astray sometimes.

Mr. WATSON.—I believe the honorable member for Darling intends to contest the Robertson constituency at the next election.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have no fear of that, as I am sure that no one who is acquainted with my career will venture to meet me there. I notice one paragraph in the Governor-General's speech, which reads as follows:—

You will be asked to ratify an agreement between the Admiralty and the Government of the Commonwealth, which modifies the existing agreement, and secures for the naval defence of Australia the protection of a powerful and continuously efficient squadron of warships at a moderate cost.

I find that Sir Henry Parkes took to himself considerable credit for introducing, on the 24th November, 1887, a Bill embodying the substance of an agreement entered into between the Australian and British authorities with reference to the maintenance of a squadron on the Australian station. That agreement was ratified by the several States, and formed the basis of the arrangement now in force, under which the Commonwealth contributes £106,000 per annum towards the maintenance of the squadron. It is now proposed to increase the amount to £200,000 per annum. Article IV. of that agreement reads as follows :—

These vessels shall be under the sole control and orders of the Naval Commander-in-Chief for the time being appointed to command Her Majesty's ships and vessels on the Australian station. These vessels shall be retained within the limits of the Australian station, as defined in the Standing Orders of the Naval Commander-in-Chief, and in times of peace or war shall be employed within such limits in the same way as are Her Majesty's ships of war, or employed beyond those limits only with the consent of the colonial Governments.

If we admit the principle that we ought to contribute to the British Navy for defence purposes, I am of opinion that £200,000 is not sufficient. I agree with the suggestion made by the leader of the Opposition that the Australian squadron ought not to be employed beyond the limits of the Commonwealth without the consent of the Government. To my mind, that is a very wise stipulation to impose. The forts of Australia in themselves do not provide an adequate defence, in addition to which the floating trade of the Commonwealth must be protected. In times of peace it is of little consequence whether or not a large fleet is stationed in our waters. It is only in time of war that we require such protection. Therefore, I hold that the Government of the Commonwealth should be consulted before these warships are removed from Australia. No less an authority than Captain Mahan has declared that it is most difficult for the guns stationed in forts to strike a moving object. Several instances have recently come under our notice which confirm that view. It is within the recollection of every one that Admiral Dewey's fleet had almost passed the forts in Manila Bay before it was discovered, and when it was, the batteries on shore were unable to strike any one of his ships. I see by the sneer of the honorable member for Bland, that he assumes that the objective of any hostile fleet would be known long before it reached Australian waters, and that consequently we should be on the alert. But I would point out to him that whilst the forts at Sydney are well manned, and the submarine mines are under perfect control, similar conditions do not obtain in every port of the Commonwealth. During the Russian scare, nearly 20 years ago, I remember that a small Russian squadron appeared in St. Vincent's Gulf, passed Cape Borda, and anchored just beyond the Semaphore at Glenelg unnoticed, during the night. On that occasion it would have been quite possible for the Russians to capture Adelaide during the night, to loot the coffers of the banks and to make off with their treasure before breakfast. The instances which I have given evidence that it is quite possible for a hostile fleet to make a descent upon Australian shores without being observed. Commenting upon the Russian scare, the late Sir Henry Parkes declared that it was well known that Russia at that time had designs upon Australia. What was intended then could be easily accomplished by any great naval power to-day. Both the French and the Germans have established naval bases in the Pacific. Whilst Great Britain seems somewhat indifferent about her strength there, the French have been considerably increasing their fleet. They have a naval base at New Caledonia, and could very readily make a descent upon Australia. Consequently, if our ships were withdrawn from Australian waters, it is just possible that even some of the obsolete vessels belonging to the French—knowing that they would meet with no opposition—would swoop down and obtain a foothold upon our shores. The same remark is applicable to Germany. The Germans have secured a naval base in Samoa, which was given to them as a sop to prevent their taking hostile action against Britain in the Transvaal war. Samoa is within a short distance of New Zealand—no further indeed from it than is Melbourne, and in this connexion it should be remembered that the efficiency of the German Navy has excited even the admiration of England. Should Great Britain ever be defeated by a combination of the great Powers so that she could not provide Australia with an adequate naval defence, an enemy might very easily obtain a footing in Western Australia or Queensland.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no railway from Western Australia.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The construction of the transcontinental railway would not overcome the difficulty, because although it would enable us to concentrate troops there within a few days, in the interim the enemy would have scooped all the available treasure and have made off. A very great deal has been said in regard to the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act. During the past few days I have heard honorable members confess that they were not aware that the particular provision in that statute to which attention has been directed was so stringent as it appears to be. I do not plead any such ignorance. I find that the provision is most clear and explicit. Sub-section (b) of section 3 declares that any person who is likely, in the opinion of the Minister or of an officer, to become a charge upon the public or upon any public or charitable institution shall be excluded from the Commonwealth. That is a very proper provision. Then sub-section (g)—which was the provision applied in the case of the six hatters—declares that prohibited immigrants shall include “any persons under a contract or agreement to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth.” That section, however, must be read in conjunction with section 11, which says—

No contract or agreement made with persons without the Commonwealth for such persons to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth whereby such persons become prohibited immigrants within the meaning of paragraph (g) of section 3 shall be enforceable or have any effect.

The agreement entered into by these workmen became invalid as soon as they arrived in Australia. It is very clear, therefore, that the Act provides that if men are engaged abroad at a lower rate of wages than that which obtained in Australia, they may upon their arrival be excluded from the Commonwealth, because they have been brought here in ignorance of local conditions. If men have a knowledge of those conditions, or if they take the precaution to demand a fair rate of wage, they are eligible for admission; but the agreement is not binding upon them. That is a very proper provision, but it should not apply to British workmen brought here under agreement stipulating that they must receive the highest prevailing rate of wages and be paid overtime.

Mr. TUDOR.—Payment for overtime is not stipulated in the agreement.

Mr. MAUGER.—And it is not correct that these men were to receive the highest rate of wages.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am personally acquainted with Mr. Anderson, having known him as an honorable business man for ten or twelve years, and last night he told me that these men were paid at the highest—£3 per week—and overtime.

Mr. WATSON.—A wage of £3 per week is not at the highest rate.

Mr. TUDOR.—Mr. Anderson was giving £3 10s. per week to Victorian hatters.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There may be isolated cases in which men are in receipt of more than £3 or £4, or even £5 per week.

Mr. MAUGER.—They are not isolated cases.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It may be that men receiving these higher rates are managers of departments.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is wrong.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—At any rate I do not think that any workman will say that £3 per week is not a fair wage, or that in this particular trade it is not the highest rate prevailing.

Mr. TUDOR.—It is the minimum wage of the union—that is all.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The contention of the labour party is not, I think, that these men would have been admitted if the wages to be paid to them had been higher, but that the employment of such skilled artisans must of necessity compete with the employment of others already in Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not say anything of the sort. What is the use of misrepresenting?

Mr. MAUGER.—The very first letter sent by the Hatters Union said, on the contrary, that the men were heartily welcome, but that there was an objection to their coming under contract.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—These men were picked men from the Denton Mills near Manchester, and were to receive higher wages than they are paid in England.

Mr. MAUGER.—They might easily receive higher wages than are paid in England.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—As to the charge of misrepresentation, if honorable members will peruse the papers which are on the table of the House, they will see that these men were objected to, not because they were undesirable men in the interests of Australia, but because they were highly skilled men.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is not so; the objection was that they were under contract.

Mr. MAUGER.—Read the first letter that was sent by the union.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That letter contained the following:—

We offer no objection to the men as journey-men felt hatters, but strongly object to them under contract, as they receive regular work and wages, while men not so placed suffer from loss of time arising from the fluctuations of the demand for labour, thus giving those men undue advantage over all others.

Does not that mean that these hatters, if brought here, would come into competition with men already employed in the Australian trade?

Mr. MAUGER.—Into unfair competition.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I contend that I am not misrepresenting the case when I say that that was the sole reason for the objections raised to the admission of these hatters. Is not the meaning of the opposition of the labour party that if these men were employed in Sydney, they would cause competition with the Denton Hat Mills of Melbourne—that this competition might overtake the demand now supplied by the craft in Melbourne, and thus take away trade, and possibly throw men out of employment in the latter city?

Mr. WARSON.—If the honorable member for Robertson applies that remark to me, he is absolutely misrepresenting what I said.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I find that Mr. Smith, who represents the Hatters Union, wrote to this effect—

R. My memo. of yesterday's date, I have the honour now of forwarding you a copy of the agreement supplied by one of the men who have come out to work at the Sydney Hat Mills. I may add that Mr. F. T. Tudor suggested that I should interview you re the same, but I think you may be able to answer the questions in the previous memo. without a personal interview. If not, I shall be pleased to meet you at any time convenient.

The agreement made between Mr. Anderson and the hatters runs thus—

Mr. SPEAKER.—What the honorable member proposes to read was read last evening.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I was not aware that the agreement was read last night, and I have been challenged to refer to it. I desire to show that these men were employed at a high rate of wages.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. Surely it is admissible for an honorable member to read a statement which has already been read if he desires to point an argument? There is no rule to the contrary that I am aware of.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There are rules against undue repetition, and if an honorable member is simply reading a document which has been read at a previous stage of the debate, I shall certainly call his attention to the fact. I should be very far from preventing the reading of such document if an honorable member were desirous of raising a new argument. If the honorable member intimates that his object is to present a new argument or new interpretation I shall permit him to proceed.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I desire to make some comments on the agreement in reply to an interjection. The agreement is as follows:—

1. Charles Anderson agrees to engage the said Joseph Joules as planker and hardener, for a term of three years at a weekly wage of £3 per week, and the said Charles Anderson advances to the said Joseph Joules for his passage out, viz., £25, which shall be deducted from his wages by amounts of 10s. per week, until this sum of £25 is liquidated. Holidays not to be paid for.

2. Joseph Joules agrees that he is an efficient hand in planking and hardening, and that he is perfectly competent in his work. Also, Joseph Joules contracts to be sober, attentive to business, and to do his work to the satisfaction of the said Charles Anderson.

These men were brought out by Mr. Anderson, who advanced each of them £25 for the payment of his passage, and made provision for defraying the expenses of their families in England whilst they were on the way to Australia. The honorable member for Bland last night described these men as slaves who could not leave their work, although in the same breath he gave instances of men who were brought out under contract to work in the mines of New South Wales, and who broke their agreement by absconding.

Mr. SPENCE.—And were sent to gaol for doing so.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—And some of these men preferred to undergo that penalty to working at a lower rate of wages than that prevailing in Australia. These hatters were of the very same class as the miners; that is, they were unionists who stipulated for the highest rate of wages procurable in England or Australia.

Mr. SPENCE.—No, they did not.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am assured by Mr. Anderson that the agreement made with these men in England was merely provisional, seeing that under the Act it must become invalid as soon as they arrived in Australia. I am further informed that when the men did arrive another agreement was entered into with them.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does the honorable member say that these hatters signed a second agreement?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—They voluntarily entered into an agreement with Mr. Anderson to work at the same rate of wages as had been stipulated for in the previous contract. That was after the interview with the honorable member for Yarra, and I very much regret to find that an honorable member of this House should take so important a part in attempting to exclude British workmen of the very highest class who are brought here for the promotion of an industry which would be so largely beneficial to the Commonwealth. However, notwithstanding that these hatters knew the facts—notwithstanding the statement of the honorable member for Yarra that they were not aware of the Australian conditions when they entered into the first agreement—it is true that they entered into a fresh contract with Mr. Anderson.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does the honorable member really say that these men signed another agreement here?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—On the authority of Mr. Anderson, I say that another agreement was entered into with these men as soon as they landed in Australia.

Mr. TUDOR.—With the six hatters?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—With the six notorious hatters, and Mr. Anderson further informs me that one of the men, after entering into the second agreement, went away to New Zealand, leaving Mr. Anderson his creditor for something like £30.

Mr. MAUGER.—Serve him right!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Although the honorable member for Bland described these men as slaves, who would not follow the example of the miners and run away from their employment, the facts show that, without the intervention of the honorable member for Yarra, or Mr. Smith, the secretary of the union, they were well able to take care of themselves. The honorable member for Bland said—

On behalf of the labour party he wished to say that he had no objection to a number of British white people coming here to make homes for themselves and to assist in the development of Australia.

The honorable member for Bland intimated that he was then speaking on behalf of his party; and a member of that party is the honorable member for Yarra, who, with Mr. Smith, took a very active part in the endeavour to secure the exclusion of these competent men from Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not fair.

Mr. RONALD.—Is the honorable member for Robertson an authority on Acts?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am an authority on the Immigration Restriction Act, to the passing of which I was a party.

Mr. SPENCE.—How does the honorable member know that these men were competent?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Mr. Anderson himself stated that the man who went away to New Zealand was highly competent.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why did he go away?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I suppose he thought that New Zealand was a glorious country, where he might do quite as well as in Sydney, and by going there he had the advantage of clearing £30 by the fraud he was perpetrating on his employer. That was an inducement to him to leave Sydney. The honorable member for Bland said—

What they did insist upon was that these men should come free from any control as to their employment, and free to compete on equal terms with their fellow workmen.

These men were free to compete on equal terms, for we have the information that they voluntarily entered into another agreement when they knew the local conditions. After all the stir that had been made, after the members of the union in Victoria had interviewed them, and told them possibly, as the honorable member for Yarra intimates, of the conditions prevailing in the trade here—with all this information before them they were satisfied with the terms of the new agreement, and with the wages that were offered. I shall now refer to the administration of the Act by the Prime Minister. The Act is specific, and is satisfactory from my point of view. It specifies that no man shall be brought here in ignorance, and that if he is brought here under agreement, it shall be invalid as soon as he arrives. The men therefore were absolutely free, but the Prime Minister was most anxious to follow the dictation of representatives of the labour party, and prevent the admission of these men, who were brought out for the purpose of working in a new mill that would turn out goods in opposition to those manufactured in Melbourne. He made it his duty to follow the dictation of the labour party, and prevent these men from coming in, and, in order to prove that that was the case, I refer honorable members to a letter in this batch, which I shall not read for fear that it may have been read in my absence from the chamber, and in which the manager of the Denton Mills in Melbourne takes the trouble of saying that, while at one period of the year there are not sufficient men even for his own requirements in Australia, at other periods his men have to be worked overtime. He goes the length of putting upon paper these facts for the purpose of influencing the Prime Minister to prevent competent men from coming to Australia to work in a competing factory.

Mr. MAUGER.—Will the honorable member read that letter? It is a misrepresentation, because the managers of the Denton Mills supported the hatters coming in.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The letter is in the batch. The Prime Minister allowed himself to be used by the labour party for the purpose of keeping out these hatters, although the evidence was before him that they were skilled men, from the very fact that they were required in an industry which was not fully manned, and that they would receive the highest ruling rate of wages. It seems to me that the honorable member for Bland, who states candidly that he has no sympathy with the contention that we should keep Australia for ourselves and our families, takes a brief on behalf of the men who would wish to keep out of Australia competitors in their own line of life. Am I to understand that he leads a party—a small section of the community—who would make him a bond slave rather than a free man, that he must follow their behest, and see that hatters are not allowed to enter Australia, and compete with them in their particular craft, and that he would have the Act perverted? When he found that public indignation was aroused and contempt showered on the labour party for its action, then he said the Prime Minister should have acted more promptly—that is, that he should not have stopped the men coming in, I take it.

Mr. WATSON.—He did not stop them.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Before the honorable member went to New Zealand, he fairly egged on the union men to keep up the agitation against the admission of the hatters—I read his remarks in the press—while another honorable member was taking an active part in preventing the admission of skilled men, and bringing all the influence he could to bear upon the Government in their administration to pervert the true meaning of the Act respecting the importation of objectionable immigrants. I do not think it is necessary to go into other matters which are referred to in the speech. The Bills will be brought forward in due time, and shall receive my very careful consideration. I hope that the Government will not follow the dictation of any particular section of the House, but will administer the laws as they were intended to be administered, so that every citizen of the Commonwealth shall have full justice done to him.

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—There is a disposition in certain quarters to condemn the making of speeches on the address in reply. But I think it would be somewhat unreasonable if this well-established practice were put on one side. There are only a few occasions upon which honorable members are enabled to speak their minds upon general topics, and to criticise the administration to any extent—the address in reply, the Budget, and perhaps a motion of no confidence. These speeches clear the atmosphere, enable honorable members to express their views on many questions, which perhaps during the session they might not otherwise get an opportunity of discussing. Therefore, I think reasonable time should be allowed for discussing the topics in this opening speech. I should not have risen to speak but for the address delivered the other day by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, on the Murray River question, and the water question generally. So far as I can ascertain, the conduct of affairs by the Government has been giving very fair satisfaction throughout the country. Of course, opposition men, whether in or out of Parliament, will always find causes of offence on the part of the Government. Strike high or strike low, these opponents will never be satisfied, simply because the Government cannot please them, no matter what it does, or how long it stays in office. We can quite understand that attitude, and, of course, it discounts all their utterances. Under the somewhat stricter régime of the Commonwealth as regards customs administration and postal administration there will be a good deal of friction, until people get used to the new conditions. The stricter administration of the laws has been the cause of dissatisfaction. But when we consider the whole subject in a fair and impartial light; when we consider the new problems which have had to be solved, and the many changes which have had to be worked in various directions, when we consider the peculiar constitution of this House, and the way in which parties are balanced, I think it will be admitted that it would have been very difficult to obtain a Government who would have done better under the circumstances than has been done. The leader of the Opposition has been touring Australia. He has made the gravest charges; he has, so to speak, slated the Government in every possible way. But there has been very little response indeed to his attacks. In fact, it seems to me from what I have read that in every place he has left the Government in perhaps a little stronger position than it was in before he went there. He is very desirous of raising the fiscal question again. It is somewhat difficult to understand his attitude. He declines to take office, although his friends in the press say that it is waiting for him if he will only consent to sink the fiscal question. But he declines to take office unless he can lead a free-trade majority. Seemingly he is not very anxious for office, because he must know in his inner consciousness that the chance of his leading a free-trade majority in the House is very remote indeed. What the country wants is not a stirring up of fiscal strife, but rest, economy, and development. I should like to see the Parliament and the Government doing a little towards bringing about those three things. The opening speech is a very long one, and to me it is unsatisfactory in this respect, that it comprises nine or ten items which are associated with the expenditure of money to a very great extent, but does not contain a single item of expenditure for the development of the country, and helping the people to earn more money than they did before, and thus meet the increased expense which, to a certain extent, the Commonwealth has brought upon them. The speech fails very much in that respect. In Australia we have gone through very bad times indeed. We have had a terrible drought. We have seen our people driven off the land after having been there for very many years. There is only one remedy for that condition of affairs, and that is the development of our resources and increased production. From beginning to end of this speech, there is not a suggestion to help our people in any way. There are many ways in which that help might be given. There is not to my mind that leaning towards economical Government which the people expected to find in the speech. I represent a farming community, and so far as I can, I intend to preach economy and practice it. Whenever an expenditure is proposed, which in my opinion is not necessary in the country it shall have my opposition, no matter by whom it may be proposed. I think it would be a gross injustice to Australia at the present time to go to any great expense in selecting the federal capital. I am quite aware that it is provided in the Constitution that the capital shall be in New South Wales, and I am quite prepared to abide by the letter of that provision; but no time is specified. While I am quite content to see the site of the capital selected, I shall oppose any undue expenditure of money in that connexion at the present time.

Mr. WATSON.—Would it necessitate much expenditure immediately? I do not think so.

Mr. McCOLL.—As the honorable member knows, a Government or a Parliament always starts in a small way at first, but one thing leads on to another, and before it knows where it is it may be committed to a large expenditure, which, under present conditions in Australia, is not required, and cannot be justified. With regard to the capital, while I am content to see the site selected, I am not willing to go further. I am not anxious to keep the seat of government in Melbourne, and am quite content to put up with the inconvenience of travelling to Sydney to attend the meetings of Parliament. But I intend to oppose any undue expenditure. There is also the question of the establishment of the High Court. From what I am able to learn, it does not appear to me that the proposed expenditure upon the High Court is justified. I do not see that there is any need for running into great expense at the present stage. Apart from that, the salaries proposed under the Bill strike me as being extremely high. We are to have a Chief Justice at £3,500 a year, and four other Judges, each of whom will receive a salary of £3,000 per annum. That is not the worst of it; for if these men become incapacitated after a few years service they will be in receipt of large pensions. If the Chief Justice retires from the bench after six months service he will receive a pension of £700 per annum; if after five years service, £1,050; if after ten years, £1,750; and if after fifteen years, £2,450. Any one of the other Judges could retire after six months on a pension of £600; after five years on a pension of £900; after ten years on a pension of £1,500; and after fifteen years on a pension of £2,100. I am dead against this pension proposal. It would be even better—high as the proposed salaries are—to pay the Judges more money and allow them to make provision for their later years by insurance or otherwise. It does not seem to me that these gentlemen should be treated in a different manner from any member of the rank and file of the service. They will be paid high salaries, and should be well able to make provision for themselves, considering that their extra expenditure will be amply covered by allowances. I do not see my way to give these proposals of the Government my support, and there will have to be very strong reasons adduced if I am to change my views. Another proposed expenditure that is not necessary is that upon the Inter-State Commission. We have heard some little talk about friction in regard to railway rates and river charges, but it does not seem to me that there is any occasion at present for incurring the proposed expenditure. Undoubtedly we shall require an Inter-State Commission by-and-by, but let us wait until Australia grows in wealth, population, and importance before we bring this body on to the stage. With regard to the much vexed question of the six hatters I do not propose to say very much. I went to a considerable length in supporting the labour party with regard to the Immigration Restriction Act, because I recognised that Australia being so close to the vast hordes of population in Asia, there is a danger lest those people should come here and attain undue proportions, and I recognise, from what has taken place in Pennsylvania, in the United States, where large numbers of lower-paid European workmen were brought in to compete with local labour, that there is a need for imposing severe restrictions. The effect of the immigration into Pennsylvania was that not only were workmen ruined, but trade and business throughout the State were brought to a very low ebb. I was prepared, therefore, to go to a great length in support of this policy. But when the news came to hand that British-born workmen—men of “the bulldog breed”—had come here and been refused admission to practise their lawful avocations—agreement or no agreement—it struck me, as it did the great majority of the people of this country, with a kind of shock. Something should be done to prevent that kind of thing. I do not know whether the leader of the Opposition has the courage of his opinions, and is prepared to submit a clause to amend the section of the Immigration Restriction Act. If he does not propose something of that sort, I shall take it that he is not very sincere in his condemnation of the Act. I hope that something will be done to modify the measure, so as to permit British-born workmen to have a free entrance to these portions of the British dominions. But the difficulty that has arisen might have been solved much sooner than it was had a little more judgment been shown—or perhaps I should say, had it not been for the wilful perverseness of the man who imported the six hatters. It seems to me that there was a deliberate intention not to settle the matter quickly. There was an intention on the part of the importer of the hatters to flout the Government and bring them to their knees. It seemed to be thought that the force of public opinion would compel the Commonwealth Ministry to admit the men without having regard to the provisions of the Act. For this reason, I had not so much sympathy for the employers of the men as I should otherwise have had. With reference to the subject mentioned by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, the other day—that of our water supply, and more especially of the use of the waters of the River Murray—I have some remarks to make. I consider that this question of water supply is one of the most important that can possibly be considered in this Chamber. There is no factor that has so much to do with the prosperity of Australia as the supply of water, and there is nothing that will tend more certainly to bring prosperity to the Commonwealth than the utilization of the water supply which we have. We have in Australia some 3,000,000 square miles. In that area there are 1,219,600 square miles of territory with a rainfall of under 10 inches. There is an area of 843,100 square miles with a rainfall of from 10 to 20 inches; an area of 399,900 square miles with a rainfall of from 20 to 30 inches; we have under 225,700 square miles with a rainfall of from 30 to 40 inches; under 140,300 square miles with a rainfall of from 40 to 50 inches; only 47,900 square miles upon which the rainfall is higher than from 50 to 60 inches per annum; while we have only 70,000 square miles upon which there is an annual rainfall of over 60 inches per annum. These are serious facts that this House should take into consideration, if we are going to develop this country. We cannot progress unless we take steps for the conservation of river waters, and the utilization of them to the fullest possible extent. Many reasons are given for the greater comparative advancement of New Zealand than the Commonwealth. Many people believe that the labour legislation has a great deal to do with it. I hold, however, that it is the land resumption policy and the water supply that have given to New Zealand the position it has to-day. Their crops are so much more certain. With us, throughout the greater part of Australia, agriculture is a pure gamble. It is a chance whether or not a man will get any return for his efforts. There are many agriculturists in Australia who sow with little certainty of getting any return. Whatever we can do to make the man who tills the land more secure should be done, both by the State Houses and also by the Commonwealth Parliament. How can we hope to get population to come here unless we improve the agricultural prospects of the country? We cannot possibly provide for a great many more people in the cities unless we have a larger back country—unless we feed the great reservoirs, our cities, by means of the streams of production which will come from a closely-settled country.

Mr. McCall.

It stands to reason that we cannot progress otherwise. We have here a large continent that is at present only settled in the proportion of one and a half to the square mile, as against 48 to the square mile in Asia and 99 in Europe. We should do all that is possible to make provision for the settlement of the population that is born in the country, and for those who may be attracted here. But it is necessary to study the geographical conditions of Australia if we are to carry out this policy. We have a very big country. Honorable members are as well conversant with the map of Australia as I am, but I must remind them of some features. We have here, beginning with the Grampians in Victoria, a mountain range running east, and then right up north, and then westward to Warrego. That mountain range runs from 1,000 to 7,000 feet in height. On the outside of that range every drop of the water that falls goes to the sea; on the inside of the range, for the space of some 900 miles by 500—some 420,000 square miles in all—every drop of water that falls, if it were possible to save it, would find its way to the junction of the Darling and the Murray. We have there our great arterial river system, which, while we have not a great rainfall—because it must be remembered that it is in the winter that we have any large rainfall, and in the summer we have scarcely any at all—offers conveniences for conserving the supply, and should enable us to make use of it in times of drought, and during the summer months. But that great catchment area is not all effective. Out of an area of 420,000 square miles there are only about 160,000 square miles which are actually effective in securing and conveying water. Much of the water that falls in the form of rain is lost in wide open spaces, and in sandy country where it percolates rapidly away. Therefore, there is only a moiety of the area that is effective in giving water to the rivers. Of that effective area there is in Queensland, 67,690 square miles; in New South Wales, 75,499 square miles; and in Victoria, 15,310 square miles. Although the effective area in Victoria is smaller, yet, because of its having mountains close to the Murray, it supplies a larger proportion of water to the Murray than do the other States. The Murray itself is the main drainage course of the east and south eastern portion of Australia. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, says that the State which he represents gives away a large quantity of water, whereas as a matter of fact not a drop of water which flows into the Murray and feeds it falls within South Australia. To show what goes down the Murray, I will take the volumes of Albury and Echuca. In a high year at Albury, there flows down 264,000,000,000 cubic feet, sufficient to cover 5,280,000 acres 12 inches deep. In the lowest year known—not including last year, which may be lower than the lowest year on the printed records—91,000,000,000 cubic feet of water flowed by Albury, sufficient to cover 1,820,000 acres 12 inches deep. In a mean year there are 144,000,000,000 cubic feet of water, sufficient to cover 2,880,000 acres 12 inches deep.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member mean sufficient to cover that area at the season of the year when the water is wanted?

Mr. McCOLL.—To enable this water to be utilized at a time when it is wanted, there would have to be a system of water conservation, so that the water would be ready for use when it was required. At Echuca, there flows down the Murray in a low year 403,000,000,000 cubic feet of water, sufficient to cover 8,060,000 acres 12 inches deep. In a low year 157,000,000,000 cubic feet is sufficient to cover 3,140,000 acres, while in a mean or average year, 254,000,000,000 cubic feet is sufficient to cover 5,080,000 acres. It will thus be seen that if we only conserve these waters—if the Government will take the matter in hand, and, with or without the co-operation of the different States, will provide storages to conserve the waters of the river—enormous possibilities will be opened up for the interior of this continent.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member think the work would return interest?

Mr. McCOLL.—I shall come to that question in a moment. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, complained that the allotment of water which had been made to South Australia was too small. I shall deal only with the lowest—that of course will cover all the rest. Under the lowest allotment it is provided that South Australia shall have 150,000 cubic feet of water per minute passing over her boundary at Morgan. No matter how straitened New South Wales may be, no matter how straitened Victoria may be—even if our crops are perishing—this allotment, according to the agreement arrived at by the Premiers, must pass down the river at Morgan. The other States are to lose their water in order to make good that supply. According to its report the Royal Commission on the River Murray, which has been sitting, would allow in low years only 70,000 cubic feet of water to pass over the boundary at Morgan, and the arrangement made by the Premiers is one that I cannot understand. The ostensible object for which this volume of water is desired to pass over the boundary is that navigation may not be interrupted. This supply of 150,000 cubic feet per minute is to be sent down in order that South Australia's trade with the Darling and other places may not be interfered with. As a matter of fact, however, such a supply would not allow of navigation, because I understand it would allow only vessels with a draught of 2 feet to pass up and down stream. Therefore, I cannot understand why this quantity should go down the river at the expense of Victoria and New South Wales. We must remember that in conveying that quantity some hundreds of miles down to the river to the boundary at Morgan, an enormous loss of water must take place. The whole of that water could be utilized for production higher up the river, whereas it may simply be wasted in going down stream.

Mr. CONROY.—What would be the quantity that would have to pass at Balranald in order to give that supply at Morgan?

Mr. McCOLL.—I cannot say. I have not gone fully into the figures so far as they affect New South Wales. It may be interesting to learn what this 156,000 cubic feet of water a minute would do. It would irrigate some 1,576,000 acres of land, and surely its utilization in that way would provide a better asset for this country than would the mere passing of the water down the river in a volume which would not even allow of navigation, and would only be wasted in the sea. I do not understand why the Premier of Victoria gave away in regard to this point. Before leaving Melbourne for Sydney he took up a very strong attitude. He claimed that Victoria had a right to use her own waters to her own advantage and in the best possible way.

In order to allow of navigation at Morgan the river would have to be at least 4 feet above summer level, and it would require nearly 400,000 cubic feet a minute to be sent down to secure that level. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, said that there was only 276,000 acres of land under irrigation in Victoria. Possibly that was the case last year, but the area of land under our irrigation trusts is nearly 2,000,000 acres. The failure to some extent of our irrigation schemes has been due not to anything essentially wrong in the schemes themselves, but to the fact that the work of conservation and distribution has not been carried out as originally projected. No loss would have been occasioned by these irrigation schemes, and there would have been no writing off of the capital advanced by the Government of Victoria to the various trusts if the original proposals had been carried out. The amount written off was not anything like as large as that mentioned by the honorable and learned member. He said that we had written off £1,750,000 on account of our irrigation schemes. That is not the case. The total amount written off consists of £1,068,399 in respect of capital, and £574,252 in respect of interest. That writing off of capital and interest, however, was in relation to water schemes which have been in progress for the last 40 years. Various local councils, waterworks trusts, and other bodies for the distribution of water participated in it. When the whole matter came up for rectification, every local body seized the opportunity, and wherever it was found that they could not pay interest on the money advanced, a writing down took place. The amount written off in respect of our irrigation trusts was only £720,252 in respect of capital, and £337,239 in respect of interest. The writing off of capital and interest in this way is not an unusual occurrence in regard to irrigation in other countries. The whole undertaking was new to Victoria, but even new as it was, and untried as our people were in the work of irrigation, success would have attended their efforts had the work of conservation and distribution been carried out as projected by the honorable gentleman who is now Attorney-General of the Commonwealth. In that event there would have been no scarcity of water. Drawbacks might have been experienced during the first few years, but the irrigation trusts would have ultimately proved a success. We are now anxious that these works for the conservation and distribution of water should be carried out, and we require the water supply to make the trusts the success which they should have been years ago. Complaint is made that the Victorian Government are constructing works of great magnitude which will carry large volumes of water over our country. I would point out, however, that those works are not being constructed with a view of depriving the people of South Australia or others lower down the river of the supplies they require in the low seasons. They are being constructed so large because during the winter months, when water is rather a curse than a blessing to other places, enormous volumes which flow down our streams could be barred in their way to the sea, and conveyed over thousands and thousands of acres in the north-west as well as over the northern plains. There it could be stored in dams, lakes, reservoirs, and other places for use during the summer months. Honorable members know that under the conditions which prevail in our northern districts a farmer is always certain of a good crop if he can give his land a flooding in winter, and whilst a large area to the west does not look for water when it is wanted elsewhere, if it could only get it at a time when it is being wasted, the farmers there would be able to make a living, and by means of their increased production increase to a very great extent the prosperity of the country.

Mr. PAGE.—Does not the honorable member think that is a very selfish policy?

Mr. McCOLL.—On the contrary, I think it is a wise policy, and I should be very glad to see Queensland make some provision in the same direction. My argument is that if Victoria is to be deprived of these waters the same principle will apply to Queensland, and in urging the claims of Victoria I am speaking just as much for New South Wales and Queensland as for the people of this State. The honorable member's interjection shows that he does not understand the question in the slightest degree.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member wants all the water for the people of Victoria; he does not want the people of the other States to receive any.

Mr. McCOLL.—I have never said anything of the kind. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, said that a sum of £250,000 was invested in boats on the Murray. That, however, is a mere circumstance compared with what we could do by the utilization of this water for irrigation purposes. It may be of interest to honorable members to learn what is the value of the water that is running away to the sea every year, and what effect it would have upon the production of our country. In the fourth progress report published by the Victorian Royal Commission in 1899 the value of water in various countries is set out. In Italy, according to this report, 60,000 cubic feet of water per minute is worth from £500 to £1,600; in France, it is worth from £500 to £2,250; in America, it is worth from £800 to £3,000. According to the last book issued by Mr. Wilcox, the eminent engineer of Egypt, every milliard of water which comes down the river and is utilized there is valued at £300,000. Having regard to the millions and millions of cubic feet of water which we permit to run to waste every year, honorable members will see what an enormous wealth we are allowing to slip away. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, referred somewhat lightly to irrigation, and to a very great extent discredited its use. He pointed out, for example, that in countries where the system had been tried it had not been attended with much success. In making that assertion he was entirely in error. In the United States of America, they did not go in for irrigation to any great extent until about 1871 or 1872—just a little while before the subject was mentioned in Victoria. The growth of irrigation there has been such that there are now 8,000,000 acres—the reference will be found in Smyth's Conquest of Arid America, published a year or two since—commanded by irrigation channels.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There are now over 11,000,000 acres commanded by them.

Mr. McCOLL.—Yes. The book which I quote is a year or more old. In the irrigated districts of the United States the progress made has been five times as great as that in the more prosperous dry districts. In passing I might mention that I am speaking somewhat under difficulties, as I left my references at home, and have had to collect my notes very hastily. If I had my references here I should be able to give honorable members the exact figures. In California, where irrigation has been introduced into the various counties, the progress has been five times as great as in those districts where they have kept to dry farming, and in many of the irrigated colonies in Southern California there is now a population of 500 to the square mile. Production is increasing there by leaps and bounds, and in consequence of this increased production, California is going ahead at a truly marvellous rate. At the last meeting of Congress, the President of the United States of America dealt very strongly with this question, and urged the conservation and utilization of every drop of water that could be obtained in the western districts of the States. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, made some reference to irrigation works in Egypt, and from his remarks it would appear that he has not kept himself in touch with what has been done there. Egypt possesses some 6,250,000 acres of cultivable land, and it has to be remembered that not an acre is cultivable without irrigation, owing to the fact that it is a rainless country. They have made an expenditure of £16,000,000 on the Assouan dam and other works connected with it. Two years have not elapsed since the completion of these works, but during the year following their construction the Government secured an enormous increase of revenue from their land tax. That tax, properly speaking, is a water tax, because, if the people obtain no water to irrigate their land, the tax is not levied on them. The revenue obtained through this source during the year following the completion of these great works was raised from £22,000,000 to £28,000,000, and the expenditure mentioned has added an asset of £60,000,000 to the wealth of Egypt. Within two years, owing entirely to irrigation, Egypt, which has laboured under a debt of £105,000,000, has been able not only to pay her way, but to build up a surplus of £2,000,000 to the good. That has taken place in a country which in 1876 was ruined by Ismail Pasha, who ran the national debt up from £5,000,000 to £70,000,000 in six or seven years. Egypt has been able to recover its position only by the aid of English engineers, who repaired the Nile works, thus enabling the application of its waters to irrigation purposes. If we desire to see our country grow, we shall have to adopt a somewhat similar policy. I come now to the condition of India. There we find that enormous works have been carried out. From 1890 to 1899 its revenue was £18,500,000, while the expenditure was £20,000,000, showing a loss of £1,500,000. But from 1897 to 1899 the irrigation works picked up, and while the revenue was £7,088,487, the expenditure was only £6,470,431. In 1891 there were 13,500,000 acres under irrigation in India. I believe that there are now some 25,000,000 acres under irrigation, and the works up to a late period were returning 4·2 per cent. interest. With respect to the agreement entered into between the Premiers of the different States in Sydney, the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, expressed the hope that it would be passed. It is, no doubt, very favorable to South Australia, but it is not favorable either to New South Wales or Victoria. I take a strong exception to that agreement; in the first place, because, for the first time, it permits the interference of outsiders in the control of our own local waters required for local purposes. It proposes to limit the use of the water falling within our own territory to a very much lesser volume than we are in Victoria already committed to in connexion with our water trusts. Our limit, under the agreement, is 147,000 cubic feet in low years, but our commitments in Victoria amount to 267,000 cubic feet—103,000 cubic feet for the western channel, 24,000 cubic feet for the eastern channel, the Murray trusts are committed to 80,000 cubic feet, and the Mildura Trust to 60,000 cubic feet. The stagnation and the distress in the north-western districts of Victoria have arisen in consequence of our not utilizing this water, and instead of our being restricted in its use we should be encouraged and enabled to use it to a greater extent. The terms of the agreement give, to my mind, an undue preference to navigation as against irrigation, which the relative value of the two interests does not in any way justify. The agreement gives an unreasonable arbitrary flow to South Australia for navigation purposes, which is prejudicial to the interests of Victoria, and much more than the Murray River Commission decided that South Australia was fairly entitled to. I believe that if such an agreement is passed into law

it will block the development of the water resources of New South Wales and Victoria for the next five years. The trouble is that nothing is proposed to be done during the five years to settle the points of difference at present existing between South Australia and the other two States. We are just to maintain the status quo, and at the end of the five years we shall have to fight the whole battle over again. Under the agreement, it is proposed to place the Murray in the hands of a commission of three. It gives to that outside body a controlling power, to which, as a Victorian, I decidedly object. We have spent a very great deal of money, and in the matter of water conservation have advanced far ahead of the other two States, and I therefore object to put Victoria in a minority on a commission having control of the lives, fortunes, and interests of our people in the north, who have been induced by the water policy of this State to settle there in many thousands. This agreement will not only prevent national development, but it will check individual enterprise, because in the case of streams flowing into the Murray, and covered by the agreement—some six in Victoria, and others in New South Wales—not a single offtake can be obtained, and not a single engine can be erected upon a stream or river beyond what is now there to pump a drop of water from it without the consent of this controlling body. I object to our people being placed under outside control in that way. Another drawback to the agreement is that nothing is done towards arranging either amongst the States themselves, or conjointly with the Commonwealth, to provide works for conservation or distribution during the five years, so that at the end of that time the agreement might be put upon one side, with satisfaction to the States concerned. In the agreement there is no recognition whatever, but rather an entire supersession of the powers of the Commonwealth in connexion with the navigation of the Murray. While undoubtedly the Commonwealth has power to construct locks on the Murray for the furtherance of navigation, it is doubtful if action in this direction will be taken. If we are to have locks on the Murray, then I say they should be locks which will be not only suitable for navigation, but auxiliaries for purposes of irrigation. They should be high enough to keep navigation going, and at the same time to permit of the utilization, by gravitation, of the water stored. Any other policy in their construction will be foolish and shortsighted, no matter what the additional cost of the policy I suggest might be.

Mr. CONROY.—Such works would not pay interest on the cost of construction.

Mr. McCOLL.—Yes, they would pay interest all right. Another objection I have to the granting of this concession by Victoria to South Australia under the present agreement is that it will form a precedent for the future. If Victoria through her State Parliament ratifies this agreement it will be impossible for her in the future to retreat from the position defined by the agreement, and she cannot again be placed in the position which she occupies at the present time before the agreement is ratified. Another point of great importance is that the joint commission, when it is appointed, is to be the judge as to what is a reasonable use of the water supply for purposes of irrigation. But Victoria and New South Wales having under this agreement laid down an arbitrary quantity of water which they bind themselves to take, how will it be possible for the commission to ask in future that these quantities should be increased? If such an application were taken, for instance to the High Court, I think it is unlikely that the Court would be disposed to give the States more than under this agreement they agreed to take, and it would be rather disposed to give them less. The agreement proposes an interference with navigation rights of which the Federal Parliament is the only custodian, and it would prejudice the case of Victoria by permitting concessions to navigation of which the Federal Parliament has not approved, as required under the Constitution. In short, what this agreement means is this: What the States could alone have done, that is, provide joint works for irrigation purposes, it is not proposed that they shall do, or so far as appears from the agreement that they should even consider; but in connexion with what the Federal Parliament and Inter-State Commission may have to do, the States under this agreement will interpose prematurely and attempt to perform the work for themselves. They have succeeded in accomplishing nothing whatever except to prejudice to a great extent the interests of Victoria, and to a lesser extent the interests of New South Wales. In 1888, New South Wales and Victoria came to an understanding with regard to the Murray, which it is a pity was not carried out. They then agreed to divide the upper waters between them; and I do not think that at the present time Victoria should consent to take anything like the position which, under this proposed agreement, she will be compelled to take. What reasons actuated the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria in consenting to such an agreement I do not know. I understand that it is strongly condemned in Sydney, and that there is not much chance that it will be ratified by the New South Wales Parliament. I am very glad to hear that, because I believe the non-ratification of such an agreement will result in the avoidance of trouble in the future. We are now told that if the agreement is not signed, South Australia may appeal to the Privy Council. That is a far cry, and it is a long and a difficult journey to take. I do not think the Privy Council would agree to interfere with the local distribution of water in autonomous States such as we have in Australia. It would be simply ridiculous to apply the English riparian law, which simply provides that waters must be passed down streams unpolluted and undiminished in quantity, to a country such as Australia, where our conditions render necessary the utilization of every drop of water for purposes of production. The application of such a law in Australia is opposed to all common sense and reason. I doubt very much whether the Privy Council, though wedded to English laws, would dream of applying such a law in this State. I have taken the liberty to deal with this matter at such length because, in my opinion, it is one which concerns us very much. If we as a new Parliament are going to win our way to the hearts of the people, we must not confine our work merely to the passing of machinery Bills. We must take up practical measures and give help to our producers, and find markets for their products, and we must take these questions up as early as we possibly can. In spite of all that has been said, I believe that the federal idea has grown, and is growing, amongst the people. Our new environment is strange, and we have not yet perhaps become accustomed to it, but the federal idea is growing, and everywhere we may hear people saying that the Commonwealth ought to take over the whole of the business of Australia, and that we should put the State Parliaments out of the way altogether. I am not now expressing an opinion as to whether that would or would not be a wise thing to do. The opinion is, perhaps, scarcely articulate now, but it may be a cry before long, and it will not long be a cry before it will become a policy upon which elections will be fought and won. If we desire to show ourselves worthy to assume the position which we are expected to take, we shall have to work cautiously and economically, studying not the interest of any State separately, but the interests of all. I hope we shall do nothing to check the growth of the federal idea. I hope that the session which has opened now will be marked by steady application to work, and by the passing of good measures which will commend the Commonwealth Parliament generally to the people, and honorable members individually to the constituents before whom they must go for election at the end of this year. Referring to the elections, I trust that they will take place this year, and that we shall not be compelled to put them off by reason of any delay in having the electoral boundaries adjusted. It would not be a fair thing that the country should undergo the expense of two elections where one should suffice. I have no doubt that we have only to act carefully this session, to be told when the election takes place, "Well done, good and faithful servants; return to your work for the Commonwealth."

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—Upon those subjects, which we shall have an opportunity later of discussing in detail, I have not a word to say to-day. There are really only one or two matters to which I wish to refer, and that very briefly. The first is one which has not, I think, been dealt with by any previous speaker, and which, though apparently insignificant, embodies, to my mind, a rather important principle. On the occasion of the opening of Parliament, I was very much surprised to find that when Mr. Speaker, together with other members of this House, were called to another place, at the instance of His Excellency the Governor-General, we occupied there what appeared to me to be a somewhat humiliating position. I was very much grieved to see that the Speaker of this House had to remain in a passage, outside of the Senate chamber proper, and that honorable members had to be accommodated also outside of that chamber, in seats allotted usually to the general public.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In many cases honorable members were without seats at all.

Mr. FOWLER.—Quite so. I am aware that, according to the rules of procedure established in the British Parliament, the position appointed for the Speaker, together with other members of this House, on such an occasion, is at the Bar of another place. The term "Bar" is an elastic one, and I think that upon occasions such as the opening and prorogation of Parliament the Bar might be placed sufficiently far forward in the Senate chamber to prevent such a position of affairs as we were treated to last Tuesday—a position entirely out of keeping with the provisions of the Constitution and the relations of the two Houses. I do not wish to make a suggestion as to what ought to be done in the matter, but I enter a protest against what was done, and I hope that better arrangements will be made in the future. The practice followed by the Imperial Parliament is retained in Great Britain largely because of its antiquity, but such a practice is entirely out of place in Australia, and if some alteration is not made sooner, I shall move, when the standing orders are under survey, that some other arrangements be made which will prevent any difficulty arising in the future. The other subject to which I wish to draw attention has been frequently alluded to in this chamber, though it has not always received the favorable consideration to which I think it is entitled. I refer to the subject dearest to all representatives of Western Australia, because it is dearest to the people of that State, the transcontinental railway scheme.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—It will be a very dear scheme to the rest of Australia, too.

Mr. FOWLER.—I believe that it can be carried out without becoming a "dear" one in the sense in which the honorable member uses the word, and that ultimately the line will prove of exceeding advantage to the whole Commonwealth. Part XIII., section 51, of the Constitution vests a power in this Parliament which enables us to carry out a scheme of this kind without entailing a penny of expense upon the people of Australia. The subject is one to which I have given some little consideration, and, if no one else moves in the matter, I intend to place a motion upon the notice-paper shortly which will give an opportunity for what I believe will be a very interesting and important discussion upon it. I compliment Ministers upon having referred to this matter in the Governor-General's speech as a question of national importance. Any one who carefully considers the situation of Western Australia in relation to the other States must recognise that the construction of the transcontinental railway, if not in so many words part of the federal compact, is a moral obligation upon the people of Australia. I have no fear but that that obligation will be recognised when the time necessary for a scheme of this magnitude to mature has been given. I do not wish to force the matter forward any faster than it should be pushed, nor do the people of Western Australia wish it to be dealt with except after the fullest investigation. We have no desire to compel the other States to recognise our claim until every opportunity has been given to them to become fully acquainted with the nature of the project. I therefore urge the Government to follow up the work which they have done by appointing a survey party to go over the proposed route, in order to obtain the fullest information in regard to it. That work is very necessary, because there are still a number of people in the eastern States, and a few members in this House, who are under the impression that the line would run through entirely worthless country. I wish to say, speaking partly from personal knowledge, and also upon reliable information, that such is not the case. When in Perth lately, I met a gentleman who had been prospecting the country east of Coolgardie, and who reached a point within 50 miles of the South Australian border. He assured me that all along the route he had taken he had discovered excellent auriferous indications. I have also the authority of an agricultural expert for saying that a considerable area of the land which the line would traverse is suitable for pastoral occupation, and that part of it could with advantage be cultivated. That territory is today in the position which was occupied years ago by other parts of Australia which now are regarded as excellent country. Fifty years ago Riverina was considered a desert, and I have in my possession the report of a trip made by one of the old prospecting squatters through a large part of Victoria and New South Wales, in which it is amusing to read the condemnation, by a man presumably expert in pastoral matters, of country which has since been proved excellent for both pastoral and agricultural purposes. I was somewhat amused to hear the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, insist on behalf of the people of his State upon the performance of a certain condition before permission could be given by them for the construction of the proposed line through their territory. That condition requires nothing less than the construction in Western Australia of a railway which the honorable member thinks would be of considerable advantage to South Australia. I hesitate in accepting the statement of the honorable gentleman that the people of South Australia insist upon that condition. I have not heard it specifically mentioned before, and, until I have further evidence, I respectfully decline to accept the honorable gentleman's statement on the subject as final. Is he prepared, moreover, to pledge the people of South Australia to give their consent to the construction of the proposed line if a railway is made to Esperance? Unless he can do that, I fail to see why he has dragged the matter into this discussion. The construction of the Esperance line is purely a matter for the State concerned, and, so far from being of special advantage to South Australia, would possibly be of no more advantage to that State than to the other States. It would be of equal advantage to all the States, whereas the construction of the proposed transcontinental line would benefit, first, South Australia, then Victoria, and then the other States on the eastern sea-board. It would be of special advantage to South Australia, inasmuch as it would assist that State in developing the Tarcoola gold-fields.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Are they not away from the route of the proposed line?

Mr. FOWLER.—No; the line might traverse that district. I do not wish, however, to discuss the details of the scheme on this occasion. All I ask is that honorable members shall preserve an open mind in regard to it, and pay careful attention to the evidence submitted to them, and that the Government shall place before Parliament and the people the fullest information obtainable. There is no doubt that the people of Western Australia regard the construction of the line as a necessary corollary to federation. Previous to the acceptance of federation by Western Australia, many of the leading statesmen of the eastern States promised that that line should be constructed by the Commonwealth, and, though I do not say that those promises legally bind the Commonwealth, I have no hesitation in declaring that they impose a very strong moral obligation upon it, inasmuch as, because of them, the objection of many people in Western Australia to federation was overcome. I have yet to learn that the people of the eastern States wish to repudiate the obligation. At the time these promises were made they were tacitly acquiesced in by the people of the eastern States, and they should not at this late stage be repudiated because of the temporary craze for an improvident species of economy. As a final word, I would urge upon the Government the necessity for a survey of the route for the railway, so as to dispel the ignorance and prejudice which prevail with regard to the proposal. We hear a great deal about economy. At the time that the visit of members of the Federal Parliament to Western Australia was projected there was a great outcry on the part of those newspapers which originated the demand for economy, but it now appears that the total expense incurred was £172 10s. I venture to say that not one honorable member who took part in that visit to Western Australia, and thus placed himself in a position to judge for himself as to the conditions obtaining in that State, will fail to justify its claim for the construction of the proposed railway. I think honorable members will agree, also, that the money spent upon the visit was well laid out. I am sorry that more honorable members did not take advantage of the facilities then offered, and I extend to those who have not yet been to Western Australia a hearty invitation to go there. On behalf of the Premier of that State, I can assure them that they will receive as much kindness as was extended to those who made the visit during the recess.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK (Gwydir).—After all the criticisms which have been passed on the Government during the recess, I cannot allow the present occasion to pass without offering a few remarks. In view of the complaints made against the Government by members of the Opposition during recess, and all the disastrous consequences which have been attributed to their administration, I scarcely expected that the debate upon the Governor-General's speech would have been allowed to pass without a much more vigorous onslaught upon Ministers. Some honorable members have directed attention to what they regard as the utter disregard by the Government of their financial responsibilities and of their want of appreciation of the obligations imposed upon them in connexion with the administration of the various Acts passed last session. But the principal charges have centred around the fodder duties and the difficulties experienced in introducing six hatters into the Commonwealth. In New South Wales for a long time we heard of nothing but the fodder duties. In the district which I represent they formed the subject of very considerable discussion, and I endeavoured to obtain information with regard to the extent of the tax they imposed upon the people. In the Sydney Morning Herald of 18th December, 1902, the following statement appeared:—

A few days ago Mr. Reymond, M.L.A., asked the Premier to supply Parliament with some information relative to the importation of fodder and its carriage by the Railway department. Last night the information was laid on the table of the Legislative Assembly. The Customs department supplied the following table, showing the duty received on fodder imported into New South Wales from 1st March to 31st August, 1902:—Hay and chaff, £249 15s. 10d.; maize, £9,065 10s. 4d.; oats, £4,561 9s. 5d.; barley, £2,544 7s. 10d.; pollard, £50; tares, £8 18s. 2d.; n.e.i., £16 10s. 10d.; bran, £314 15s. 9d.; wheat, £393 1s. 5d.; total, £17,203 8s. 9d.

The Railway Commissioners received in the same period for the carriage of fodder, £29,257 2s. 4d. Had no concessions been made on the fodder they carried they would have received £89,737 19s. 3d., so that their concessions aggregated £60,480 16s. 11d.

The period referred to represented the worst six months of the drought, because during that period we lost more stock than ever before in Australia.

Mr. BROWN.—The amount then paid in fodder duties was nothing compared to that collected since.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK.—That period was by far the worst in the district which I represent, because the rain set in in August and caused a growth of grass which rendered graziers independent of further outside fodder supplies. The figures which I have quoted show the absurdity of many of the statements made by members of the Opposition. Those honorable members who have so much to say about the administration of the Prime Minister, in connexion with the episode of the six hatters, should recollect that they shared the responsibility for the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act. The honorable member for Gippsland astonished me by the statement that the intention of the Act was to prevent outside labour from being introduced into the Commonwealth under agreement during times of strike. If we admit that to be correct, we might as well confess at once that we know nothing about the Bills for which we vote. We should express exactly what we wish on the face of a measure. In the case under notice, I do not see how the Prime Minister could have acted in any other way than that which has caused such a storm to break about him. I desire to refer to the responsibility of the Government in connexion with the expenditure of moneys voted by this House for specific purposes. I was very much astonished to learn that the Premier of Queensland, when speaking at Cairns a few days ago, stated that the Federal Government was shirking all its responsibilities with regard to the finances. He said, further, that the honorable member for Bland ruled Parliament. If that be true, I wish to know where is the leader of the Opposition, and where is the Prime Minister?

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The leader of the Opposition does not command the support of numbers to the extent that Mr. Watson does.

MR. CRUICKSHANK.—Surely Mr. Watson is not stronger than the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition combined. At all events, what I wish to know is, who is the "bigger" man of the three? I am reminded in this connexion of a story regarding a family named Biggar. Mrs. Biggar had a son, and when asked who was the bigger, herself or her son, said—"My son, because he is a little Biggar." She was then asked—"But how about Mr. Biggar; which is the bigger of the three?" She replied—"Mr. Biggar, because he is Father (far the) Biggar." The point is, which of the party leaders is to rule the House? When we find a number of appropriations made and voted upon the Estimates we have a right to expect that the money will be spent. The Government proposal to float a loan for the purpose of carrying out public works in connexion with transferred departments was defeated through the instrumentality of the labour party, and ultimately the necessary provision was made on the Estimates. Time has gone on, however, and we still have complaints from the country that the facilities which were intended to be supplied by the expenditure of these votes have not yet been provided. Unless some haste is now made, the votes will lapse, and the intentions expressed by the Government when the Estimates were passed will not be carried out. We were told that many buildings were not worth repairing, because new ones would have to be erected. I wish to know whether these votes are to be regarded as involving current obligations or outstanding liabilities. Whether any succeeding Government will carry out these public works can only be conjectured, but it appears to me that at the present time a number of items are included in the Estimates merely for the purpose of inflating them, because it is utterly impossible to pay for the construction of these works out of revenue. Personally, I should have liked to see the Government announce their intention of taking action to amend that abortion of an Act which prevents people in outlying districts from sharing in the benefits conferred by telephonic communication. I know of large areas in which it is simply impossible for the settlers who need telephone communication to furnish the cash guarantee required by the Government.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—It is a scandalous thing.

MR. CRUICKSHANK.—The policy adopted in this connexion has positively prevented any extension of telephonic facilities throughout the whole of the 68,000 square miles of country which I represent.

MR. FOWLER.—I have received frequent complaints about the same matter from the residents in my district. The people refuse to put the money up.

MR. CRUICKSHANK.—It is indeed a scandalous state of affairs.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yet the honorable member supports the present Administration.

MR. CRUICKSHANK.—Yes; because I cannot determine who is the greatest man of the three—the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, or the honorable member for Bland. The leader of the Opposition voted for that measure, and when other important Bills are brought forward he does not give the House the benefit of his assistance in fashioning them into good measures. But the moment he thinks he has a chance of ousting the Government he joins forces with the honorable member for Bland. I repeat that residents in outlying districts would have been saved an expenditure of thousands of pounds had it not been for the enactment of legislation which prevents them from participating in the benefits conferred by telephonic extension. I cannot resume my seat without expressing surprise that greater attention has not been bestowed upon the part played by the Prime Minister when in England in regard to future legislation.

Mr. WILKS.—How did he shape? The honorable member was there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK.—He shaped remarkably well. I was informed by gentlemen with whom I conversed that he spoke well, and that he did not commit the Commonwealth to anything. He made it perfectly clear that every arrangement into which he entered was subject to ratification by this Parliament. The Governor-General's speech also contains a brief reference to the subject of preferential trade. Personally, I am in favour of the establishment of preferential trade relations with England and Canada.

Mr. WILKS.—Would the honorable member vote for absolute free-trade between Australia and England?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK.—I think that I should even be prepared to go that far. Regarding the naval agreement, about which so much has been said, I cannot help thinking that the financial condition of the Commonwealth makes it imperative that the Government shall proceed cautiously. The Defence Bill has yet to be introduced, and we do not know what expenditure will be necessary under its operation. Our present contribution towards the British navy is about 7d. or 7½d. per head, but under the new scheme it will represent about 1s. per head. In my judgment any action on the part of the Government must be in the direction of rendering further assistance to the Imperial Navy. At the same time, I do not think there is any necessity for violent haste in connexion with the ratification of the proposed agreement, especially as the Defence Bill has yet to be considered. I did not like this important occasion to pass without making these few remarks. I congratulate the Government upon their legislative performance last session, and upon the futility of the attempts which were made to discredit them in the eyes of the country during the recess. That such attempts were futile is evidenced by the fact that Parliament is now in session, and that the address in reply to the Governor-General's speech is likely to pass without opposition.

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie).—In my remarks I do not intend to discuss every subject that was considered during the last session of Parliament, or that is likely to be dealt with in future sessions. I merely desire to offer a few observations upon questions that the House may not have an opportunity of considering at a later stage. I wish to address myself more particularly to one or two Bills that, if the reports in the newspapers are reliable, may not be brought before the House this session, and to offer a few reasons why they should be submitted for our consideration. Before doing so, however, I desire to say that I agree with the remark of the honorable member for Gwydir, that sufficient attention has not been given during the course of this debate to what was done by the Prime Minister upon his recent visit to England and Canada. To me the report of the proceedings of the conference held between representatives of the colonies and the Secretary of State is full of interest. At the same time, I cannot help feeling that, in representing Australia, the Prime Minister was scarcely placed in a fair position. He went home without knowing the views of this Parliament upon the questions which were to be discussed by the conference, and the result was that he could say nothing of any consequence. We all admit that the right honorable gentleman, wherever he might go, would do credit to Australia and to this Parliament. But when he left our shores for the old country he did so under a pledge that he was not to commit this Parliament to anything whatever. I learn from the Blue-book, which has now been issued, that towards the end of January last year the Prime Minister received a telegram from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which the latter intimated that this conference would be held, notified the questions that would be discussed, and asked for suggestions as to subjects other than those mentioned, which the Commonwealth Government might deem worthy of consideration. But I have no recollection of Parliament ever having been informed of the receipt of such a message. At that time it was well known that the subject of the renewal or otherwise of the naval subsidy would be considered at the conference, notwithstanding which this Parliament was denied an opportunity of expressing any opinion upon the matter. Consequently, the Prime Minister, when he journeyed to England, could only make an arrangement which might or might not be ratified by this House. It would not look too well, from his point of view, if that agreement were not ratified. It would have been far more satisfactory if the opinion of the House had been ascertained on the question, and the Prime Minister would then have been able when visiting England to say something definite. But, in the position which he occupied, he seemed to be almost gagged upon this, as upon other matters. Of course we all know that he has a wonderful faculty for making speeches which express nothing. Whilst in England and Canada he showed himself an adept in that accomplishment, but it was rather an unsatisfactory position from his point of view and that of the old country, besides being unfair to Australia. That there was no excuse on the ground of want of knowledge, or want of time, is shown in the very first page of the Blue-book, where it is stated that a telegram was sent on the 23rd January, by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, intimating the desire of His Majesty's Government to take advantage of the presence in London of the Premiers, in connexion with His Majesty's coronation, to discuss various important questions of general interest. The subjects indicated in the telegram were the political and commercial relations of the Empire and its naval and military defences. The various Colonial Governments were also invited to furnish a statement of any subjects which they thought might be discussed, and, with the view to facilitate and give a definite direction to the discussions, to furnish the text of any motions they desired to submit. Something ought to have been done by the Commonwealth Government to ascertain, through this Parliament, the opinion of Australia on the various questions that were to be discussed, more especially on the question of the naval subsidy. It might be that Parliament would have decided to give a very much larger contribution, or, on the other hand, to say that we were not prepared to make any contribution; but, at any rate, the Prime Minister, in going Home without any exact knowledge of the feeling of Australia, was placed in an invidious and awkward position. Further, the Prime Minister, according to what appears on page 17 of the Blue-book, was forced to make an offer to the Imperial Government of what Australia would be likely to contribute. In the Blue-book it is stated that the Board of Admiralty received offers of assistance towards the naval expenses from the Empire, and that the Commonwealth of Australia offered £200,000 per annum, in order to improve the Australian squadron and to establish a branch of the Royal Naval Reserve.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That statement in the Blue-book puts the matter a little too broadly, and makes it appear that the representatives of the Commonwealth made the offer irrespective of all conditions, and as if they were pledging the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Nothing of the kind was ever done; and if what occurred was so understood, it was misunderstood.

Mr. KIRWAN.—In connexion with the correction made by the Prime Minister, it seems to me that this Blue-book has been compiled in a way hardly fair to the colonies. The speeches delivered by the representatives of the Imperial Government are reported fully, but there is no reference whatever to the position taken up by the colonial representatives.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is not quite the fault of the Imperial Government. Mr. Chamberlain was ready to publish all the speeches if no objection were taken, but it was agreed that the objection of one of the representatives of a self-governing colony should make that impossible, and there was one objection.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I gather from the report that there was no objection on the part of the Imperial Government, and it seems rather extraordinary that one colonial representative should have the power to prevent other representatives having their views published in the Blue-book so as to enable an opinion to be formed in the colonies on what their representatives laid before the Imperial authorities. The representative of a liberal community like Australia should have felt it his duty, notwithstanding the action of other representatives, to court publicity and ask that the speeches might be reported, or, at any rate, a clear idea given of the exact position.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No clear idea could be obtained unless the speeches were published, and I endeavoured to see that they were published, but it could not be done under the conditions that were arrived at.

Mr. KIRWAN.—That is to be exceedingly regretted. The only idea as to the attitude of the Australian representatives is contained in a memo. from the Minister for Defence concerning his personal views of what ought to be done in the matter of the naval and military defences. While I quite agree with a certain portion of that memo., there are other portions which are not quite in accord with the sentiment of Australia—at any rate there is an inference in the memo. which is, I feel sure, quite foreign to that sentiment. In the particular paragraph to which I refer, the Minister for Defence says—

Great Britain spends annually on her army and navy about £50,000,000 (not including the South African war), or about £1 5s. per head of her population. If the Australian Commonwealth contributed in the same proportion, it would amount to something like £5,000,000 a year, whereas our entire military and naval defence vote does not exceed £800,000 a year, or only about 4s. per head of our population.

That seems to imply that Australia ought to contribute £5,000,000 per annum, or that, at any rate, the Imperial Government would be justified in asking for the contribution of that large amount.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think not, because further on there is a paragraph which shows that that was not intended.

Mr. KIRWAN. — Further on it is stated—

It may, of course, be said that in building up another Britain in the Southern Hemisphere, thus providing another home for our countrymen, and by extending British influence and trade, we have been doing a greater work for the Empire than by contributing towards Imperial naval defence; but I think the time has gone by for us to use such arguments, as both duty and stern necessity require that we shall stand shoulder to shoulder with the motherland in the determination to maintain inviolate the integrity of the Empire. That this is the sentiment deep-rooted in the hearts of the Australian people has, I am proud to say, been shown during the South African war, which we have made our own, proving unmistakably to the world that our interests in war, as well as in peace, are indissolubly bound up with the country from which our fathers came, and to which we are all proud to belong.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is not the paragraph to which I referred.

Mr. KIRWAN.—Paragraph 19 is, perhaps, that which is meant by the Minister for Defence, and it is as follows:—

If a proposal were adopted that the Empire should have one fleet maintained by the whole nation, every part contributing to its support on some plan to be mutually arranged, probably on that of the comparative trade of each country, and not necessarily on an uniform basis of contribution, what a splendid idea would be consummated, and what a bulwark for peace throughout the world would be established! Besides which we would be doing our duty to the mother country, which has been so generous to us during all our early years.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is the paragraph.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I quote these paragraphs in order that the Minister for Defence may have the case he wished to lay before the Imperial authorities properly represented to this House. Whilst I am in thorough accord with the Minister in his desire to promote a friendly feeling between the motherland and Australia, I am of opinion that the mere making of the statement that the Australian contribution on the population basis would be something like £5,000,000 per annum, implies that the colonies ought to contribute that amount. A statement of the kind might very well have been left to the Imperial representatives to put forward. I am sure, however, that the representatives of the Empire do not favour anything like a contribution on the basis of population, or even a contribution on the basis of trade. They quite recognise that the colonies are a source of strength to the motherland, and it would, to say the least, be extremely injudicious to ask for such a tremendous contribution as that suggested.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think I meant that.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I merely say that a report of that kind, submitted by a representative of the Commonwealth, might lead to the belief that it represented the opinion of Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — That memorandum by the Minister was not written for the conference. It was written some time before, and its existence having become known, we were asked if there was any objection to its being laid before the conference.

To that the Australian representatives naturally replied that there was no objection—not that it was ever intended that the memorandum was to bind the Commonwealth Government without any further discussion.

Mr. KIRWAN.—At any rate, the memorandum was before the conference, and must have had some influence. I merely refer to the memorandum as an instance of what is given in the Blue-book as to the opinions expressed by the representatives of Australia, and, in doing so, I comment on the absence of any report of the speeches of those gentlemen. One resolution passed at the conference is of a very important character. It affirms that conferences of a similar nature should be held every four years, if not at shorter intervals; and that seems to contain the germ of an idea for a better understanding between the motherland and the colonies generally. I trust that whoever may be sent to represent Australia at future conferences they will not be placed in the position in which the Prime Minister found himself, but that they will have ascertained the view of Australia, at any rate, on these matters, and will have a fixed programme which they can advocate. They should also have a fair idea of the discretionary powers allowed to them. The attention of this Parliament ought to be in some way or other, preferably by the Government, directed to a speech of the kind delivered by Mr. Chamberlain. In his speech he referred to the weighty responsibilities of the Empire—

The weary Titan staggers under the too vast orb of its fate. We have borne the burden for many years. We think it is time that our children should assist us to support it, and whenever you make the request to us, be very sure that we shall hasten gladly to call you to our councils.

He went on to quote from a notable speech in which Sir Wilfred Laurier said concerning the mother country—"If you want our aid call us to your councils." In the address to the conference, Mr. Chamberlain practically called the representatives of the colonies to the councils of the Empire, and he made two suggestions. One suggestion was that if the colonies thought that they should be represented in either House of the Imperial Parliament, it was quite possible that it could be done. Then he went on to say that, in his opinion, a better idea than that was that some council should be formed on the lines of the Federal Council of Australia, the council to be merely an advisory body without executive powers. Generally he seemed to think that something ought to be done to establish a representative Imperial body, while, of course, he laid stress upon the fact that any direct proposal of that nature ought to come from the colonies. If we are going to contribute to the maintenance of the defence forces of the Empire, certainly we ought to be allowed some voice in the expenditure. But even supposing that we do not contribute anything towards the maintenance of the navy, supposing that we do not contribute one farthing towards the Imperial expenditure, still the position will remain that Australia, so long as it is part of the Empire, will necessarily be involved in any quarrel of the Empire. We are bound to be responsible for anything that may be done by the Imperial Government which would involve hostilities between Great Britain and other Powers. The position now is that while Australia may be brought into a quarrel—in fact, she cannot keep out of a quarrel in which Great Britain may be engaged—she has absolutely no voice in the councils which may bring about that dispute. The position is almost an intolerable one to a country such as Australia, that believes in the representation of the people. If we are going to send contingents away—and, in any case, we are always open to attacks from the enemies of Great Britain—then it will be for us to consider whether we should not endeavour to have a voice, either by the suggested advisory council or by some other means, in the making or prevention of those quarrels. There is another point in connexion with this report which I should like to have cleared up. Canada, which was represented at this conference, is a part of the Empire, but it is not prepared to contribute one penny towards its own naval defence. It spends, on local defence, about a third of the amount per head of population that Australia does. It does not contribute 1d. towards its naval defence, although it seems to me to be more in need of naval defence than is Australia. Australia is an island far removed from European powers, whereas Canada adjoins a power which, although it may be regarded as friendly, is still foreign, and it is also nearer to the great nations of Europe, and is much more ~~than~~ ^{likely to be} attacked than is Australia. It would be interesting to know the exact motives which have influenced Canada to refrain from making any contribution to its naval defence, while every other portion of the British Empire contributes something or other to its naval defence. I think that two of the promised Bills ought to have occupied a more prominent position than they do in the Governor-General's speech. Judging by the references to these Bills in the speech, they do not seem to occupy a foremost position in the programme of the Government, although, to my mind, the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Bill and the Inter-State Commission Bill are of the greatest importance. I refer to the former measure because of the experience of Western Australia in that regard. For some time we have had an Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, and the result is that strikes are virtually things of the past. The Act is generally admitted to be far from perfect, and the decisions of the courts are very often questioned. It is sometimes said that arbitration courts in their decisions are unfair to the employers or to the men. It must be remembered that that argument may be applied to all courts. Courts are merely human institutions, and it is but human to err. When any one says that an arbitration court may err at times he is only saying that which may be said of a Supreme Court, the Privy Council, or the highest court in the realm. The Inter-State Commission Bill does not seem to have as many friends as the Arbitration Bill. A few evenings ago the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said he failed to see any reason why it should be introduced; that he did not know of any case where preference was shown by railways to such an extent as would justify the formation of an Inter-State Commission. I believe that when certain facts are stated to the House, there is not an honorable member who will not agree that something ought to be done to prevent the preferences which are given in favour of the commodities of one State as against the commodities of other States. I shall quote railway rates in Western Australia to show that local produce is carried at a considerably lower rate than imported produce. Instances might be given to show that imported produce is carried at a rate three or four times higher than that charged for local produce. I have taken from the railway rate book some figures which I am sure will astonish honorable members. Let us take the case of timber which is produced locally to a very considerable extent. From Fremantle to Kalgoorlie, a distance of 387 miles, Western Australian timber is carried on the railways for £1 5s. 9d. per ton, while imported timber is charged £5 0s. 10d. per ton—very nearly four times as much as the local article. That is a direct infringement of the principle of Inter-State free-trade; it means virtually a second Customs house. As a Western Australian, I am sorry to have to bring this question before the House. I am sorry that our Premier, who fought so well to bring Western Australia into the union, did not see that these rates, which are a direct infringement of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, were abolished. However, there seems to be no prospect of the rates being abolished. Over and over again representatives of various public bodies and representatives of the people have waited upon the Premier and his colleagues and asked for the abolition of the rates, but no replies of a satisfactory nature have been received, and consequently it remains for this Parliament to endeavour to have them removed.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There are equally as bad things being done nearer home in the way of wharfage rates.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I am sorry indeed to hear that. I shall now quote the railway rates for some other commodities. Let us take the case of Newcastle coal as compared with coal locally produced at Collie, in Western Australia. The local coal is carried 387 miles at the rate of 17s. 2d. per ton, whilst the imported coal is carried at the rate of £1 14s. 3d.—that is, almost exactly twice as much. I can give numbers of other instances in which the difference is almost equally great.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That system is common to the whole of the railways of the federated States to-day.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I am exceedingly sorry that such is the case. I certainly never realized that anything so bad as this existed in the other States. If such be the case, it is a strong argument for the necessity for bringing forward the Inter-State Commission Bill as soon as possible. The other articles to which I shall refer are fruit and vegetables, sauces, and lard. All those commodities are carried, when locally produced, at £2 5s. 7d., but when imported at £5 0s. 10d. Locally-produced dairy produce is carried at £2 8s. 7d., whilst imported dairy produce is carried at £5 10s. 11d. It seems to me that if this kind of thing is allowed to exist upon the railways of Australia, there is no real Inter-State free-trade. It is simply a second Custom-house system, and should be prevented without delay. I do not say that an Inter-State Commission, founded upon the lines of the last Bill, ought to be established. There are a great many honorable members who are strongly opposed to the establishment of an Inter-State Commission on the expensive lines that were outlined in the Bill presented to Parliament last year. But I appeal to honorable members to see that, at any rate, something is done in order to put a stop to the preferences I have mentioned. They are a direct infringement of the spirit of the Constitution. When the Minister for Home Affairs was in Western Australia, representatives of various public bodies waited upon him and laid the facts concerning railway rates before him. He said that the preferential rates were distinctly unconstitutional, and far worse than anything he had heard of as existing in the other States. I can promise that if the Minister brings forward the Inter-State Commission Bill, I, as a member of the Opposition, will give to him every support that lies in my power. The visit of the federal members to Western Australia during the recess was very much appreciated by the people of that State. When that matter was first referred to in this House—it was I who brought it forward in the first instance—I can well remember that the press described it as a proposal to expend more money than was warranted. An outcry was raised in the press that led people to suppose that it meant an expenditure of tens of thousands of pounds. The actual cost, as shown by the reply given to a question of mine in this House, was something like £170.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—£172 10s.

Mr. WILKS.—How many members went?

Mr. KIRWAN.—I think that every State in the Union was represented; and I am perfectly satisfied that the visit will do a great deal to promote a friendly feeling throughout Australia. It showed the people of Western Australia that members of the Federal Parliament were very much interested in the affairs of the State that is furthest out of the track of Australian traffic. I said at the time, when the proposal was first mooted, that it would not cost more than £200. The newspapers ridiculed the idea, and spoke of the visit as though it would be one wild picnic from beginning to end. They stated that it would involve the Commonwealth in a very heavy expenditure. I am exceedingly pleased to find that the results have justified the low estimate which I made in the first instance. Before concluding, I wish to refer to the question of the construction of a railway to Western Australia, to which reference has been made by most of the speakers during this debate. I recognise that South Australia at present seems to hold the key to the position. If, as the Premier of South Australia and the leader of the Opposition in that State say, South Australia will not give permission for the transcontinental line to pass through its territory, this Parliament is powerless. I notice that the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, in the course of his speech, said that South Australia would not give her assent to the construction of a transcontinental railway upon her territory until a railway were built from Esperance to the eastern gold-fields. I may mention that I have always thought that the Esperance Railway ought to be constructed. During the last session, when the honorable member for Coolgardie brought forward a motion concerning that line, I seconded it, and gave at length reasons why I thought it ought to be built. I hope that the State Parliament and Government of Western Australia will see their way to the construction of the Esperance Railway, so that there will be no necessity to bring the matter again before the Commonwealth Parliament, whilst they will, by so doing, at the same time remove an impediment which, according to the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, exists to the construction of the transcontinental railway. There is nothing antagonistic between the Esperance Railway and the transcontinental line. Every effort ought to be made not only in Western Australia but by members of this Parliament, from a broad and statesmanlike view of their duties, to see that all the railway systems of Australia are united. It has been said that no compact was made in connexion with the transcontinental line. Certainly no written compact was made. There was no actual pledge for its construction. Unfortunately provision for it was not included in the Constitution. But most of the representative men of Australia at the time of the referendum expressed themselves strongly in favour of the construction of the line, and there was not a single representative public man who expressed any doubt whatever that the railway would be one of the first great works to be undertaken by the Commonwealth Parliament. I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker, except to refer to the speech made by the honorable member for Gwydir, who in the course of his remarks seemed to imply that because the leader of the Opposition had not seen fit to move a motion of want of confidence, honorable members on this side were wavering in their criticism of the policy and administration of the Ministry. I am sure that that is not the interpretation that will be placed upon the actions of those on this side of the Chamber by any impartial observer. The members of the Opposition fully recognise that this is the last session of the Parliament. They have over and over again stated that during this session the fiscal issue would not be raised, and the leader of the Opposition has announced that he would not place any bar to proceeding with necessary work that is largely of a non-party nature. He has said that he is prepared to act with the Government to get that work done, thus showing his desire to proceed with the essential business of the Commonwealth. I think that it is somewhat unfair that that action should be construed as it has been by the honorable member for Gwydir, and I am sure that it would not be so construed by any fair-minded man either in this House or outside of it. When the fiscal issue comes to be decided—it is not to be decided during this session, as has been often said—at the next general election, no one who is aware of the feeling of the country can have any doubt as to the result.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I think, comparing the experience of other Federations of modern times with ours, now that the people have had time to look round, to review the work of the first session of the Federal Parliament, and to judge what has been done by their representatives, we may congratulate each other on the success which has attended our efforts, and upon the satisfaction with which our work has been generally received. We have not heard a whisper of secession, except in Queensland from a gentleman who represents the plural voters of that State, and not the people. I attribute the successful issue to the fact that the people had a voice in the framing of the Constitution, and are consequently loyal to it. I have listened with a great degree of interest to the criticisms upon the Governor-General's speech, and the criticisms upon the administration of the Government. These criticisms, boiled down, appear to resolve themselves into censure upon the alarming activity of the Minister for Trade and Customs, and the fact that the Prime Minister did not break the law in admitting six hatters before he was asked to do so. As a matter of fact, the affair of the six hatters ought to be referred to as that of the twelve hatters, because they were twelve in number. The critics of the Ministry take up an extraordinary position when they complain that Ministers have not broken the law, but that they have obeyed the Act which this Parliament made. It is possible, I will admit, that any law may be administered in such a way as to create more friction than is needed; but I, for one, am going to express my appreciation of the activity of the Minister for Trade and Customs, and the measure of success that he has attained. I can quite understand the complaints of persons against whom he has had to set the law in motion, but I am not going to give credence to ex parte statements which come from sources that have proved to be tainted. The head of a large firm which was afterwards prosecuted was prominent amongst those who complained of the harsh way in which the department was being administered. I certainly expected to hear a great deal from the leader of the Opposition. Judging from the statements in the press, the right honorable gentleman seems to have a very big correspondence, and I thought he would have been able to cite cases by the hundred. Instead of that he mentioned only one, the case of a quartermaster who was run in, it was said, for going ashore with a bible and a piece of silk. I consider the Government ought to be proud that so little could be brought against it. I do not intend to go into details in regard to the six hatters, about whom so much has been said. (As a matter of fact twelve hatters were admitted, and I do not know why the people insist upon referring to "the six hatters." According to the press the action of the Government in regard to these men is causing the British Empire to totter to its ruin; but I do not believe there were 1,000 people in England who discussed the matter. The press cabled something to England which was not true. The English newspapers published that cable and commented on the untruth, and then the press representatives at Home wired back to us that public opinion in England was so and so. But it was only public opinion based upon false information. The only complaint I have to make is that a great degree of unfairness has been shown in dealing with the attitude taken up by the Prime Minister. I like to defend any one who is unjustly attacked and even if a man is our greatest enemy we should always endeavour to see that he gets justice. A charge has been made against the Prime Minister that is not true—I refer to the assertion that the hatters were refused admission. Indeed, some ungenerously unfair statements have been made in this House. The honorable member for Robertson certainly made a grossly unfair statement—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member must not say that another honorable member has made a grossly unfair statement. He must withdraw that remark.

Mr. SPENCE.—I withdraw it. I was going to say that I was surprised to hear the honorable member for Robertson make such statements, because it is unusual for him to do so. It was not fair of him to charge the labour party with having influenced the Government in dealing with the case of the hatters. The labour party took no action.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Then who is "Mr. Tudor"?

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Yarra is a member of the labour party, but if the honorable member for Robertson took certain action it would not be fair to say that the Opposition was responsible for that action. I was one of those who waited on the Prime Minister and asked him to refuse to admit the second batch of six hatters, and I consider that, instead of being blameworthy for having endeavoured to shut out these men, the Prime Minister really strained the law in admitting them. If the people will only rid themselves of that unconscious bias, caused, no doubt, by reading the statements in the daily press, and will consider the true facts in a philosophical way they will readily see that the Prime Minister really strained the law in order to admit the men. I am not complaining that he did so, but I do say that it is unfair to charge the labour party with having influenced the Prime Minister. In all the circumstances I am by no means afraid that this provision in the Immigration Restriction Act will not be allowed to stand. When we get away from the little bit of party feeling that at present exists the same evidence which caused this House to vote for that section will lead it to retain it in its integrity.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But the administration in the case of the hatters was wrong.

Mr. SPENCE.—No. The case was dealt with in the only way in which it could have been dealt with. Inquiries had necessarily to be made. An attempt has been made to suggest that our credit has been injured in England by the way in which the hatters were treated. But shiploads of passengers come here and are quarantined for weeks and we never hear that the Empire is likely to be ruined in consequence of that action. Passengers are kept in quarantine until they get a clean bill of health, and these hatters were kept out until they could secure a clean bill of health. I always like to place myself in a position to get at the true facts, and I never swallow the statements of a newspaper. I have had a good deal of experience in these matters, and I have never known of a case in which a man engaged in circumstances similar to those under which these men came out, was not deceived. We were told to-day by the honorable member for Robertson that one of these men had cleared out. This is the kind of man honorable members of the Opposition are championing, and who, they tell us, should be freely admitted into Australia. My experience is that that sort of thing will invariably happen. I do not know of one instance in which men were not deceived when engaged under contract in this way. The way in which the free-trade party have departed from their principles in this case has caused me some astonishment. I do not say that every honorable member of the Opposition goes in for unrestricted competition, but they will see that if men are bound down to work under agreement there can be no fair competition.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In this case the men voluntarily entered into the contract.

Mr. SPENCE.—A man sometimes voluntarily enters upon a work in which he loses his life. Sometimes a man voluntarily kills himself, and if the law catches him in the act of trying to commit suicide, it punishes him for doing so. In speaking of a workman, the expression is always used that he is free to do this and that, that the courts are open to him, and that he can readily secure justice. But what is the good of telling a man who is living from hand to mouth that the Privy Council is open to him, that he can go there and obtain justice? He cannot do anything of the kind. He has to do all manner of things to obtain his bread and butter. If a man lands here under agreement, it cannot be said that he is free. He has to work in accordance with his contract, and he is only free when the conditions are such as to give him absolute freedom. I am not afraid of any alteration in the Act, and I do not think that the Empire was saved when these men were admitted. I wonder that some people have not complained of the failure of the Government to catch the man who went away. The whole thing is nothing more than a party move on the part of the press, and is in keeping with the wave—of which we all know—that is spreading over Australia to-day. The detention of the men for a few days exactly suited this party move. It enabled the press to cable Home that representative British citizens had been refused admission to Australia, and I doubt whether the people at Home have yet been informed that these men were really not refused admission.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — Would the Government do the same thing again?

Mr. SPENCE.—I think the incident will stop men from coming here again in that way. I contend that, according to the strict reading of the law, the Prime Minister could have refused the men admission, and I am not ashamed that I was one of the deputation which requested him to refuse to admit them into the Commonwealth.

Mr. McDONALD.—The mistake made was in allowing them to enter.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am inclined to think so. My own opinion is that a certain party is disappointed because the Prime Minister did not keep them out. If he had only done so they would have had a stronger case, but as it is they are obliged to keep on saying that these men were shut out, although they were not. I desire now to join with the honorable member for Parramatta in complaining to some extent of the administration of the Postal department. As a representative of country districts, I must say that the system adopted in the Post-office in some instances causes great hardship. There are two matters about which I complain. One is the way in which people are compelled to subsidize mail contracts. They cannot get a mail in a great many districts unless they contribute the greater part of the cost of carriage. I object to that system. They should either be refused a mail or the Government should be prepared, if necessary, to carry it at a loss, having regard to the fact that that loss is made up in other places. Letters are carried at a uniform rate, because sufficient revenue is obtained in the thickly populated districts to make up any loss occasioned in carrying mails in more sparsely settled places. I have been travelling in country districts and have been endeavouring to obtain a record of what is paid by way of subsidies for mail contracts. The departmental officials were unable to tell me how much they receive in this way. The practice adopted is to send out an inspector, who makes inquiries and says—“We estimate the revenue to be obtained from the carriage of mails here at so much, and we will contribute so much towards making good the loss that will be incurred. If you can get any one to make up the balance we will run a mail to this place.” In this way many selectors and farmers who are hard up have been compelled to subsidize mail contracts. I will give an illustration showing how much depends on one man. In one case I had great difficulty in securing a certain office. An inspector was sent up to the place, and reported that the estimated revenue for the year would be £10. The first year's work resulted in a revenue of £42, but unless an estimate is made in this way facilities of this kind cannot be obtained. I come now to the question of telephonic and telegraphic communication, and I shall mention only two cases by way of illustration of my complaint. I know that there are many cases, particularly in Queensland, to which other honorable members can refer. There is a certain mining settlement, having a population of 600 people, situate 4 miles from a railway line, and the residents of that place find it impossible to obtain telephonic communication unless they plank down £600 in cash. How can a body of miners—working men—be expected to subscribe £600? The settlement in question is evidently going to be permanent. The principal mine is a very rich one, and there are others adjoining. Altogether, it is a go-ahead place, but the local post-office is what is known as an unofficial one. A postmistress is in charge, and receives £28 a year. For that remuneration she does all the work of the post-office, and practically all the money-order and savings bank business. I know of a somewhat similar district, although the population is not so large, which is in exactly the same position. It seems to me that as soon as there is a reasonable prospect of permanent settlement, the Government should erect a telegraph wire. No very great loss would be occasioned.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The department is working under regulations.

Mr. SPENCE.—Regulations can be altered, and I am pointing out how they should be altered. In the progress of a settlement a stage is eventually reached at which the department determines to erect a wire at its own cost, and it provides telephonic communication, although it may not establish an official office. What I complain of is that the department is too slow in determining to carry out that work. No effort is made to use the Post-office to assist the people in the country; on the contrary, the people are submitted to all sorts of disadvantages. The department will not take a guarantee of any kind in regard to these works. I know that the guarantees of men whose names would be accepted by any merchant have been refused. The department must have cash down, but I am at a loss to understand why private persons should be asked to advance money in that way. I should not complain if it were a case of half-a-dozen people applying for telephone or telegraphic communication at the expense of the country. I would oppose such a thing myself. But here is a permanent settlement, or one that has every appearance of permanency, a place with thoroughly developed and rich mines and with others going ahead, and I say that the department has shown itself to be too slow in supplying the means of communication which such a settlement is entitled to have. The people are put to great expense and loss, the mining companies have to keep a horse and an attendant constantly ready, and messages have to be carried for miles because there is no telephone or telegraphic communication provided. Another matter to which I desire to direct the special attention of the Minister for Home Affairs is one in which every honorable member is interested. I refer to the preparation of the electoral rolls. It is quite evident from the returns we have from New South Wales, and the estimate of Mr. Coghlan, that there must be some 80,000 persons in that State who are not on the rolls. That is a very serious matter. From a comparison of the populations of Victoria and New South Wales, it is clear either that in Victoria names have been duplicated on the rolls, which is very unlikely and which it is perhaps unfair to assume, or that in New South Wales those appointed for the purpose have failed to collect the names of persons entitled to be on the rolls. In my recent trip to my electorate I met a very great many who are not on any roll at all. They do not know whether they are on the federal roll or not, and it is important to consider how they are to get the information. I have a suggestion to make to overcome the difficulty. It will be some little time yet before the plan of the electoral divisions is submitted to us, and there will then be a period of 30 days within which objections may be lodged against the divisions proposed. After that any alteration which may be deemed necessary will have to be made, and all this must be done before the rolls can be finally prepared. I suggest that in the meantime it is possible for the Government to have the temporary rolls, as at present compiled, printed and supplied to the various post-offices of the different districts. People will then be able to examine them, and if they find that their names are not included they can formally apply to have them placed on the rolls. I believe that a supplementary roll provided for in this way would be ready by the time we had dealt with the electoral divisions. Unless some such course is adopted, people will have to write to head-quarters on the subject, and I ask honorable members to imagine 80,000 electors in New South Wales communicating simultaneously with Mr. Lewis. What a nice little contract that gentleman would have in discovering whether the names of those persons are, or ought to be, on the rolls. The matter is one which, I think, should be dealt with at once, that the difficulty may be overcome in time for the senatorial elections, apart altogether from the elections for the House of Representatives.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—How were the names left off? Did not the police go round?

MR. SPENCE.—It is true that the police went round as they did in connexion with the compilation of the rolls for the previous elections, when thousands of names were left off. I know that in my own electorate before the last election took place we managed to get the names of no less than 170 men put on the rolls. Those names had been struck off, though most of the men had been living in the district for years. In one town, Warren, the names of all the clergymen were struck off, for what reason no one could say. I am not speaking of the case of new electors, but of men who had previously been on the rolls. One man whose name was struck off was continually under the eyes of the constable, who could not go out of his door any day without seeing him. I say that the data supplied for the purpose of revising the rolls has been incorrect, and country districts have suffered more than metropolitan districts in this respect. Owing to the drought there has been a temporary concentration of people within the metropolis, who, since the rain has fallen are going back to the country districts which they left. During the time of the drought the country districts of course had a minimum population, whilst the population of Sydney was at the maximum. That will probably account very largely for the preponderance of women voters in the metropolis as the wives, daughters and servants of managers of stations being in Sydney temporarily would of course be placed upon the Sydney rolls. The Government might consider the suggestion I make and see whether it is not possible to issue copies of the temporary rolls to enable persons whose names are not included to take steps to get them upon the roll.

MR. CONROY.—What is the last day upon which they can be put upon the rolls?

MR. SPENCE.—Revision courts will have beheld after the rolls have been compiled, and there will not be time for all that requires to be done unless some such suggestion as that which I have made is acted upon. I shall not now say very much about the proposed Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. It goes without saying that I am heartily in favour of that measure. It has always been a proposal of the labour party. Labour has always been prepared for arbitration, while it has been the other side that has been against it, and it is the other side that will be found against it now. I shall reserve more lengthy remarks upon the matter until the measure is before the House, but I should like now to urge its importance, and to suggest that it should be one of the first measures considered. I do not agree with the honorable member for North Sydney that it is not urgently needed. I know of cases now waiting in which complications are likely to arise unless a court of conciliation and arbitration is established. I refer, of course, to cases affecting Inter-State matters. I quite recognise that the question of jurisdiction will be one which there will be some difficulty in deciding. It will not be easy to draw the line between Inter-State and purely State matters. But there are some cases which are certainly Inter-State waiting to come before the court as soon as it is established. I do not anticipate that the court will have a great deal of work to do, and while on that account it need not be very costly, I venture to think that it will be the means of saving the people of Australia a very large sum indeed. Even if its establishment involves considerable expense, I know of no court whose work would be of more value to the people of the Commonwealth. I agree with the leader of our party that, as trades unionists, we may have to make sacrifices in some things of value to us, but we shall be prepared to do that for the sake of industrial peace, and in order that good relations between employers and employes may not be disturbed. On the subject of the proposed High Court of Judicature, I feel that we still require a great deal of information, which I hope we shall get when the measure for its establishment is introduced. As the proposal is to give the court original jurisdiction, it is probable that upon its establishment it will be able to take over the consideration of a great many cases which now come before State courts that have been given federal jurisdiction. This will probably affect the question of the cost of its establishment, because if there is a good deal of work to be done by the court, and we are called upon to pay high salaries to the Judges, they will probably be earning their money. I point out that in the way I have suggested the work done by the proposed High Court may lessen the work which, under existing circumstances, must be done by the States judiciaries, and on that account some savings may be effected by the States. I know that there have been complaints in New South Wales recently that the Judges there are overworked, and are unable to overtake the work they are required to perform. I think that the Judges of the Federal High Court will become specialists, will acquire special knowledge for the performance of their functions, and in that way will have an advantage over the Judges of the various States who temporarily exercise federal jurisdiction. I agree that if a High Court is to be established, we should try to keep down its cost as much as possible. The Federation should go slowly and steadily in the setting up of these great institutions, and certainly if it can be shown that a High Court can be dispensed with for a time without involving injustice, I should favour delay. I have heard nothing so far to induce me to believe that very much will be gained by the people of the Commonwealth as a whole by postponing the establishment of the High Court. I am not greatly in love with the proposals for naval defence. My idea is that if we give our people practice in the use of the best rifle, and supply them with rifles and ammunition, through rifle clubs and such bodies, they will take care of Australia. In conversation with authorities on the subject of defence, I found that the popular idea of a vessel appearing outside Sydney Heads and shelling the city was ridiculed. It was pointed out that war vessels carried a limited quantity of ammunition for the purposes of sea fighting, and they would not be likely to waste it in shelling a place like Sydney, where there is so much space taken up by water, gardens, and streets. It has been suggested before now that one of the best defences which Sydney could have would be an effective fire brigade system, so that fires which might be lighted by shellsthrown into the city could be promptly extinguished. But I have been told that it is not likely that a war vessel would do any such thing as fire shells into the city. I was assured by a good authority, a professional military man, that an iron-clad might get into Sydney Harbor, but it was not reckoned that it could get out. It was not supposed that its entry could be prevented either by the fixed guns or by submarine mines, because we know what may be done by counter mines. It seems to me that we require a good deal more information upon the subject than we have at present. We cannot contemplate the formation of a big navy able to fight the number of ships likely to come here. I recognise that a gunboat might be able to defend us from the operations of an ordinary cruiser or privateer, but if it were the intention of an enemy to do anything in the way of taking away loot, the number of ships required for the purpose would be sent, and we should require a considerable navy to fight them. It seems to me that there is a great deal of waste about the defence business altogether and I am not in favour of the idea of even forming the nucleus of an Australian navy at present. There have been so many developments recently in connexion with the business of defence that I hope the fullest information will be given on the subject when the measure referred to in the speech is brought before us, and that the whole question will be very carefully considered. Perhaps the proposal which has been suggested is the best that we can accept. It is possible that it would be better to have ships which would be under our own control if we are to have them at all, and small fast cruisers to run round the coast would be useful for the purpose of supplying information. The authorities of Great Britain must, of course, protect their commerce, and I have no doubt they will do so. I would rather see Great Britain and the other leading nations of the world join together to set up an arbitration court, and compel all countries to bring their disputes before it. Of course there would always have to be the ultimate resort to force, but such an arrangement would be a better way of settling difficulties than that which now obtains and which necessitates the constant building up and equipping of huge armaments. A great deal of money has been wasted in the past in military preparations, and while I do not wish it to be forgotten that Australia is part of an Empire to which her people are proud to belong, and whom we do not wish to treat meanly, I am of opinion that we cannot afford to spend much money on defence. I wish now to refer to the finance problem. In the first place I congratulate the Ministry, and especially the Treasurer, upon the attitude which they have taken in regard to the proposals of the six Australian statesmen who met in Sydney to sketch out how, in their opinion, the Commonwealth should be run. Those financial geniuses evolved a splendid plan. They proposed that the people of Australia should borrow a large amount of money to buy back from themselves buildings which they had already paid for with borrowed money. I do not know what a private person would think if an arrangement of that kind were suggested to him in regard to his own business. Those gentlemen forgot that we are all one people, and that the Commonwealth and the various State Governments and Parliaments are so many committees appointed by the public to manage their business. I am very glad that the Ministry have indicated that they will not be parties to such a scheme for sneaking in a £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 loan. In this connexion, I should like to refer to a phase of the matter which I have not yet heard mentioned, and to make a suggestion which I hope will commend itself to honorable members. The pooling of the public debts of the States and their conversion into a Commonwealth debt is a matter which has been very much discussed of late, and an arrangement to which I am favorable. But I do not think that the time is quite ripe for bringing about such a conversion, and I was not surprised to find no reference in the Governor-General's speech to the subject. Before anything can be done, some understanding must be arrived at between the Commonwealth and the States as to future borrowing. It is very clear that if the public debts of the States are converted into a Commonwealth debt, we shall have the unpleasant task of collecting taxation to repay what has been borrowed, whilst the Governments of the States will have the pleasant task of spending whatever money may be borrowed in future. The Commonwealth, however, could not be put into the position of determining for what purposes the States should, or should not, float loans, because that would be an interference with the powers of the Governments of the States; but before anything can be done in the way of conversion there must be some definite understanding on the subject of borrowing. It is manifestly clear that future borrowing must be done through the Commonwealth Government. In 31 years the Australian people have paid no less a sum than £103,000,000 to the British money holder without in any way lessening their indebtedness to him. Therefore I say that it has become necessary to establish a sinking fund to provide for the reduction of our indebtedness.

Mr. FOWLER.—Western Australia has established sinking funds in connexion with all her loans.

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes; but there should be a sinking fund to provide for the reduction and extinction of the whole of the debts of the Commonwealth. I would also suggest that an understanding should be arrived at with the States as to the purposes for which money should be borrowed. In my opinion, the Commonwealth should insist that the States Governments shall expend loan money only upon two subjects, the making of rail ways and the conservation of water. I mention those two objects because such works would be reproductive, and are absolutely necessary in a country like Australia. But I do not agree with the suggestion of the honorable member for Bourke that the borrowing powers of the States should be in proportion to their population. On the contrary, I claim that a sparsely populated State like Queensland, which has a big territory to develop, is much more justified in borrowing for the purposes I have named than a State having a smaller area and a larger population. If the objects upon which loan money were expended could be limited, that would be a check upon the extravagance of the States Governments, and would prevent them from yielding to the pressure which is now brought to bear upon them. In both New South Wales and Victoria proposals for large public works are inquired into by parliamentary committees before being laid before Parliament, and this relieves some of the pressure, but a check such as I speak of is still absolutely necessary to prevent the foolish expenditure of loan money. The members of the Opposition seem to consider that the Government are settled in their seats on the Treasury benches, and if that is so they will have plenty of time to go fully into these matters with the Governments of the States before any proposal is made. I hope that negotiations will be opened up with the Governments of the States, and that a reasonable understanding will be arrived at, so that the matter may be dealt with by next Parliament. I have taken from Coghlan a few figures which will show very clearly how great are the financial burdens which the people of Australia have now to bear. According to Coghlan, our public debt amounts to £55 17s. 1d. per head of population; which does not seem an enormous sum. But it must also be remembered that 10 per cent. of the property of the Commonwealth is owned by persons living outside its borders, and that 20 per cent. of the property of New South Wales is owned by people living outside the borders of that State. In view of these facts I wonder that the States which find themselves short of money are not imposing absentee taxation. In the figures I am about to give the dividends drawn by absentees are included. The indebtedness of the Commonwealth incurred by the Governments and local governing bodies is, according to the latest figures, £192,341,000, and our indebtedness under private investment, including money drawn by absentees, £127,951,000, a grand total of £320,292,000, or £83 11s. 4d. per inhabitant. Those figures do not include mining investments. According to the statistics for 1901, the people of the Commonwealth pay annually to the British money lender £13,039,000 in interest. To ascertain what this means to the population taken individually, I have calculated its incidence upon the breadwinners of the Commonwealth. There are in the Commonwealth 1,269,000 male and 339,000 female breadwinners. Of these, 1,214,057, or 61 per cent. of our population, are male breadwinners between the ages of 15 and 65 years, and their contribution amounts to £10 5s., or about 4s. per week each. Those figures should bring it closely home to us that this matter of borrowing should be carefully looked into. It behoves us to see whether we are not nearing the time when, if we should not put a stop to public borrowing altogether, we should borrow as little as possible. I am not contending that it is not often profitable to borrow, but borrowing is profitable only when the money borrowed is expended upon the development of natural resources which we could not so rapidly develop out of revenue. In a country like Australia, whose rivers are mostly chains of water-holes in the summer time, we must have railways to open up the land, and where such railways develop our mining, agricultural, and pastoral industries it is profitable to make them even if we have to borrow money to do so. But we cannot continue the present system of borrowing, and the figures which I have given show what a load of debt it has already placed upon us. According to Coghlan the British money lender has received from Australia £56,000,000 more than he has advanced. I wish now to say a word or two to ridicule the talk which we have heard about that personage not being willing to lend us more money. As a matter of fact he has got in Australia the best field for investments that he ever discovered. We pay our interest directly it is due, and we have repaid him £56,000,000 more than we have borrowed, without reducing our indebtedness. To show how ridiculous some of the statements which have been made by the press are, I will quote a few figures. The newspapers are always ready, to serve party interests, to write of the country as if it were going to ruin. I find, however, that it is really the richest country in the world. The country which produces least wealth per inhabitant is Russia, whose production is less than £5, while that of Germany is about £8; of England, £7 18s. 6d.; of Sweden and Denmark, £10; of France, £11 11s. 6d.; of America, £14 14s.; of Canada, £16 5s. 6d.; and of Australia, more than twice as much as that of the United States, namely, £29 12s. 7d. Those figures were compiled upon the returns for the year 1901, when our yield of wool was much lower than in years previous. Every one person in six in Australia owns property over £100 in value. Whilst the condition of many of our people is very hard, our exports and our savings show that in the aggregate we are very well off. Nothing, therefore, can be more absurd than the cry that John Bull and Company will refuse to lend money to Australia. But it is our business to study our own interests rather than his, and for that reason I hope that in future our public borrowing will be much less than it has been in the past. I was glad that this House determined last session that the Commonwealth should not borrow to provide for public works which could very well be paid for out of revenue. I do not think there is any likelihood of all the measures in the Governor-General's speech being dealt with this session, but I certainly think in regard to the proposed establishment of an Inter-State Commission that, if the Federation is likely to take over the railways—and the idea that it should may grow in the minds of the people—we shall not want such a body. We should consider whether it would not be better for us to adopt the easiest and cheapest method of regulating these matters, without entering upon any elaborate arrangements, until the question of taking over the control of the railways can receive further attention. Possibly it would be much better for all concerned if the railways were placed under federal authority.

Mr. FOWLER.—The work of the Interstate Commission might lead up to the federalization of the railways.

Mr. SPENCE.—Perhaps so, but a simple and inexpensive tribunal might effect that purpose quite as readily as the body proposed to be erected under the elaborate scheme suggested by the remarks of some honorable members. I hope that no time will be lost in obtaining the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the suitability of the sites suggested for the federal capital. I have taken every opportunity of denying the absurd rumour which has been in circulation to the effect that it is proposed to spend £5,000,000 in the establishment of the capital. There is no foundation for any such idea. The site for the federal capital should be selected as early as possible, because it is manifestly unfair to New South Wales to incur any unnecessary delay. After the site has been fixed upon, the area will have to be mapped out, and under the most favorable circumstances the capital cannot be established before some considerable time has elapsed.

Mr. FISHER.—We might start with tents instead of permanent buildings.

Mr. SPENCE.—I should have no very strong objection to adopting even that course, but I hope to see the whole question settled as speedily as possible.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—The long programme submitted by the Government affords an opportunity for very wide discussion, but I do not propose to deal with the subjects mentioned in the Governor-General's speech except in a general way. I shall defer any remarks I may have to make until the measures foreshadowed are brought before us. I welcome the proposed High Court Bill. I listened with very great attention to the eloquent speech delivered by the Attorney-General in connexion with the measure introduced last session. I have always advocated the appointment of a High Court, and, after hearing the Minister's speech, I was more than ever convinced that in the interests of the Commonwealth it was absolutely necessary that a High Court should be created. I have been astonished at some of the suggestions made regarding the vast amount of expense which will be entailed by the establishment of the proposed tribunal, and this is one of the matters on which I shall require the fullest information before I cast my vote. I am not prepared to approve of any undue expenditure. I hope that in regard to the High Court Bill and other measures which are to be brought in the Government will not advance them to the second reading stage and then allow them to drift along in a haphazard way as was the case with a number of Bills last session. I trust that the Government will not resort to their previous practice of counting heads in order to ascertain the feeling of the House, but that they will act with that independence and resolution which should always characterize a dignified Administration. I desire to direct attention to one or two matters affecting the constituency which I represent. We have there one of the largest industrial centres in Australia, with fifteen or sixteen coal mines, numerous coke works, large harbor works, brick works, and other important industrial undertakings. I interested myself in attempting to secure telephonic communication between that district, which is 50 or 60 miles from Sydney, and the metropolis. Estimates were drawn up and other preparations made, and just when everything seemed complete I was asked to provide £700 cash for five years as a guarantee to cover the working expenses of the line. So far as the Illawarra district is concerned, no doubt the money could be found, but why should the people be asked to furnish a guarantee for a public facility which should be provided for the benefit of the whole district? My contention is that in the case of a great industrial centre with a settled population—not a moving population such as might be temporarily located on a gold-field—the Postmaster-General should deal with an application for telephone communication as a matter of general policy, and should, if the circumstances appear to him to warrant it, carry out the work independently of any guarantee on the part of the people. In another case it was proposed to connect the Camden hospital with the residence of its medical officers, but in that instance also a guarantee had to be provided before the work was carried out. Surely, of all institutions, those which are provided by the people for the relief of human distress should receive the greatest consideration at the hands of the authorities. The principle upon which these and similar applications are dealt with at present appears to me to be absolutely wrong, and the sooner the present regulations are repealed the better it will be for all concerned. I have also to complain of the unaccountable delay in the expenditure of money voted in June last for carrying out work in connexion with the Postal department in my district. In one case money was voted to provide a postal service for an important centre at which there are large smelting works employing upwards of 600 hands, but although twelve months have elapsed the plans and specifications for the work are not yet ready. In another instance £67 was voted for painting and repairs at a post office, and although the premises are in a disgraceful condition, the plans and specifications for this work also are still incomplete. Judging from my own experience and from the criticisms passed by a number of honorable members, the administration of the Postal department is not being carried on with any approach to satisfaction. I do not wish to say anything of a personal character against the Postmaster-General or his under-secretary, Mr. Scott, but so far as I have been able to observe the magnificent postal facilities to which we have been accustomed in New South Wales are gradually being brought down to the level of the conveniences provided for the public of Queensland. The object should be not to level down in this way, but to improve in the highest possible degree the means provided for ministering to the public convenience. I desire to touch upon one matter in regard to which I put some questions to the Minister for Trade and Customs yesterday. I allude to the proposed enactment of uniform patents laws, to which reference was made in the Governor-General's speech. Those who have had anything to do with the registration of patents in the various patents offices throughout the States, must be aware of the great difficulties under which inventors labour at the present time. In New South Wales it is notorious that the office is in a state of confusion and chaos, as a result of which the public are called upon to submit to great inconvenience. I am personally acquainted with many investors, who are anxiously awaiting the enactment of a federal patents law, so that, instead of having to register their patents in each of the States, they may take out one patent for the whole of the Commonwealth. The answer which the Minister for Trade and Customs—in whose department this matter is—gave to me yesterday, was that he had no power to interfere until a statute dealing with it had been passed. No doubt his statement is perfectly correct; but my idea is that, in the interim, a convention composed of men possessed of technical skill and knowledge should meet, with a view to placing the State patents offices in order. We all know that at the present time the transfer of patents from one person to another is a very expensive process. It resembles the style of the old land transfers to which the people of New South Wales were accustomed before the adoption of the Torrens title simplified the procedure necessary in such cases. Under existing circumstances, no layman can obtain a transfer of a patent without consulting the legal fraternity, against whom there is such a strong antipathy in this House. After all, it should be remembered that the majority of the inventors who take out patents belong to the poor or middle classes of the community, and I think that the Minister for Trade and Customs would do well to consider the suggestion which I have made, in order that the process of transfer may be rendered as inexpensive as possible. The honorable member for Echuca, speaking as a representative of the farmers, objected to any large expenditure in connexion with the Federation. Amongst other matters, he declared that we should be careful not to incur any expenditure in connexion with the establishment of the federal capital. But I would point out that in selecting the capital site we shall be merely carrying out the compact under which New South Wales was induced to join the union. That in itself is a reason why the work should be undertaken at the earliest possible moment. Last session, in common with the honorable member for North Sydney and the honorable member for Parramatta, I was anxious to ascertain something regarding the duties which the board of experts that has since been appointed to deal with the matter would be called upon to perform. At that time the report of Mr. Oliver was available, together with all the evidence taken by him, and I felt satisfied that no additional information of any value connected with the questions into which he inquired could be furnished by any commission. What has been the result? The members of the commission have travelled all over the country, collected a large amount of evidence upon the same lines as that submitted to Mr. Oliver, have ascertained the price of tomatoes in Albury, and acquired voluminous information of a similar character. I was sorry to hear from the Minister for Home Affairs yesterday, that the report of the commission would not be available till next month, although it was promised for the middle of April. These are some of the matters which tend to delay the carrying out of the compact made with New South Wales. The remarks of the honorable member for Echuca were only a repetition of what has been said for months past by the daily newspapers of Melbourne. They object to the establishment of a federal capital on the ground of expense, and suggest that we should have a peripatetic capital alternating between Melbourne and Sydney. These suggestions are put forward only for the purpose of securing delay in the selection of the site.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—They will not delay it.

Mr. FULLER.—At any rate we cannot deal with the report of the commission until it has been received. That means a further delay of a couple of months. I should like, also, to refer to one matter connected with the Defence department. I understand that the general officer commanding the forces of the Commonwealth proposes to dispense with the band which is connected with the regiment of lancers in New South Wales. That regiment is a most important part of the State military forces. It is a body the members of which have shown their loyalty to the British Empire perhaps more than any other force in Australia. They were the first colonial troops to land in South Africa, and to be sent to the front during the Boer war. Upon different occasions they have journeyed to England at their own expense to compete at military tournaments, and they also took part in the celebrations connected with the Queen's Jubilee. The members of the band connected with the regiment are trained soldiers who go through an annual course of musketry. In other words, they are well qualified for active service. Although the head-quarters of the regiment are in Sydney, branches of it exist in a great many towns in New South Wales. There is one in the constituency of the honorable member for Parramatta, another in the electorate of the Prime Minister, and three in the district which I have the honour to represent. I understand that the officer commanding the regiment has called a public meeting in connexion with this matter, and that a petition has been sent to the Prime Minister with a view to securing provision upon the Estimates to prevent the services of this band from being dispensed with.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are providing £150 a year.

Mr. FULLER.—I was not aware of that. I understood from the report of the public meeting which was held that no allowance had been made.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The amount is not so large as it was.

Mr. FULLER.—Colonel Burns, the officer commanding the regiment, as well as some of its members, have spent a considerable amount of money out of their own pockets in connexion with its maintenance, and therefore I think that they are entitled to considerate treatment. Knowing how strong are the Imperial instincts of the Minister, I feel sure that after their services in South Africa, he will grant them every consideration. We have heard a good deal from various speakers throughout the Commonwealth, and notably the Prime Minister, as to the necessity of having what is called a "Tariff rest." The honorable member for Echuca was very strong on that point to-day, holding that in the interests of the country we ought to be satisfied with the Tariff as it now stands, and that there ought to be a cessation of fiscal discussion. The honorable member also expressed the opinion that if the leader of the Opposition re-opened the Tariff question, his chance of reaching the Treasury bench would be hopeless. I do not know whether the Treasury bench constitutes the great aim of the right honorable gentleman, but as for myself, I am fighting as, I believe, my leader is fighting, for a revenue Tariff in the best interests of Australia. The Prime Minister, speaking at Dungog, said that if the Tariff were swept away, and another substituted, the second would be more of a botch than the first, thus acknowledging that the present Tariff is a botch.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Perhaps the honorable and learned member was not present last night when I denied having called the present Tariff a botch. I did say something about the Opposition endeavouring to make it a botch, but nothing to the effect that it was a botch.

Mr. FULLER.—I was present in the chamber last night, but did not hear the explanation. My authority, however, is the report of the speech in the Sydney Morning Herald.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not blame the newspapers for an error like that; there are many errors which we cannot contradict.

Mr. FULLER.—The Prime Minister also said that it would be iniquitous to bring about a period of unrest, and he appealed to the people to give the Tariff an opportunity of settling down. On the same occasion the Prime Minister asked why we should go through a period of unrest "to suit the people on the other side." But this is not altogether a matter of "suing the people on the other side." The question ought to be settled in the interests of the people of Australia. It is in those interests, and not merely for the advancement of personal aims, that honorable members on this side are fighting. At Maitland, on 27th April, the Prime Minister said—

But whether Mr. Reid failed or succeeded to reopen this question it would be an act of perfidy to the Commonwealth, because it would mean that for the sake of fads and theories and the desires of office they would get rid of that which ought to be tried under normal conditions.

It appears to me that the remark about "fads and theories" applies equally to the Ministerial side, seeing that they insist on maintaining the present Tariff in order to carry out their fad or theory of protection. After the Maitland manifesto of the Prime Minister, the people of New South Wales had no idea that such a Tariff as that laid before the House last session would be presented, and there is not the slightest doubt that as introduced the Tariff was a partisan measure.

Mr. BAMFORD.—New South Wales is not the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. FULLER.—That is so, but I have no doubt that the people of New South Wales will make their voice heard at the next election. Ministerial members, and the newspapers which support them, charge the Opposition with the responsibility of delaying much needed legislation by the prolonged discussion on the Tariff proposals.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We do not blame the Opposition.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable may not, but most Ministerial supporters do blame us. The same charge has been made against us by the Prime Minister.

Mr. THOMSON.—The discussion on the Tariff occupied time equal to only 58 sitting days.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The blame laid on the Opposition is severe, but it is merited.

Mr. FULLER.—That may be the honorable member's opinion, but I do not know whether he will consider that the present Ministerial supporters will merit the result of the next election. The Prime Minister asked—Whether under the struggle and strife they have had, they should again be subject to similar strife and struggle for the mad purpose of pulling up the plant before they knew whether the roots had struck.

That is the very reason why we want the question fought out at the earliest possible moment. If the roots of protection do get struck in Australia, we shall hear the same old miserable cries about vested interests—the same cries which were heard in the lobbies throughout the Tariff discussion—and it is in order to avoid such a result that we want the matter decided by the people at the earliest possible moment. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro smiles, but I ask him whether there are no people in the Commonwealth deserving consideration except those interested in manufactures? Has no regard to be paid to the miners, farmers, and others throughout the country districts, who are engaged in the great industries which have been the backbone of Australia from the very beginning? Are these people not entitled to some consideration in connexion with a Tariff for all Australia? The honorable member for Gwydir, this afternoon, said that the agricultural duties produced only £17,000 at the port of Sydney during the six months prior to last December. But the people of New South Wales and Queensland know what they have to pay in consequence of the present Tariff. It is not merely a question of the £17,000 paid at Sydney on the foreign produce imported; we have to consider the enhanced price which, as a result of the Tariff, the people of New South Wales and Queensland have to pay for the produce received from Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It must be remembered that those duties always existed in Queensland.

Mr. FULLER.—But the New South Wales people have been accustomed to live in an air of freedom, and they desire to see the people of Australia breathing the same healthy atmosphere. It is no new thing for the Prime Minister to urge a Tariff rest, because as far back as 1894 the right honorable gentleman was engaged in talking in exactly the same way in relation to the Dibbs Tariff in New South Wales. In defence of that Tariff, the Prime Minister then said—

A drastic alteration would unsettle every commercial and industrial interest, would unhinge all the operations which had begun under different arrangements, and in a time like this, where we are crossing the stream, we should not be asked to swap horses.

But the New South Wales people insisted on “swapping horses” when “crossing the stream.” There was a general election which resulted in the Dibbs Tariff being swept away, and in the establishment of free-trade — or comparative free-trade at any rate—in the mother State, which then entered on a period of prosperity never enjoyed under protection.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It would have been better if the people of New South Wales had taken my advice.

Mr. FULLER.—I believe that at the Commonwealth election the people will refuse to accept the Tariff rest which the Prime Minister offers. I feel satisfied that we shall have a revulsion of feeling from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, with the result that the people will again be able to breathe that air of freedom to which they had been accustomed. In regard to the naval agreement, I am one of those who desire to keep Australia for white people. The prominent way in which we have brought ourselves before the world in recent years, and the class of legislation which we have been passing, imposes upon us the necessity of doing something to preserve our shores against attack. We have always lived under the flag of Old England. It has been our protection in the past, and I trust that it will always be so. The proposition made by the Prime Minister meets with my hearty approval. If we desire to keep Australia for white people; if we wish to be in a position to enforce our legislation, then we must place ourselves in as strong a position as possible to defend our shores. I entirely agree with that part of the Governor-General's speech, and I sincerely trust that those measures which are in the interests of the people of Australia will be proceeded with as expeditiously as possible in this House.

Debate (on motion by Mr. WILKS) adjourned.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until Tuesday next, at half-past two o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT.

ELECTORAL ROLLS: DRAYTON GRANGE INQUIRY.

Motion (by Sir EDMUND BARTON) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley). — I desire to bring under the notice of the Government, particularly the Minister for Home Affairs, a matter of some importance to the electors of New South Wales. From a paragraph in the press to-day it appears that the Minister for Home Affairs has discovered a discrepancy between the census returns and the electoral rolls of New South Wales; that that discrepancy represents 80,000 voters, and that he is placed in a much perplexed position. It has also placed the electors of New South Wales in a much perplexed position, and the discovery of this discrepancy requires some explanation. Of course the census returns and the electoral rolls were in the possession of the officers appointed to redistribute the electorates, and they should have been aware of this discrepancy before they plotted out the districts. The districts have been plotted out, and suddenly the Minister states that he is in great trouble and perplexity by reason of the discovery of this discrepancy. If it is not explained, and explained early, it will throw some suspicion on the motives of the Minister. I do not think that he can be accused of gerrymandering. I understand that he has applied to Sir John See for further information in regard to electoral matters. Why was not such information asked for before the plotting took place? If this matter is allowed to pass without an explanation he cannot be surprised at the public thinking that the Ministry are scheming to undo what has been done. I do not think that that is the case. I should like the Prime Minister if he can to make an explanation, and if he is not in a position to explain I trust that the Minister for Home Affairs will be able to give a full and clear explanation to the House next week.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Minister for Defence).—In compliance with the request of the honorable member for Maranoa, I have obtained all the correspondence relating to the Drayton Grange inquiry. I propose to leave the papers on the table for the inspection of honorable members, as I do not wish the department to have the work of copying them unless it is specially desired. I hope that when they are done with by honorable members in a month or two, I may be permitted to return them to the department.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—With reference to the inquiry which the honorable member for Dalley has made, the Minister for Home Affairs, who has gone away during the last few minutes, has a larger knowledge of this matter, departmentally, than I have. All that appears, so far as I know, is that in comparing the population of New South Wales and other States, now that we have adult suffrage, it is estimated that the numbers returned on the rolls in New South Wales are 80,000 short of what they should be, taking the population as the basis.

Mr. WILKS.—According to their own census returns.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It may be in accordance with the census returns, but that I am not aware of. My honorable colleague is making inquiries, with a view of finding out how it is that the rolls show such a discrepancy. If it appears that it is a discrepancy that is inevitable the matter will go no further. But if it appears that an obvious injustice is being done to New South Wales with respect to the return of the rolls, then it will be for the Minister to consider whether he will bring any, and what proposal before the House.

Mr. WILKS.—The officials were armed with the information before they plotted out the districts.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Possibly, and that may be some evidence that the rolls were properly collected. It all depends upon the results of the investigation.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 4.8 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 2 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

INTER-STATE DUTIES.

Mr. THOMSON.—I wish to know from the Minister for Trade and Customs what is the date of the decision of the Attorney-General that Inter-State adjustments were necessary for transfers of goods under the State Tariffs?

Mr. KINGSTON.—There have been several opinions, the first of which was given in, I think, September, 1901. I am expecting full particulars, however, and I hope to be able to give the honorable member all the dates later in the afternoon.

IMPERIAL SERVICE ORDER.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if the recent appointments in the Commonwealth to the Imperial Service Order were made with the knowledge or concurrence or at the suggestion of the Ministry?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The distinctions, which have been conferred upon officers of the public service of the Commonwealth were so given.

PAPER.

Sir GEORGE TURNER laid upon the table—

Audit Act, two returns as to transfers, financial years 1901-2 and 1902-3.

GENERAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. POYNTON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether it is the intention of the Government to hold the next general elections of the House of Representatives on the same date as the elections for the Senate?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is not usual to state publicly by way of anticipation any advice that it is proposed to tender to the Crown, but with the promised co-operation of honorable members in the passage of much necessary legislation, the Government look forward with great satisfaction to the possibility of such an arrangement.

DEFENCE OF FREMANTLE.

Mr. E. SOLOMON asked the Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Whether the Defence department is taking into consideration the advisability of erecting fortifications at Fremantle?

2. Whether the department will appoint experts to report on the matter?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. Yes.

2. The matter has been gone into by the expert officers of the department, and the General Officer Commanding has submitted certain recommendations.

OPENING OF POST-OFFICES.

Mr. McCOLL asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the Postmaster-General is aware that the late hour at which post and telegraph offices open is not convenient for the public?

2. Whether the Postmaster-General will take steps to have the offices opened at an earlier hour?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. The Postmaster-General is aware that complaints have been made that the hour at which the post and telegraph offices open is not convenient in Victoria.

2. Inquiry is being made in order to ascertain the hours for keeping those offices open which would be most convenient to the public in Victoria.

PERMANENT ARTILLERY
RETIREMENTS.

Mr. McDONALD (for Mr. HUGHES) asked the Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Whether it is a fact that six members of the New South Wales Permanent Artillery are to be compulsorily retired at the end of June next?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. Is any provision to be made for compensation to these men?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. Yes.

2. On reduction of establishment.

3. Yes.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH :
ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 29th May (vide page 329), on motion by Mr. L. E. GROOM—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted :—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—Since you have had the proud privilege of presiding over our deliberations, Mr. Speaker, you have not heard more suave explanations than those you listened to last week, not only from the Prime Minister, but from other members who spoke on that side of the House, in reference to the policy outlined in the speech of the Governor-General. The Prime Minister took two hours of valuable time to tell us that the leader of the Opposition had said nothing to which he could reply. If such a speech had been made by an honorable member on this side of the Chamber he would have been charged with obstruction. The right honorable gentleman, however, brightened his address by a reference to a work on political science called "The Pirates of Penzance," and quoted from a chapter which deals with policemen. We should indeed be thankful to the laughter-makers of the Empire for the aid they sometimes lend us in that direction, and, with apologies to Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan, I will quote from the same source, slightly paraphrasing my quotation, and say that—

Taking one consideration with another—with another—

The Prime Minister's life is not a happy one —Tarantara !

Not only did the Prime Minister occupy our time at great length in telling us that he had nothing to reply to, but other honorable members on his side followed on very similar lines. The leader of the Labour party, the political Warwick of the Commonwealth, told us, however, that, while he was well satisfied with the Government, he trusted that this session the Prime Minister and his colleagues would take command of their own business. Fancy the effect of such a remark from one in his position in any of the Parliaments of the States! Such a remark is in itself a motion of censure. The honorable member virtually charged the Prime Minister with having had no control over Government business last session. Members of the Opposition made that charge last session, and now we have it repeated by an honorable member who speaks, not for himself alone, but as the mouth-piece of a number of others whom he has been elected to lead. I hope that the Prime Minister will take the honorable member's advice, and that the Ministry as a whole will recognise their responsibility for the measures submitted to this House. If that happens, we shall not have the waste of time which is said to have occurred last session. There is, however, one matter upon which the House may well expect an explanation. The honorable member for North Sydney, who is always heard with attention, and whose remarks are always valued, because he is moderate in his opinions, and never overstates a case, has stated in the presence of the Minister for Trade and Customs that revenue to the extent of £27,000 has escaped through the meshes of the Customs drag-net. The Minister has not yet deemed it worth while to answer that statement, but the members of this House and the people outside will want to know why this hitherto frigid, rigid, and exacting administrator has allowed so much revenue to escape his net. If the Minister does not think that the House and the country are entitled to an explanation, he should make one for the sake of his own reputation. Indeed, the charge was of so serious a nature that the House might well have adjourned until the Minister was in a position to make a detailed reply to it. The honorable member for North Sydney informed the House that the Colonial Sugar Refining Company of Sydney presented a petition to the Senate seven or eight months ago, setting forth that excise duty amounting to £27,000 had not been paid on 9,000 tons of sugar which was dutiable; that they had received no reply to that petition, and only scant attention to their representations at other times; and that, later on, they petitioned the Governor-General in Council—the last resort which an aggrieved person has—and the only reply received was that there had been no discrimination. What they did they did as honest citizens acting in the interests of the Commonwealth, and they now reiterate their charge in a petition which has been presented to this House. Contrary to his usual custom, when an attack is made upon his administration, the Minister for Trade and Customs remained absolutely dumb after that charge was made. During the recess he was so careful of the revenue that clerks were even put on to count the grains of shot which fell out of a cartridge, so that duty might be imposed upon them, but when a sum as large as £27,000 is at stake he takes no action to recover it. Honorable members on this side of the House are as anxious to protect the public revenue as is the Minister or any other section of the House, and we require an explanation in regard to this matter. As to what has been said about the want of anything to answer in the speeches of members of the Opposition upon the address in reply, I would point out that one reason why the Government have not been strongly attacked is that during the last six months there has been a great outburst of indignation throughout the Commonwealth at their administration, and the public men who have voiced it are not willing to repeat here what they have stated at length outside. But Ministers need not think that because no amendment has been moved upon the address in reply they have no responsibility in regard to the promises made in the Governor-General's speech. In my opinion it would be a wise thing for the leader of the Opposition always to move an amendment upon the address in reply, in order to make Ministers toe the mark, because the discussion on such an amendment directs the attention of honorable members, and focuses public attention upon the lapses of the Ministry during the recess. Ministers are congratulating themselves upon the fact that the public have no substantial grievances against them, but when the next elections are over they will know that the indignation against them is deep-seated in the hearts of the people. The Minister for Trade and Customs claims that he has been doing equal justice to all classes of persons directly affected by the administration of his department; that he has been dealing as fairly by the humblest individual as by the richest merchant. We believe that all classes should be treated upon an equal footing, and we raise our voices only when we find that some are allowed to escape the payment of that which is clearly due from them. It is not when merchants are deservedly attacked that we find fault with the action of the Minister, but if, on the other hand, members of the trading community are subjected to unnecessary irritation and annoyance we are ready to defend them. We affirm that the standard of equal justice for the merchant and all others, which the Minister claims to have raised, is made to fly side by side with the banner of fiscal tyranny. The oversight on the part of the Customs in regard to the collection of the sugar excise duty is not only unfair to the Colonial Sugar Company, but monstrously unjust to the whole of the people of the Commonwealth. The Government have strained themselves in order to make shot contained in cartridges pay duty, but they have allowed the public to swallow 9,000 tons of sugar upon which the excise duty has not been paid. I feel that I should be justified in moving the adjournment of the House in order that this matter may be probed to the bottom. Although the Minister may be exact to a fault in his administration, what right has he to scout the statements of the honorable member for North Sydney with regard to the excise duty on sugar which has been lost to the revenue.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Who scouted the statements of the honorable member for North Sydney?

Mr. WILKS.—The Minister has not denied the statements, and I may remind him that "scouting" is not a matter of words only, but a matter of action.

He has scouted the whole of the statements which have been made, by refusing any explanation, and by declining to take the House into his confidence. The charge against the Customs department involves something far more serious than tyranny or irritation, although the policy of the Minister, which has resulted in the most serious delays, has caused great trouble and loss to merchants. I believe that the morality of merchants and importers is no better and no worse than that of the manufacturers. The merchant who is beset by keen competitors has to take all the advantage he can in carrying on his business, and the manufacturer is in the same position. The Minister evidently regards all men as scoundrels until they prove themselves otherwise. I prefer to regard them as honest until they are found to be the reverse. Prior to taking over the administration of the Customs the Minister had moved in a comparatively small sphere. The experience he gained in Adelaide could scarcely have qualified him to arrive at a complete understanding of the conditions prevailing in such large centres as Melbourne and Sydney, and consequently his course of action has been entirely unsuited to the circumstances. In those cases in which he has punished persons guilty of serious frauds, or taken measures to prevent their recurrence, his administration is worthy of admiration, and personally I can applaud many of his actions. If he had been as careful in regard to the collection of the sugar excise as he has been in punishing merchants for trivial mistakes, surely the £27,000 to which reference has been made would not have been allowed to remain unpaid. Are we to find in the Minister, the straightforward, adamant Minister, another shattered idol? I could have staked my reputation on the ability of the Minister to collect every possible penny of revenue. But now we find that the Commonwealth has lost £27,000 through some neglect on the part of its administration. I do not suppose the Minister for Trade and Customs values my opinion or support, but I hope that for his own sake, and for the benefit of the Commonwealth, he will explain what has become of the sum mentioned. The Governor-General's speech contains a good deal of padding, and refers to a number of measures which the Government cannot expect to pass into law during this session. Some of the remarks contained in the first paragraph of the speech are not only critical but insulting. We are told that—

It was impossible, by reason of the exhaustive discussion of the Federal Tariff, to deal with any but the most urgent of the proposals then brought before you, and renewed demands must now be made on your industry and patriotism before the Commonwealth machinery can be deemed complete.

That statement, read in conjunction with the remarks made by the Prime Minister during the recess, conveys a distinct insult. Perhaps the Minister will tell us that he was misreported, because when any attempt is made to pin him down, that is the excuse behind which he takes refuge.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I never say that I have been misreported when I have been truthfully reported.

Mr. WILKS. — We shall see what the Prime Minister has to say to the press report which represents him as complaining that the obstructive tactics of the Opposition had prevented him from carrying out certain necessary measures. We are informed in the Governor-General's speech that "the exhaustive discussion of the Federal Tariff," renders it necessary to make renewed demands upon honorable members before the Commonwealth machinery can be deemed complete. That is only a quiet and insinuating way of conveying the same complaint as was made by the Prime Minister from the platform. I now propose to subject these statements to the test of comparison. Fifty-eight, or to be exact, 57 and two-eighths sitting days were occupied in the discussion of the Tariff. Machinery measures, such as the Excise and Customs Bills, occupied 75 sitting days. Fifty-eight days were occupied in moulding a Tariff which was to replace six separate Tariffs and six separate systems. As against this the Victorian Parliament occupied over six months in discussing an amended Tariff, which did not involve any radical alteration of the fiscal policy of that State. Moreover, that discussion took place after a Commission had reported upon the whole question. In New South Wales the Dibbs-Jennings Ministry introduced a Tariff, at a time when the Prime Minister was Speaker of the Assembly in that State, and five and a half months were occupied in the discussion of the slight changes proposed. The Prime Minister could scarcely have recalled his own personal experience when he committed himself to the statement that the obstructive tactics of the Opposition had rendered it impossible to deal with any but the most urgent proposals last session. Now, let us consider the measures which are put forward as urgent, and which it was found impossible to pass last session. The most notable of these are the Inter-State Commission Bill, the Judiciary Bill, and the Defence Bill. The Inter-State Commission Bill was introduced in June, 1901, and in November of the same year the debate upon it was adjourned on the motion of a Government supporter. Nothing further was heard of it until the Governor-General's speech was read to us. The Judiciary Bill was read a first time in June, 1901, and the second reading was moved by the Attorney-General in March, 1902. The Attorney-General occupied twelve months in procuring the data necessary for that admirable speech of his, in which he explained the provisions of the measure. After this the Bill was absolutely stifled by the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. WILKS.—The Attorney-General will not deny that I have correctly described what took place, and that after he moved the second reading in March, 1902, nothing further was heard of the Bill. Still we are told that the delay in dealing with these measures was due to the obstructive tactics of the Opposition. The story of the Defence Bill is still more pitiable—if that be possible. It was read a first time in July, 1901, and five or six weeks were occupied, principally by Government supporters, in debating its provisions, after which the Bill was suddenly dropped. It was complained that the measure was badly drafted, and its conscription clauses were strongly objected to. We were afterwards informed through inspired press paragraphs that the conscription clauses were to be dropped. In view of all these facts I contend that the charge which the Government have directed against the Opposition more properly lies at their own door. Although, as I have pointed out, the debate upon the Tariff was not lengthened to an inordinate extent, it might have been very much shortened but for the action of the Minister for Trade and Customs. The right honorable gentleman defended the composite duties even in the last ditch. The Government proposals were defeated again and again, but the Minister refused to take the decisions of the Committee as final, and caused an unnecessary prolongation of the debate by his persistency. Now we find the leader of the labour party expressing the hope that the Prime Minister will keep a much tighter rein over the business of the House than he did last session. The honorable member for Bland has placed his hand upon a weak spot, because the Prime Minister had no control over the House during last session. The Prime Minister, in answer to the leader of the Opposition, declares that the public require fiscal peace. But fiscal peace can be purchased only at the expense of the masses and primary producers of Australia, who have been called upon to bear a heavy burden in the form of taxation of their food supplies and apparel. Such a policy may suit the protectionists, but it does not conform to the ideas which are entertained by the free-traders. The latter cannot agree to call a fiscal truce, but must insist that within a few months the public of Australia shall have an opportunity of showing whether or not they approve of the Tariff which is at present operating. The only way in which this question can be conclusively settled is by making it the test issue at the forthcoming general election. If any attempt be made to obscure the issue by ambiguous Ministerial cries of equal justice to the miner and merchant, it will be impossible to obtain at the ballot-box the real opinion of the electors. However politicians may squirm, I am satisfied that the people of New South Wales will compel the Tariff to be made the issue at the next election, and the protectionists of Victoria, if they are true to their principles, must necessarily adopt a similar course. To my mind, the position is unavoidable. In his memorable Maitland manifesto the Prime Minister declared that he strongly favoured a system of moderate protection, and that his policy would be one which was designed to obtain revenue without involving the destruction of industries. But when the Minister for Trade and Customs submitted the original proposals of the Government, he boldly affirmed upon the floor of this House that he had a protectionist majority at his back, and that he intended, as far as possible, to impart to the Tariff a protective incidence. Will the free-traders be caught napping again? Not likely! In contradistinction to the utterances of the Prime Minister, I would direct attention to the statement made by the Attorney-General when addressing his constituents at Ballarat during the recess. He said—

A basis of a Tariff had been laid, and a further measure of protection would have to be given.

That is a very definite utterance. On the one hand, the Prime Minister cries for fiscal peace, and on the other, the Attorney-General, who has probably the leadership of the Government in reversion, says something of a diametrically opposite character. Is it likely that free-traders can subscribe to a fiscal truce under such circumstances? I would further point out that the Treasurer estimated that a sum of £1,200,000 would be collected under the operation of this Tariff in excess of that formerly derived under the States Tariffs. To-day, however, he finds that the excess represents £1,500,000, notwithstanding the alleged obstructive tactics of the Opposition, both in the House of Representatives and the Senate, which resulted in the remission of taxation aggregating another £1,500,000. I am thoroughly convinced that the electors of Australia would have been pleased indeed to witness much more obstruction of the same character had there been any probability of it proving productive of equally beneficent results. The honorable member for Echuca urges that the fiscal question ought to be laid to rest peacefully, and in so doing he is merely echoing the statements of the protectionist journal of Victoria, the Melbourne Age. Let me inform that honorable member, however,—and my knowledge upon this matter is gleaned neither from free-trade nor protectionist newspapers, but comes as the result of personal observation—that in my own district, which boasts the largest industrial concerns in the Commonwealth—in Balmain, and the district of Dalley generally, there are more iron-workers unemployed to-day than there ever were before. How do these well-established industries—for which the Prime Minister pleaded in the first Governor-General's speech—stand to-day? They employ hundreds of men less now than were engaged in them ten years ago. Under such circumstances will the people allow the fiscal issue to be burked? What is applicable to those industries is equally applicable to industries throughout the Commonwealth. The electors are not going to be chloroformed, however much the Prime Minister may endeavour to chloroform honorable members in that way, by declaring, when it suits his purpose to do so, that he has been misrepresented. As the electors have an opportunity only once in three years of making their will known through the medium of the ballot-box, they will avail themselves of it to the full. There is one matter in connexion with Customs administration to which I desire to refer. When the Tariff was under discussion, the Minister for Trade and Customs was asked by myself and other honorable members to make provision for granting drawback upon paints used upon ships in Australian waters. More recently still, the honorable member for Newcastle directed attention to this matter, which has been under the consideration of the Minister for the past nine months. The right honorable gentleman was invited to make inquiries with a view of ascertaining whether any undue advantage would be conferred upon any particular firm by the adoption of the course suggested. He is still considering the matter, but has been unable to arrive at any decision, notwithstanding the fact that hundreds of men in the districts of Dalley and Newcastle are suffering in consequence. Had he decided to grant drawback upon the paints so used he would have conferred employment upon a class of labour which sadly requires it. Why is it that he cannot give a decision upon the simple matter referred to? With regard to the establishment of the High Court, I have yet to hear an answer given to the speeches delivered by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, both of whom are trained lawyers, and oppose the Bill. They are not aspirants to the High Court Bench, and they deliberately declare that if such a tribunal were created its members would have little to do save to draw their salaries. Their statements have not been contradicted, either by the Prime Minister or the Attorney-General, and the only reasonable inference which can be drawn from that fact is that they are true. It was pointed out by those honorable and learned members that in America when the High Court was established only six constitutional questions were decided by it in twelve years. In the face of such testimony, if the Government desire economical administration, they will postpone the creation of this tribunal. To my mind, all that is necessary for us to do at the present stage is to vest the States courts with the power of original jurisdiction. It has been wisely suggested that the Chief Justices of the States could be constituted a board to deal with disputed constitutional questions. In my judgment, the establishment of the High Court could well be deferred for fourteen years. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, unhesitatingly affirm that its creation at the present stage in our national history is premature.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Does not the honorable member know that in New South Wales the Judges cannot perform all the work that is now required of them?

Mr. WILKS.—I am satisfied that the Parliament of that State has never practised parsimony to such an extent as to decline to sanction the appointment of another Judge if his services were really required. Outside of the United States, and including about fifteen portions of the British dominions, the salaries paid to the Judges do not represent anything like the sum which it is proposed to pay to the occupants of the High Court Bench. A salary of £3,500 is mentioned as the emolument of the Chief Justice, and a sum of £3,000 for each of the Puisne Judges. To my mind, these amounts represent a bill which the Commonwealth cannot afford to pay. Seeing that the United States, with their 80,000,000 of people, pay their Chief Justice only £2,100 a year, surely, in view of the existence of our States courts, we ought not to pay a higher salary to the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth. The admirable speech made by the Attorney-General upon this question last session dealt only with the principles of abstract justice. That in itself is a splendid thing for discussion, but I do not propose to deal with it. I wish to confine my remarks to the expenditure which will be involved in the passage of the proposed Bill. Unless very strong reasons are advanced I am afraid that I cannot see my way to support the measure. I shall not occupy time in discussing the naval subsidy. We are now asked to pay £94,000 per annum more than we previously paid, and all we have to ask is whether the service is worth the extra expenditure. That may not be a poetic way of looking at the matter, but it is certainly a practical way. Sentiment is all very well in time of distress or trouble, but the Empire is not held together by steel hawsers or by the exchange of cannon shot. As the Prime Minister remarked on one memorable occasion, the Empire is held together by silken bonds ; and those silken hawsers show no sign of wear. I can see, of course, that Australia is not in a position to establish a navy of her own, and I do not agree with the honorable member for Bland, who is the leader of the labour party, in his contention that we should confine ourselves to coastal defence. At the present time our coastal defence costs some £57,000 per annum ; and that I regard as too small a sum.

Mr. WATKINS.—Was the vote for coastal defence not cut down ?

Mr. WILKS.—The defence vote was cut down in a most reprehensible manner ; but that is a matter with which I shall deal later. The honorable member for Bland expressed the opinion that forces on land would prove quite sufficient for the defence of the Commonwealth. Of course all these are matters of speculation, and I do not pose as a naval or military expert ; but I cannot find myself in agreement with the honorable member for Bland until a resolution has been carried that in future all naval engagements shall be fought on the Yarra. Until a determination to that effect has been arrived at, Australia must be prepared to take a part in her own defence. Our great difficulty is want of cash, and we are now asked to pay an increased subsidy. The extra £94,000 is not much, but, as I said before, the question is whether the service will be worth the expenditure. Are we prepared to establish a navy of our own ; and, if so, is there a possibility of that establishment being effective within a reasonable time ? The Prime Minister has informed us that the dreadful Braddon section in the Constitution prevents our taking up the duty of defenders of this portion of the Empire, and this means that we must fall back on the motherland. If that be the true position, then all we can do is to pay this extra £94,000. Of course, we might establish a navy like that of some of the South American Republics, and have one modern gunboat ; but I am afraid that the whole of the time of that boat would be engaged in running around Australia in the effort to guard our shores. This question of naval defence reminds one of the scare which was raised years ago in order to frighten Australia into federation. We were then told to be aware of the Chinaman, and subsequently to be aware of the Jap, and warned that our only means of protection was federation ; but, as we know, two years afterwards little Japan conquered great China. My own opinion is that our greatest protection lies, first of all, in our isolation, and, secondly, in open ports. There is not the slightest doubt that open ports would prove far more effective as a means of security than any expenditure on naval defence can be for many years to come. Of course, if the Prime Minister supports a policy of expansion, and assumes responsibilities in the Southern seas, there is no doubt that Australia must share those responsibilities. Great Britain is the mistress of the Southern seas, and it is our duty to assist in maintaining the Empire. There is a naval base in Sydney, and the amount we are asked to contribute to the naval subsidy is a flea-bite compared with the cost to which the motherland is put in maintaining the fleet in Port Jackson. The amount of £94,000 as compared with £35,000,000 expended on Imperial defence is ridiculous ; and that we should be asked to make such a contribution may be taken as more of a compliment than anything else. As to preferential trade, recent occurrences have shown us that it does not do to go too far ahead in the march. The Empire is marching very strongly just now, and during the South African war Australia did her share, as I am sure she would do again under similar circumstances. Mr. Chamberlain has found during the last two or three days that it does not do to get too much in the van. That Minister is a practical statesman, but he has his poetic flights, and the Australian people, while regarding him with great respect, will, like the English people, refuse to dance as puppets at his court. We recognise the work which Mr. Chamberlain has done in the consolidation of the Empire. But, at the same time, it is to be doubted whether the people will take the great jump which that gentleman now invites them to take. I notice that the Prime Minister has put preferential trade in the back part of his programme, although, when he left England and when he arrived here, that question received great attention at his hands at public meetings and in newspaper interviews. Mr. Chamberlain has found that the people of Great Britain are not prepared to pay any extra tax on their food supplies ; and certainly the masses of Australia are by no means willing to carry any further burdens. The Australian people, in cases of necessity, will carry their share of the load ; but they refuse to take a step of the kind now apparently contemplated, simply to be the toy of a statesman, however high the position he occupies. To me it appears that Mr. Chamberlain has held out preferential trade as a bogey to foreign nations ; at any rate, it is difficult to ascertain whether he really intends or wishes such a scheme to be carried into effect, or whether he merely threw out the suggestion as a feeler. In any case, over 100 conservative members of the Imperial Parliament, who are supporters of Mr. Chamberlain, are not taking the high responsibility usually assumed by them, but are acting, as Australian Members of Parliament would act in reference to smaller matters, and are carefully feeling the pulse of the electorates. All this tends to show that Mr. Chamberlain has gone too far ahead of the regiment. We are now marching in time to Imperial music. The Empire is not held together by mere conservative sentiments, but rather by a statesmanlike recognition of the characteristics of our own race. Personally, I do not suppose that we shall hear any more of preferential trade, which is a mere device of the protectionists. Free-traders know that an open port cultivates no desire of invasion amongst foreign powers ; although that may well be the result of the erection of Tariff walls. The settlement of the federal capital site depends on the Government. The Prime Minister says that he is tired of a local and commercial atmosphere, and desires a federal atmosphere ; and if that be the feeling, I trust that the compact with New South Wales will be observed this session. Certainly, if the Government are in earnest that compact will be carried out, but if they are not in earnest, nothing that the Opposition can do will tend to an immediate settlement of the question. I am glad to see that the Prime Minister gives this matter a foremost place in the speech of His Excellency, and I trust that it may find a foremost place in legislation. In the matter of the Defence Bill, I see that some of the obnoxious provisions which were before us last year are being dropped. What blame there is in reference to this measure lies at the door of the Government, who, in the treatment of the Defence Estimates by the House, received a rebuff of which even the Prime Minister must feel ashamed. On two occasions were the Defence Estimates taken out of the hands of responsible Ministers and mutilated at the sweet will of honorable members. This is a department of great influence and importance, and yet the Estimates were thrown on to the table without explanation or defence. If the Minister had said that after close inquiry and careful consideration they were of opinion that the Estimates should be passed as submitted, there is not much doubt that the House would have voted accordingly.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The Government did take up that position on the second occasion, but still they accepted the adverse vote.

Mr. WILKS.—On two occasions Estimates were thrown on the table without explanation or defence. Some one then suggested that £130,000 had better be knocked off, and this was agreed to, the Minister merely saying "Not a bad idea." If the Estimates were overloaded in the first instance the Government ought to be ashamed, and if they were not overloaded they ought to have been defended. As a fact, however, there was an absolute surrender of the principles of responsible government, and that is one of the charges made by the Opposition. From the very first the Government have shown a tendency to allow others to take control of business, and to absolutely surrender all the principles of responsible government. We have already had the Defence department worked on the butt-gang principle, one year by the Minister for Defence, and the second year by the Minister for Home Affairs.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was the House which decided on the reduction of the Estimates.

Mr. WILKS.—But the Minister for Defence did not defend his Estimates. If there be any Estimates on which a Government should stake its existence they are the Defence Estimates, which deal with most important items of expenditure. Personally, I thought the Estimates too large, seeing we had been told that under federation certain economies would be achieved, notably in military administration. When the Minister for Home Affairs was in charge of the Defence Estimates a reduction of, I believe, £65,000 was effected, and yet there has been no economy in the quarters where it is most needed. The rank and file have suffered, and with them the efficiency of the defence forces throughout the Commonwealth. About £200,000 was saved on the Defence Estimates, but that was not on the initiative of the Ministry, and was due to the obstructive tactics of the Opposition, assisted by the labour members. At present we find that the forces are suffering from the want of a strong controlling power, although it was hoped that, at any rate, the Defence department would not be worse administered than under the State Governments. It is to be hoped that the Government will in the future control the business of the House and rise to the demands of responsible government. I hope that Ministers will defend the Estimates when they are laid on the table, and will not allow reductions of any kind.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I cannot promise that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Notice should be given of an awkward question like that.

Mr. WILKS.—I do not regard it as an awkward question, and I ask the Minister for Defence, who is noted for his candour, to give a reply now. Will he defend the Estimates when he lays them on the table, so that we may know whether or not we have real responsible government? I do not know what has been the experience of Victorian Members of Parliament, but in New South Wales a Ministry that would treat a department in such a cavalier manner as that in which this department has been treated would have been thrown out of office. I do not know, either, how honorable members from other States have fared at the opening of a Parliament. While I am not very fond of ceremonials, at the same time I believe in a due recognition of the powers of the two Houses of Parliament. I was very much annoyed, sir, to see the position which you had to take the other day in the Senate chamber. In New South Wales the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly occupies a seat at the foot of the throne, and he asks for a copy of the Governor's speech. That is not so in the case of the Commonwealth Parliament. You, sir, the custodian of our rights and privileges, were practically compelled to stand in a gangway in the other chamber. I cannot understand, sir, how, when no Legislative Council of a State would dare to take up a similar position, the Senate of this Commonwealth, elected, like ourselves, on a popular basis, had the audacity to place you in that improper position. In South Australia, if my memory serves me correctly, there was once a Speaker whom they tried to insult in a similar manner, and who demanded, not out of regard for his personal aggrandizement, but on behalf of the House which he represented, his admission into the body of the chamber of the Legislative Council, and the presentation of a copy of the opening speech by the Governor in an official manner. On the contrary, sir, you had to receive a copy of the Governor-General's speech from the hands of an official. Not only were you in your official position placed in a very ignoble position, but the members of this House were similarly treated. I am sorry that the Prime Minister did not draw attention to the incident, and resent the position in which you were placed upon that occasion. The difficulty in the way of accommodating members of this House in the Senate chamber could have been easily overcome. In New South Wales the table is removed from the Legislative Council chamber, and the members of the popular House are accommodated with seats in the body of that chamber. The only thing I care about is the opportunity to offer a few remarks upon the opening speech. Whether it is heard by me in the other Chamber or not is a matter of indifference to me, and I believe to most honorable members. As a rule they do not care about ceremonials, but they dislike any ceremonial which strikes at the root of the powers and privileges of the House to which they belong. I believe—whether it was intentional or not I do not know—that an insult was offered to this House, and I trust that it will not be repeated. In this building an admirable arrangement could be made. The Queen's Hall could be used as a neutral ground, where neither the Speaker nor the President would be placed in an invidious position, and where the members of each House could come from their chamber and hear the delivery of the opening speech. The slightest consideration would have overcome the difficulty which was experienced in accommodating the members of this House. I believe that upon one occasion in South Australia—I cannot recall the date of the incident—the Speaker of the House of Assembly made a very strong protest against a similar insult which was offered to him in his official capacity. I do not suggest that in this instance the insult was offered intentionally to you, sir, who no doubt can remember the incident to which I have just referred. In New South Wales, when the Prime Minister held the high position of Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, he always sat in the body of the Legislative Council chamber, near the foot of the throne, and received from the Governor an official copy of his speech. What can be done in the case of a State Parliament to uphold the rights of the popular House must be done in the case of the Commonwealth Parliament. The insult is not offered to a party in this House, but to honorable members generally. It is an attempt to introduce the thin end of the wedge; and if you, sir, permit this treatment to be repeated, your privileges may gradually be taken away from you. The opening speech contains a reference to a Navigation and Shipping Bill. I know that there is no chance of the measure being brought in this session, but it is certainly one which is very much required in the Commonwealth. Probably it has been framed on the lines of the Merchant Shipping Act, which is, I suppose, the finest Act in the British dominions. Whether it will conflict with that Act or not I do not know, but still it is one which will have to receive the greatest attention in the House. I can understand the wisdom of postponing its consideration until next session. The measure is almost large enough to occupy the attention of the House for one session. The Merchant Shipping Act contains provisions which, if not altered by federal legislation, will operate very injuriously in one State. In Victoria a vessel which is registered locally can run for twelve months with an exemption certificate, but in New South Wales a locally-registered vessel is allowed to run only six months.

Mr. MAUGER.—Quite long enough.

Mr. WILKS.—It may be quite long enough, but let the legislation be made uniform. That is one reason from the commercial side of the question. Now, from the trade side, I will advance a reason why the Bill should be passed early. I regret that it was not introduced last session, and apparently we shall not be able to deal with it during the present session. I would point out to the Prime Minister how the differential system of exemptions operates. Most vessels register in Port Melbourne, and the result of such registration is that a ship has to undergo an overhaul only every twelve months, while in New South Wales a locally-registered ship has to be overhauled every six months. The work is drifting from Sydney to Melbourne. We hear talk about an Inter-State Commission being required to prevent the destruction of the intent of free-trade. This differentiation of exemptions is destroying the intent of free-trade. Until we get a uniform Navigation and Shipping Act, this and many other matters cannot be rectified. I hope that the few measures which the Government intend to introduce will be conducted through the House with that sense of responsibility which so far has been absent from their procedure. I trust that the Government will stand by their measures. I do not wish to rake up old sores, but another instance of the absence of responsible government was witnessed when a sum of money was required to be voted to the late Governor-General. The Government allowed their measure to be mutilated. I believe it approached very near the confines of being out of order. It was my opinion at the time that the scope of the measure had exceeded the order of leave, but the matter was not canvassed by any honorable member. A Ministerial supporter took absolute control of this important measure, and the Government allowed it to be mutilated and destroyed, affording a terrible evidence of their weakness. Still they tell us, both on public platforms and in this House, that they are prepared to go to the country on the measures which they have carried, and acquaint us with their intention to carry the measures which the Opposition opposed. There has at no time been any obstruction by the Opposition. Except in regard to fiscalism, where there was bound to be a difference of opinion, every effort of the Opposition has been in the direction of improving the measures thrown at the House, and if any House ever proceeded to its work with patriotism and energy this House did so last session. On all sides honorable members gave their support to the Government as far as they were able to do so, and did not act in a factious manner. No advantage was taken of the absence of the Prime Minister in England. But even if in his absence matters relating to the Empire had been introduced, the Opposition would have been found quite loyal to their position, not willing to obstruct or to offer factious opposition, while quite prepared at all times to fight to the death for the principles by which they stand. I take it that the cry of fiscal peace will not answer for either free-traders or protectionists. Not only has the Attorney-General denied the Prime Minister, but the Minister for Home Affairs has denied the Prime Minister within the last two months in his own constituency. He told his constituents that the Tariff is not one with which he is satisfied; that it will not suit a protectionist. If it will not suit a protectionist, why does he not fight to get one which will do so?

MR. MAUGER.—Because he will choose his own time.

MR. WILKS.—There is the answer to my question. We are to be blindfolded on this side, and led like bullocks to the shambles, merely to suit their time. It is not a question of suiting the time of the Government or the time of the Opposition. It is a question of suiting the convenience of the people. Now the people who are paying taxes on food supplies, wearing apparel, and other items of that character which they had never to pay before, will fix the time, and that will be at the next election, the first opportunity which they will have had to record their votes. I am satisfied that the Prime Minister will find then that although—to my regret—the address in reply has been allowed to go without an amendment being moved—

MR. MAUGER.—Move an amendment now.

MR. WILKS.—I shall not move an amendment. My honorable friend might have to support the amendment if I did, and that would be a very awkward position for him to be placed in; it might bring about a free-trade-protectionist Administration, which we are not going to have. The focussing of public attention is not what my honorable friend requires at the present time. But what we do require, and what the Opposition are determined to secure, is that the mind of the people shall be focussed at the right time. The Prime Minister thinks that when the people have become accustomed to the Tariff they will not be so keen to show their resentment or indignation as they would have been six months previously. He may also be trusting to the revival of good seasons.

I do not wish to be too suspicious, but I should like to know how it is that the discrepancy between the census returns and the electoral rolls in New South Wales has only been discovered since the electoral districts have been plotted out? I am not referring to the protectionist seats. The distribution of the seats should be quite above party warfare. It is always prudent for a Minister to give any instructions in writing. If the Minister for Home Affairs gave any instruction to the commissioner in charge of the redistribution of electoral seats in New South Wales it should have been given in writing, and I hope that there has been no personal interview with the officer. It does seem remarkable—and I trust an explanation will be made during this debate—that the commissioner and the officers in the electoral department did not discover this discrepancy until the State had been plotted out into districts. After that work was completed they suddenly discovered that there is a discrepancy of 80,000 persons, which may require further attention on their part. I wish to know whether that further attention means an alteration of the divisions, or a prolongation of the session, or an adjournment until the time comes for the general elections to be held. If the date of the general election is not affected by the discovery of that discrepancy all the trouble is over. The Prime Minister can easily say whether he will allow that discrepancy to penalize the people of New South Wales, or whether he will punish those who are responsible for its existence. Either the Minister for Home Affairs or his officers are responsible. It must have occurred either through the fault of the commissioner and his officers, or through the fault of the Minister, because the census returns and the electoral rolls, were placed in their hands before the plotting out was begun. I should like some explanation of this matter to be made. I trust that all honorable members are satisfied with the redistribution. We do not care to lose a portion of our constituency, just as no one cares to lose an old friend. I suppose that every honorable member will say that he is quite satisfied with the redistribution of the seats, but that is not the point at issue. It is not the politicians, but the people, who have to be considered. The redistribution of the seats should be beyond the influence of the politician. After the work is completed a discrepancy of 80,000 persons is found.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member expect a tory Ministry like this to consider the people?

Mr. WILKS.—In this matter the public should be considered by the Ministry whether it is tory, radical, or liberal. Nothing should be purer than the preparation of the electoral rolls; the administration of the electoral laws should be beyond the influence of any party and any Government. I think it is always wise for a Minister to instruct an officer in writing. When the Prime Minister rose the other night he said he had to reply to the leader of the Opposition, but that he did not know what he had to reply to. He will find that there are many grievances felt by the Opposition, and not the least of them are the absence of control of the business of the House, and the surrender of responsible government.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—In rising to take part in this debate it is not my intention to weary the House with a lengthy address. I feel that the charge which has been made, that this discussion is to a large extent a waste of time, is not without some foundation in fact. Of course, the case would be entirely different if the leader of the Opposition had tabled an adverse amendment, but he has done nothing of the kind; on the contrary, he has disclaimed any hostile intention, and in the absence of the fighting spirit the debate has not been characterized by that animation and those personalities which tend to make political speeches, if not always specially edifying, certainly very interesting. The members of the Ministry must feel most kindly disposed towards the leader of the Opposition for his present attitude in relation to them. He has little to say in condemnation of their doings in the past—in fact, he has not been so outspoken in his criticism as some of their own supporters; and as to the chief proposals in the address of the Governor-General he is either silent or expresses agreement. Of course, the leader of the Opposition stands where he always has stood in relation to the Tariff, and although he does not approve of the administration of the Customs department, he says he entertains the highest opinion as to the ability of the Minister for Trade and Customs, and is quite sure he has been actuated by the best motives. As coming from the leader of the Opposition, the Minister must warmly appreciate such sentiments; while I, as a Ministerial supporter, cannot do very much more than indorse the generous sentiments of the right honorable gentleman. No one who knows the Minister for Trade and Customs will say that he is the embodiment of amiability, but those who know him best will unhesitatingly assert that as a public man he has set before himself high ideals, and that when he believes he has discovered the line of duty he follows it at all hazards, with absolute integrity and without the least respect for persons. He knows nothing about the line of least resistance, which, to the politician, is so often the path of peace and of popularity. I regret that the Minister has not more of the diplomacy and grace of manner of the Attorney-General, who has the faculty of being able to say and even do unpleasant things in such a way that they produce little irritation. But we must take the Minister for Trade and Customs as we find him, and I am satisfied that when the soreness which exists in certain quarters—soreness, I am afraid, not always without justification—passes away, the conviction will prevail throughout the Commonwealth that the Prime Minister did the right thing when he placed in Mr. Kingston's hands the portfolio for Trade and Customs. Speaking in this Chamber last session, the honorable member for Wentworth said it was absolutely essential that the atmosphere in the Customs departments throughout the States should be rendered wholesome, and that position and wealth should not exercise undue influence. I think I may say that the wishes of the honorable member in these particulars have been realized. If the Minister's methods have been rough, they have been very effective, and if the honest merchant has felt at times more than a little hurt at what has seemed to him harsh treatment, it must not be forgotten that the dishonest trader has been making substantial contributions to the revenue which in the past he seems to have often been successful in evading.

Mr. CONROY.—Then all previous Ministers for Trade and Customs have been dishonest?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Certainly not. But I think the general feeling throughout Australia is in accord with the opinion I am expressing.

Mr. THOMSON.—What are the cases in which large contributions have been obtained from dishonest traders?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—It is quite impossible to give specific cases, but the opinion I have expressed is prevalent throughout Australia, and I think there is a general admission on the point, so far as merchants are concerned.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—In most cases the amount involved has been under £2.

Mr. MAUGER.—But those small cases involved in the aggregate a large sum.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—There will be general agreement that the man who would at the present time, and with the present administration, attempt to cheat the Customs department, would be a very courageous individual.

Mr. THOMSON.—No doubt it is going on every day.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The same results, perhaps, might have been achieved by gentler methods. I am not at all sure as to that—but this we know, that the drastic methods adopted by the Minister for Trade and Customs have been entirely successful. This fact will not be forgotten, and on account of it much will be forgiven if forgiveness be needed. The leader of the Opposition, in dealing with the Tariff, referred to the removal of the duty on tea. I have no intention of going into that matter. I refer to it only to say that I supported the duty, and that I regret it was not passed for a special reason. I am not at all sure, in spite of tea being on the free list, that a considerable part of the £300,000 which the duty represented has not been drawn from the pockets of the consumers. I think it would really have been wiser if the whole sum had been collected for the benefit of the Commonwealth. As to the Tariff itself, I think it will be a mistake if the leader of the Opposition raises the fiscal issue at the approaching elections. The people have had enough of the Tariff for some time to come. I see the position in which the right honorable member finds himself, but there are many who believe that he will be studying his own interests and the interests of Australia by leaving things as they are for the present. I must frankly confess that in regard to the High Court Bill I have been a waverer. I have felt a good deal of sympathy with the views expressed by my honorable and learned colleague from South Australia, Mr. Glynn, but before this session opened I had made up my mind to support the establishment of an independent tribunal. Possibly if I had not done so I might have been carried away by the enthusiasm and eloquence of my friend, the honorable member for Gippsland. I agree with him, however, that to spend something like £30,000 on a High Court seems an appalling expenditure.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unless equal economies can be shown in consequence of the creation of the High Court.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Would it be possible to do so?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; I propose to do so.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Although I shall support the Government in this matter, it is my intention to reduce as far as possible the expenditure that will be involved in the establishment of the court. I suppose there can be no doubt that an independent tribunal is necessary, and that reasonable expenditure can be justified. The Government say so, and their opinion is backed up by that of the leader of the Opposition, who states that without the High Court the Commonwealth is without a Constitution at all. It must be admitted that with no High Court the Constitution is not complete. I agree with the leader of the Opposition that the selection of the Federal Court Judges will test the ability and patriotism of Ministers, but I believe they will rise to the occasion and appoint men who will do them credit and be an honour to Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—They rose to the occasion when they selected their own friends for billets.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—There is further heavy expense connected with the Inter-State Commission. If the work with which this Inter-State Commission is intended to deal can be done without the costly appointments contemplated by the Bill, and there are those who say such is the fact, economy should unquestionably be studied. But the work must be done. There is an undoubted tendency by means of fresh establishments to pile up expenditure, and if we are not very careful federation will become extremely unpopular as the result of the extra taxation which it must necessitate. Having said this much, it is only fair to add that the right honorable member for Bulacava is a Treasurer who has been no party to extravagance. It would be gross extravagance for this Parliament to allow two independent elections to take place within the next twelve months—one for the Senate, and the other for the House of Representatives. These elections must be held simultaneously, even if that course means shortening the term of this House by several months, and I am sure honorable members generally will approve of that arrangement. In the Governor-General's speech allusion is made to the projected railway across Australia from west to east. No doubt some day such a line will exist, and there will also be a railway crossing the continent from north to south. The people of South Australia are most concerned about the latter, and I really believe that it is the more important railway to the Commonwealth as a whole. It is my opinion that the mails from England will never be landed at Perth and carried east by rail. Long before anything of that kind is possible the mails will reach Australia by way of Europe and Asia, and will come overland from Port Darwin. Already the British Government are making inquiries as to whether the mails for India cannot be sent out by rail. It is well that information should be gathered with respect to the cost and prospects of the railway in which the people of Western Australia are so keenly interested, but I am disposed to think they will have to wait awhile for the realization of their hopes.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Because of the great expense.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why did not honorable members for South Australia speak of the matter when federation was being discussed?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The people of Western Australia will have to wait some time for the realization of their wishes, not only because of the expense which the construction of the line would involve, but because I believe a railway running across Australia from north to south will be considered to be much more in the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Surely the honorable member would not break faith with the people of Western Australia?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What faith is that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The pledged faith of South Australia.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—There is one omission from the speech of the Governor-General which will be regretted by all South Australians. They would like to have seen a reference to the river question, and a reference which would have been favorable to their State. The case for South Australia was well and temperately put by the honorable and learned member, Mr. Glynn, who has been for years an authority on the subject. Does some one ask what the present position is? It can be stated in a few words. The recent Royal commission recommended an apportionment of the waters which would leave South Australia a discharge inadequate for navigation, and much less than the flow the State has hitherto enjoyed. The Premiers' Conference suggested that South Australia's apportioned discharge, or share, should be increased in the months from July to January from 170,000 cubic feet per minute to a navigable depth at Morgan, and in the months from February to June from 70,000 cubic feet per minute to 150,000 cubic feet per minute. The allowance would in the months from February to June still be considerably under the average natural flow, and below the navigable depth. If South Australia is to agree to such an apportionment the River Murray must be locked to make the diminishing flow effective. This work is recommended as a federal undertaking by the late commission so far as the stretch from Blanchetown to Wentworth is concerned. Without the locking of the river South Australia gives up with no compensation a portion of the natural discharge that helps to keep the Murray navigable to Wentworth for nine months of the year.

Mr. FOWLER.—What will be about the expense of that scheme; and how will the honorable gentleman justify it?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The scheme would be justified because it would be of advantage to the whole of Australia.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The expense would be borne only by the States concerned.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I was going to say that the position taken up by South Australia is, in my opinion, a reasonable one. She is only asking for justice, and I am sure honorable members of this House are quite as anxious as are her own representatives that her fair claims should not be ignored. I now come to a matter which has received consideration and aroused interest in Great Britain as well as in Australia. I refer to the obligation of the Commonwealth in regard to the defence of the Empire. I say at once I admit the obligation, but that admission does not necessarily carry with it agreement with some of our English critics as to the form in which the obligation should express itself. I am in favor of the creation of an Australian navy, manned by Australians, trained to naval defence in our own waters. To make an adequate beginning, I do not believe the expense would be nearly as much as represented, but I am forced to concede that little or nothing can be done in this direction at the present moment by reason of the financial circumstances of the Commonwealth. This does not mean the abandonment of the idea. It only means delay in giving effect to it. In the meantime I am prepared to support the Government in their action in regard to the increased subsidy, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that there is an element of danger connected with this subsidy. If it be continued it will without doubt be increased, and if constantly increased it may at any time become the cause of friction between the motherland and the Commonwealth. It should not be forgotten that if Australia ceased to exist England would not be able to reduce her fleet by a single ship. I am familiar with the arguments by which the fallacy of the position I am taking up is supposed to be proved to demonstration. We are told that the Empire is one, and that therefore her fleet should be one; that Australia's safety in time of war would depend not on the ability of the Commonwealth to defend itself, but on the supremacy of the British Navy. Lord Selborne put the position thus :—

There is no possibility of the localization of naval force, and the problem of the British Empire is in no sense one of local defence. The sea is all one, and the British Navy must therefore be all one; and its solitary task in war must be to seek out the ships of the enemy wherever they are to be found and destroy them.

The London Times indorsed this view, and expressed the opinion that the Australian notion as to the kind of danger to which Australia is peculiarly liable is all an illusion: in fact, that it is unthinkable that any hostile cruisers would descend upon our shipping or our ports unless the fleet from which they were detached had first defeated the British Navy and obtained command of the sea. That I am afraid is mere assumption. Memory tells us that when some years ago there was the possibility of trouble between Great Britain and Russia the latter country made provision for attacking Australia, and that a Russian war vessel was actually fitted out with appliances for picking up and cutting the Port Darwin cable, and so destroying the connexion between this continent and England.

Mr. CONROY. — What monetary gain would be secured by cutting the cable?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON. — No doubt if the mother country were engaged in war, and succeeded in defeating the enemy, the latter would have to make full reparation, supposing an attack had been made on Australia, but that would be poor satisfaction to Adelaide or Sydney if serious mischief had been done to either capital. A foe in its work of destruction risks the consequences which are inevitable in the event of defeat. To make provision to defend our ports and the floating trade in Australian waters is to follow the dictates of common sense. For the defence of England exclusive reliance is not placed on the services of the general navy. She has the Reserve Squadron and the port guardships, and at the present time further provision in the way of local defence is being made. Under all the circumstances, surely the attitude of Australia is very much what might be expected. If the Commonwealth possessed war vessels, it does not follow that they would always be retained in these waters. Australia may be relied on to come to England's assistance in a case of need. That would be the spontaneous act of a loyal people, and a repetition of what occurred in 1900, when, with no obligation, the vessels belonging to the Australian Squadron were released for service in Chinese waters, where they were joined by the gunboat Protector from South Australia. The mother country will gain more by trusting to the loyalty of Australians than by endeavouring to secure rights under any agreement which may not commend itself to the majority of the people in the Commonwealth. There is another matter having reference to the Empire with regard to which I wish to say a few words. But, before doing so, I would like to remark that I think the Prime Minister is entitled to the thanks of the people of the Commonwealth for the manner in which he represented Australia in England last year. He had intrusted to him a difficult task, which he carried out with dignity and distinguished ability. He delivered many eloquent addresses, but he was careful to make it quite clear that he had no power to bind the Commonwealth, and he was skilful enough not to let this most necessary declaration detract too much from the importance attaching to his speeches. I suppose I shall do no harm if I quote from a private letter written by a well-known Australian now resident in London—

MR. CONROY.—I hope it is nobody who is expecting the office of High Commissioner.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—No; the honorable and learned member is quite right upon that point. The writer says that Sir Edmund Barton towered above the other colonial representatives present at the Coronation. A scholar and a gentleman, he proved himself an ambassador of whom Australia might well be proud. And in this connexion I would like to pay a tribute to the eloquence and excellence of the closing portion of the address, delivered in this House last week, by the leader of the Opposition. I did not agree with all he said, but with much of it I agreed most cordially, and his entire reference to the Empire I thought fully worthy of the position which the right honorable gentleman occupies in this Parliament, and worthy, too, of a broad-minded man, capable of looking at matters not from the restricted stand-point of one State, or even of the Commonwealth, but as a citizen of a great Empire. I think the right honorable and learned member for East Sydney was quite right in speaking of Mr. Chamberlain as one of the foremost statesmen in England. His past, and especially his immediate past, puts the matter beyond question. Then why need the right honorable gentleman have any fear as to possible want of full consideration of the effects which a policy of preferential duties within the Empire would have on Great Britain. The idea is not a new one as far as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned. It has been in his mind for years. Possibly at one time the policy included free-trade within the Empire, as Mr. Balfour evidently still thinks it should do; but that is clearly out of the question. Any scheme of the kind must be based on the Tariffs of the various colonies. Personally, I am strongly in favour of preferential duties. Australia has nothing to fear. There are decided objections to the one-sided arrangement which now exists with Canada. But there is every reason why we should give the mother country special consideration in return for special consideration shown to us. As to the possibility of retaliation on the part of foreign countries, it should be remembered that our exports for the most part consist of food products, and raw materials needed for manufacturing purposes, and foreign countries will think twice before putting heavy taxes on imports which will mean handicapping their own manufacturers in the markets of the world. Against the injury which conceivably might be inflicted on colonial trade must be set the enormous advantage of a preferential market in Great Britain. Of the wool imported at the present time 64 per cent. is sent from Australia and New Zealand. The rest comes from Argentina, Austria, Saxony, Russia, and other countries. With a slight Tariff advantage the whole of the wool received in Great Britain could be drawn from within the Empire. The aim of Mr. Chamberlain, to use his own words, is to create a self-contained and self-sufficing Empire, and I think it is the duty of this Parliament to help in the realization of so splendid an object.

MR. CONROY (Werriwa).—In reviewing the conduct of Ministers, I think we are bound to consider their actions, not only since they came before us last Parliament, but from the time the Ministry was formed, and I therefore desire to remind honorable members what happened upon the formation of the Ministry. Ministers took office on the 1st January, 1901, but they did not meet Parliament until the following May. Now, we have heard from the Prime Minister a great many noble statements. He has gone so far as to say that he is a man to be trusted. A great many people throughout Australia accepted his declaration that he was an honorable man, whose word could be taken, and trusted him accordingly. But what was the result? We all know what he said in regard to the Tariff, and the statements he made when in New South Wales. If, in private life, a man is jockeyed or swindled out of, say 20s., by false statements or misrepresentations, he has a remedy in the police court. But the thousands of voters who were misled by the false statements and misrepresentations of the Prime Minister have no remedy whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member must withdraw the words "false statements and misrepresentations."

Mr. CONROY.—If you rule them to be unparliamentary, I do so, though outside I have not hesitated to use the word "swindle" in connexion with the right honorable member's actions. To my own knowledge, hundreds of electors—and, no doubt, other honorable members know many other cases of the kind—were misled by the utterances of the Prime Minister.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Was the honorable and learned member misled?

Mr. CONROY.—I had been misled on former occasions, but on the occasion to which I am alluding I profited by my previous experience, and was not misled. One would have thought that the Prime Minister, in his desire to set himself right with the people of Australia, and to win a name for statesmanship, or at least to earn a reputation for being a man of his word, would have tried to keep as closely as possible to his promises. But what do we find? The chairman of his committee, who listened to his Maitland speech, said, after the introduction of the Tariff, that that measure had been introduced in defiance of the Prime Minister's promise, and that he considered that the right honorable gentleman had misled him, and that he was induced to support him by promises which had not been kept. Then three representatives of Victoria repeated practically the same charge. They were men who could form an impartial judgment, and whose only interest was to serve the truth. The right honorable gentleman has by his action made the words of politicians of no account in the ears of the people of Australia. I hold that the word of a Prime Minister should be sacred; that he should set a high standard of public morality, and as far as possible keep his word. It is no defence of his action for him to try to place an entirely different meaning upon his statements from that which was naturally placed upon them by those who heard and read them. At the present time, however, almost the whole of the electors are agreed that the Prime Minister did not put the issue before them properly, and that they were deliberately misled in regard to the probable nature of the Tariff.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not say "deliberately misled."

Mr. CONROY.—I withdraw the word "deliberately" as unparliamentary, although I have not hesitated to use it outside. This man not only made statements and representations which outside would be characterized only in one way, but he went further. Directly he became Prime Minister and two great offices in the public service of the Commonwealth were created, he looked upon them, not as places to be filled by the best men obtainable, but as billets to reward his political friends, and he deliberately made use of his position to appoint two of his friends to them.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I wish to draw the attention of the honorable and learned member to Standing Order 272, which says that—

No member shall use offensive words against either House of Parliament or any member thereof and all imputations of improper motives and all personal reflections on members shall be considered highly disorderly.

The honorable and learned member has imputed a motive which is decidedly improper, and therefore, in the words of the standing order, his action is "highly disorderly." I ask him to withdraw his statement, and not to repeat it.

Mr. CONROY.—Of course, I bow to your ruling, sir; but am I to understand that statements of fact are disallowed?

Mr. SPEAKER.—There must be no imputation of improper motives.

Mr. CONROY.—Then I will say that with the most honest motives, with the strongest desire for the good of the country, the Prime Minister appointed two of his friends to these offices. Furthermore, he made the salaries attaching to the positions so low—£800 a year—that he was able to inform Parliament that no applications for them had been received from men holding similar positions in the public services of the States—because men in such positions were receiving a larger remuneration. What a noble effort that was on his part to save the Commonwealth expense. But he did not stop at that. In one case, this man, who has such a keen desire to save the public revenue, did not resent the setting aside of his authority, and accepted what a good many people would regard as a snub, so that he might remain in office a little longer. Let us see what occurred in regard to the appointments made by the Government, and what control Ministers had over the House. Times out of number the appointments which the Prime Minister suggested were set aside, and there was an entire abnegation of his parliamentary responsibility. But if we are to have such a thing as sound government, there must be Ministerial responsibility—a political principle which has been set at naught by the Prime Minister and his colleagues. We know what happened when the Governor-General's Allowance Bill was before the House. We know how the provisions of that measure were amended, and its original purpose quite changed. Whether that purpose was a good or a bad one is foreign to this discussion, but we know that the Government made certain pledges to the Governor-General, which they delayed for sixteen or seventeen months to bring before the House. Of course such an unworthy motive as fear is not to be ascribed to them in connexion with this delay. No unworthy motives are to be ascribed to them; they acted from the most honorable motives. The Prime Minister had nothing to gain by denying the existence of an agreement with the late Governor-General, though, no doubt he will be able, if taxed with it, to say that he was misreported. But was it right for this House to allow a Minister to continue in office after such an abnegation of responsibility? Until the day arrives when it is considered an abnegation of responsibility for a Minister to act in the way described, there can be no sound government in Australia. The Prime Minister has gone so far as to condemn honorable members for speaking in opposition to measures brought forward by him, and has then turned round and stated that the measures, as amended, were creations of his opponents, who were responsible for all their faults. This course of conduct is bringing our representative institutions into disrepute, and our whole system of administration must be entirely changed before they can be rehabilitated. When we find that a Minister's word is not regarded as sacred, even by Parliament itself, the position is very serious. We know that a number of persons, including the chairman of his election committee, entertained the view that the Prime Minister had departed from the promises made at Maitland during his electoral campaign, and we have had instances in this House in which honorable members have declined to take the word of the right honorable gentleman. When the Defence Estimates were under consideration the committee declined to accept the promise of the Minister that the Estimates should be reduced by £131,000, and insisted upon a division. Honorable members will find the circumstances set out in Hansard, page 12212. By their action on that occasion honorable members showed that they did not place any reliance upon the utterances of the Minister. I was glad to see a spark of courage induce the Prime Minister to resent the insinuation of his want of truthfulness by indignantly asking—"Is not my word to be taken in a matter like this?" but the burst of laughter with which his question was greeted made the right honorable gentleman fall back into his former position. Probably a mental review of what he had said and done in the past brought confusion to his mind. I felt almost sorry for the Prime Minister in the humiliation to which he was subjected on that occasion, because it must have been deeply humiliating for any Minister not to have his word accepted, even by those sitting behind him in the House. What was the duty of a Minister who thought he was being treated unjustly and improperly in such a case? Why, to resign from the House which had shown so little faith in him. When honorable members found that the interests of special individuals or classes were receiving more consideration than were the interests of the community at the hands of the Prime Minister they were not disposed to accept any assurance from him. The action of the right honorable gentleman on that occasion must have come as a surprise to those who had known him many years before, but it caused no astonishment in the minds of those who had carefully watched his conduct for the past two or three years. One incident during the course of the Tariff debate filled me with shame. When the duty on broom millet was being discussed it was urged that as broom millet was largely used as raw material in connexion with industrial operations carried on in blind institutions, it should be admitted free of duty, but as against this we had presented to us a letter from a constituent of the Prime Minister stating that he intended to grow broom millet, and that therefore it was desirable to impose a duty. No doubt the duty on millet might secure a vote for the Prime Minister, but was it worthy of the right honorable gentleman to allow it even to be suggested that simply because one of his constituents desired to have a duty imposed, the interests of the blind broom makers should be ignored? The Prime Minister has asserted that it was owing to the action of the Opposition that the tea duty was defeated. We cannot, however, help being struck by the fact that the tea duty was rejected by a majority of only two, and that only 66 honorable members out of 75 cast their votes. Exclusive of Mr. Speaker, who has never voted, and of the Chairman of Committees, who, except on one occasion, has not given any other than his casting vote, seven votes were unaccounted for. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the Government regarded the tea duty as of the utmost importance to some of the States which were badly in need of revenue, it was reasonable to expect that the tea duty would be recommitted. No such action was, however, taken, while, strange to say, a recommitment was insisted on in the case of salt, although the original division accounted for every vote except one on the Opposition side. During the debates which took place upon the salt duty, one of the directors of the Castle Hill Salt Company was in Melbourne, and, no doubt, interviewed Ministers, and represented to them the necessity for a recommitment of the duty. However that may be, the salt duty was re-committed and increased. The Prime Minister recently told us that the effect of protective duties was to increase the prices of various commodities, and that the duties were imposed for that purpose. I am pleased to be able to agree with him, but I cannot understand why he allowed the Minister for Home Affairs and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro to travel the country pointing out that the effect of protective duties is to lower prices. If, as the Prime Minister points out, the wages of the workmen employed within the Commonwealth depend upon the prices obtained for the articles they produce, the effect of the duties, according to the Minister for Home Affairs and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, must be to reduce wages. The Prime Minister has utterly given up all control of matters in this House, and has allowed himself to be swayed backwards and forwards. He has even allowed insults to be heaped upon him, and yet he has been content to retain his position as a Minister. Honorable members will not accept his word, as was exemplified upon the occasion to which I have referred.

Mr. Conroy.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was all explained afterwards. The action of the committee was not intended to indicate want of faith in the Prime Minister's word.

Mr. CONROY.—I shall show that my statement is absolutely correct, and in support of it I wish to direct the attention of honorable members to the following passage in Hansard, p. 12212:—

In Division.

Mr. BARTON. — I understood that the Government had undertaken to reduce the Estimates for next year by £130,000. They were willing to do that without any vote of the committee. I desire to know if this vote is proposed for the purpose of insuring the reduction, and if the undertaking of the Government is not to be accepted? The position ought to be clearly understood.

When the Prime Minister used those words I thought that some remnant of his former manliness had returned to him, yet the vote was carried against him, and he submitted to the insult in silence. Is that a position which any Minister of this House ought to occupy?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was explained afterwards.

Mr. CONROY.—Would the Minister for Defence have submitted to anything of that sort? I was even surprised that the right honorable gentleman was content to remain in a Government to which such an insult had been offered. Why should not the same standard of morality be observed in political life that prevails in private life? In private life the Prime Minister would not submit to such a snub—why then should he be a suppliant in political life? Now I wish to deal with the Minister for Trade and Customs, who, in the administration or want of administration of his department, has made himself very objectionable to traders. One of the first matters to which I would draw attention is the strictly personal way in which the Minister seems to treat all matters. Honorable members know that when a majority of this House agreed to reduce the duty upon salt, the right honorable gentleman was primarily responsible for securing a recommitment of that item. He could not, however, have tendered the Cabinet any similar advice with reference to the tea duty, the remission of which involved the Commonwealth in a loss of revenue of approximately £400,000.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—One (was) a protective duty and the other a revenue duty.

Mr. CONROY.—If the Minister took up the position that the revenue of the States ought not to be considered, but that a duty ought to be imposed upon a particular article, because some individual was thereby enabled to obtain a higher price for it, it was utterly unworthy of him. If he will not fight on behalf of the public interests, why does he fight on behalf of private interests? From the statement of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, I assume that if a person owning a tea plantation had come forward and pointed out that his industry required the artificial aid of a protective duty the Minister for Trade and Customs would have been prepared to listen to him. I suppose one of the worst features in connexion with the right honorable gentleman's conduct is that which was referred to the other night by the honorable member for North Sydney. He pointed out that 9,000 tons of sugar had evaded the payment of an excise duty of £3 per ton. This sugar belonged to certain companies, all of which are known to the Minister, who, however, has denied all knowledge of the matter. In this connexion it is worthy of notice that as far back as the 22nd July last an answer was given in the other Chamber to this very question on behalf of the Minister for Trade and Customs. Upon no less than three occasions the matter has been brought under his notice. That a dozen letters have been written upon it can be conclusively proved, and yet he denies all knowledge of it. The names of the gentlemen in New South Wales who have attached their signatures to the statement that the right honorable gentleman did know of the matter are Dr. McLaurin, Dr. Mackellar, Mr. Neville Griffiths, Mr. Edward Knox, and Mr. Kater—men of known probity, who are anxious to have the matter inquired into by a court of law. If their allegations are untrue the Minister can recover £10,000 damages for libel from every one of them. Where is the £27,000 which ought to have been paid upon that sugar? These gentlemen desire an inquiry to be made, and are perfectly willing to pay the expenses connected therewith. All that they wish to know is why the Act was not administered, and why justice was not done. It is useless for the Minister to rise in his place, and declare that the statements of these gentlemen are untrue, because the proper tribunal to determine the matter is the courts of New South Wales. If by reason of negligence the Minister has allowed 9,000 tons of sugar to escape the payment of excise duty, thereby involving the revenue in a loss of £27,000, what becomes of his vaunted sound administration? He is prone to tell us that the revenue is being defrauded of thousands of pounds, and, in effect, it is his habit to declare—"I am the only honest Minister of Customs that the people have ever had." Does the right honorable gentleman inwardly believe that his own colleague, in the person of Senator Playford, did not honestly administer the Customs department in South Australia? Does he suggest that the honorable member for Launceston did not honestly discharge his duties in a similar capacity in Victoria, or that Senator Best was also corrupt? Why, the latter even went so far as to prosecute a client of one of his Ministerial colleagues, because it will be remembered that the present Treasurer of this Parliament, when Premier of the State, appeared in court to defend a man who was charged with attempting to defraud the revenue.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The Commonwealth Minister has to administer a national department.

Mr. CONROY.—But the right honorable gentleman attempts to gain admiration by drawing attention to trifles, notwithstanding that in nine cases out of ten the attorneys prosecuting on behalf of the department confess that there has been no intention on the part of the accused to defraud the revenue. When we find day after day the same thing repeated, we begin to wonder why all those little prosecutions took place. Can this be described as administration? If the Minister says that he is bound to administer the law, he may be asked who was it that objected to this law being passed. When the measure was before the House I pointed out that it placed one of the most dangerous weapons in the hands of the Minister, seeing that it deprived the courts of the right to fix the amount of the fine.

Mr. WILKINSON.—But this being the law, what can the Minister do?

Mr. CONROY.—Let me give the honorable member one or two instances in which the Minister for Customs has not so strictly administered the law. By the Act 38 and 39 Vict. No. 13, every person in South Australia who shall wager sums of money on any game or pastime shall be guilty of a misdeemeanour and liable to imprisonment. Does the Minister know that if he in South Australia made a bet of half-a-crown with a friend, he would be liable to imprisonment under this Act? Does the Minister not know that hundreds of people who like a game of cards, for, it may be, 1d. per dozen, are similarly liable?

MR. WILKINSON.—Is that Commonwealth legislation?

MR. CONROY.—It is legislation the administration of which was in the hands of the present Minister for Trade and Customs when he was Premier of South Australia. Did we ever hear of any summonses being issued in South Australia under that Act? If not, it may be taken that the Minister exercised some discretion, seeing hundreds of people must have been liable on account of wagers made on cricket or football matches. We can see, of course, that if such a law were carried out strictly it would be ridiculous; and that is exactly what we say of the administration of the Customs law. I am bound to say that the motive with which the Customs summonses are issued does not seem to be a right or proper one. The one object ought to be to administer justice to all, and justice cannot be obtained when men are sent to a court where, by reason of the legislation, penalties are imposed as we now find them. We know that even in a case involving 12s. 6d. the minimum fine of £5 has to be imposed. In one case certain goods, valued in all at 12s. 6d., had been brought in, and the strict letter of the law not complied with. The person to whom the goods belonged, together with a cabman and the cabin boy of the vessel, were prosecuted, and on each was imposed a fine of £5 and costs, three summonses thus being issued for what was one offence. If the person to whom the goods belonged had not been able to pay the fines, the cabman and the cabin boy must have gone to gaol. Surely that cannot be sound administration; and that the law is as we find it is the fault of the Minister. I find that on no fewer than 26 occasions I objected to these drastic powers; indeed, at the time I thought I had obtained from the Minister a promise that these provisions should be reconsidered, but, as a matter of fact, no further opportunity for discussion was afforded. I was new to the Ministry at the time, and I thought that in relation to a promise or undertaking of the kind they would act as men act in private life. I did not know that there was such a difference between political virtue and private virtue. The Minister for Trade and Customs, when Premier of South Australia, did not administer the strict letter of the law, as I have shown; but to-day he says—"It is the law; I shall administer it." We almost think we hear Angelo, in Measure for Measure, protesting—"It is the law, and I must administer it"; and we all know the result in the case portrayed by the dramatist. I should like to cite another South Australian Act—33 Vict. No. 15—which was under the control of the present Minister for Trade and Customs, but which was not administered by him in the same way as we now find him administering the Customs Act. Under section 79 of the Act I have just mentioned, any person who, in a public street or thoroughfare in South Australia, rides on the shafts of any cart or other vehicle is liable to a fine of not more than £2. Is it not too ridiculous to suppose that the present Minister for Trade and Customs, when Premier of South Australia, ever put that law in force? Why should he not exercise a similar discretion in Customs cases in which, as his own attorneys tell him, no fraud is charged?

MR. BATCHELOR.—The Premier of South Australia is not a policeman.

MR. CONROY.—Does the Minister for Customs say that it was not his province, because he was not an officer, to set the law in motion? I should not express myself so bitterly against the Minister if I did not know that he had brought more sorrow and pain to men's hearts than he can ever compensate for during the rest of his life. How many honorable men have been brought up in police courts and charged as criminals? Would it be nothing to the Minister if such charges were levelled against him, it being at the same time admitted that no fraud appeared on his part. That is exactly what has happened to scores of merchants. If even in one case the Minister had exercised the prerogative of discretion I should have thought some of the other cases had escaped his notice; at any rate, it would not be for one case or a dozen cases that I should level the charge I am now making. But there have been dozens and dozens of cases in which men, honorable to the heart's core, have been brought up and charged without rhyme or reason.

The honorable member for North Sydney told us of a case in which a man, dealing with 441 sheets of paper containing figures, made a mistake against himself of 28s., and another mistake against the department of 12s. 6d.; and although there was a balance of error against himself, this man was prosecuted as a common criminal. Surely it cannot be contended that such a charge is not a serious matter to an honest man. If such charges are really a matter of indifference, then we could accuse the Minister for Trade and Customs of all the crimes in the Newgate Calendar and yet not outrage his sensibility. We have been told by the Minister that he receives conscience money, but I know at least a couple of cases in which money has been refunded anonymously as a means of avoiding petty prosecution. In one case a merchant had received goods and passed them on a perfectly honest statement of the fact. Subsequently he ascertained that other articles had by mistake been included in the consignment, and that more duty was due by him. That merchant consulted a solicitor as to what ought to be done, and that solicitor sought my advice. The merchant mentioned two friends, both of whom had been prosecuted after their admission of mistakes, and my advice was that he should return the money through his solicitor, in the way in which conscience money is usually paid. Is it not disgraceful that men, honest in their dealings, should have to resort to such means?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—There have been several cases of the kind—men have been so imbued with terror that they dare not admit mistakes at the Customs.

Mr. KINGSTON.—All I can say is that in the case of men who admit an error and call my attention to it, there is nothing to cause them to be afraid. No one dreams of doing anything to make such men afraid.

Mr. CONROY.—That statement of the Minister for Trade and Customs is not in accordance with facts, though I am not charging the honorable gentleman with always knowing that to be the case. Men are perpetually being prosecuted on charges such as I have described. Any morning in the newspapers we may see reported cases in which the solicitors on behalf of the Customs department inform the courts that no dishonest motive or desire to defraud is imputed to the defendants. But in all these cases a fine of £5 and costs, with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment, is imposed. The labour party, who are always bragging about justice, have in this Bill helped to pass legislation which denies justice to the poor man. A fine of £5 and costs is a great deal to a working man: indeed, it may be more than a fine of £500 would be to a wealthier person. The poor man has to go to gaol, and surely that is not the justice which the labour party wish to see administered. When a man is animated by any desire other than that of administering justice impartially, his motives cannot be described as good; and by rigidly inflicting the penalty in these Customs cases we have inflicted injustice on hundreds of people, who very often offend quite unconsciously. The Minister tells us that he cannot discriminate. Is that always the case? I remember that when a member of the Senate brought over 10 lbs. of ginger, upon which the duty was 2s. 6d., he was not brought before a court. What became of the Minister's cry, "I must administer the law; I am incapable of making any difference." The senator happened to be a strong supporter of the Government, and after that incident he fought for their measures tooth and nail. If the Minister knows no difference between offenders, if common sense is not to be brought into the administration of the law, then what was the motive which influenced him to allow one man to go scot-free, and to prosecute another man who brought in 10 lbs. of candy, and to have him fined £15? What is the difference? In each case the revenue is defrauded. Is there to be no common sense in the administration of the Act? Are we not to fit the punishment to the crime? When we see the Minister continually allowing improper charges to be levelled against honorable men, what can we do but suggest motives for his conduct? If he thinks that other men do not care when they are so charged, then when charges of dishonesty are levelled against himself he is in the mighty position that he does not care. Is that a nice position to put us in? I think not. Yet that is what we are continually drifting to. I suppose that nothing is more clear or certain than that if this style of things is continued there will be levelled against the Minister a number of charges which it is to be hoped will cut even him to the quick, if that is possible. I do not say that men do not care when the charge is a baseless one, although they have to be convicted. The Minister does not care if the charge is a baseless one, and he stands in exactly the same position as he was in before. His motive in doing all this advertising in connexion with little cases is not a good one. It is a way to make the mass of the people think that the administration is more sound now than it was before. The real fact is that the administration under such circumstances is less sound now than it was before. It makes my very blood boil when I think of the manner in which honest men are being treated. I wonder I am able to restrain myself and to resist the temptation to level charges against the Minister. Is it any wonder that a man has to go outside mere politics? In a mere political matter who wishes to quarrel with the Minister for Trade and Customs or any other man? But when a political office is administered so badly that the Minister tries to bring the taint of criminality into the homes of hundreds of men, where it has no right to rest, then what are we to do but to mete out justice to the Minister in a similar way? Do we not feel inclined to say—

Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

That is the sort of language which ought to be addressed to the Minister. The Bonus for Manufactures Bill was so framed that it was to take effect from a date prior to its being passed. It was so twisted and mangled in this House that it could not be recognised. It contained one set of conditions when it was introduced, and it was only read a second time on the casting vote of the Speaker. A clause was so altered that it did away entirely with any advantage that might accrue to a private company. The Minister for Trade and Customs fought very strongly for his measure. On recommitment the clause to hand over the bonus to a State was omitted, and the old clause granting the bonus to private enterprise was restored. He fought for the restoration of the old clause, as he certainly did not fight in the public interest for the retention of the tea duty. Only yesterday a witness before the Bonus Commission pointed out that the duty with the bonus is worth £200,000 to him. Supposing that I turned round to the Minister and said to him—"That is the reason why you opposed the labour party—that is the reason why you sacrificed your own Government—that is the reason why you fought day after day with a great earnestness which you never exhibited in any other cause?" Supposing I said that he fought for the Bonus for Manufactures Bill solely because a private firm could be advantaged by its enactment? Of course we all knew when a prior date was fixed in the Bill that none but those who had arranged to start such works could possibly take advantage of its provisions. The Minister displayed an extraordinary interest in fighting for that Bill. Why should I not turn round and charge him with a dishonest motive in the same way as he has charged the merchants? If I did so I should only be meting out to him exactly the same treatment as he has meted out to others. He feels no sense of shame in making these accusations without rhyme or reason against individuals if they happen to be merchants, and I suppose that he would feel no sense of shame if similar accusations were levelled against himself. He will be judged in the same way as he has judged others. He has said that every year the revenue is defrauded of thousands and thousands of pounds. I am willing to accept his statement. But I desire to know how it is that the cases which come before the court are not big cases, but nearly always cases involving a sum that varies from £1 to £3. Except in five or six instances, there has been no case where the sum involved has exceeded £20. I am reminded that a Custom-house officer has said that the Minister does not see the cases of fraud in which action is taken. Yet the Minister declares that fraud is continually going on, that gigantic cases of fraud are coming before him. Where is there a record of these big cases in any court? I think that nearly every man will agree with me that it is not worth the while of a merchant, for the sake of saving £20 or £30, to commit a fraud. If, as the Minister says, cases of fraud involving large amounts do happen, why are they not fought out in the courts? Is a difference being made between a man who defrauds the Customs of a thousand pounds and a man who defrauds it of only a few shillings? The men who defraud the Customs of a few shillings each are continually being brought before the courts. If big cases of fraud have occurred we wish to see them punished; we do not desire the man who commits big frauds on the revenue to escape scot-free. If big frauds on the revenue take place as the Minister says they do, undoubtedly it is his duty to bring the offenders before the courts. Why are not the offenders prosecuted? Is there to be one law for the rich and another for the poor? When a mere mistake is made in addition or subtraction the offender is brought before the court, but apparently where big frauds take place the offenders go down and interview the Minister, and of course the courts are silent. Is that a sound administration of justice?

Mr. TUDOR.—That was one rather large case as I understood from the newspapers.

Mr. CONROY.—That was a case involving between £16 and £17 worth of goods, and a fine of £50 was imposed. The lawyer who was prosecuting on behalf of the Minister got up and alleged that it was not a criminal prosecution, but merely one to determine the amount of the fines to be inflicted.

Mr. TUDOR.—The jury said it was a case of fraud.

Mr. CONROY.—I never went into the case. All I know is that the prosecutor said that it was not a case for a criminal prosecution, but merely a case to determine the amount of the fines to be imposed. We are bound by the statement of the prosecutor. One case of fraud does not make criminals of the merchants as a class any more than does one swallow make a summer. If a member of the House should depart from the strict path of duty and be shut out from decent society, would it follow that every other member ought to be shut out from decent society? I think every one will agree that it would not. What I object to is that the law is not being soundly administered. I cannot help thinking that a great many of the Minister for Trade and Customs' actions have been taken simply for advertising purposes—to lead the public to believe that the administration of the department was never so sound before. The honorable member for Laanecoorie is present, and as a former Minister for Trade and Customs in the State of Victoria he may well be left to defend himself from the attacks of the Minister, who said that in the past there had been no sound administration of the Customs department in New South Wales, Victoria, or South Australia. It is true that when the Minister saw the effect of those words, and the resentment with which they were received he fell back upon those whom he has called companions in crime—the reporters. These gentlemen, employed on the various newspapers, had again “misunderstood” the right honorable gentleman. He said that they had misreported him, and led us to believe that he was another unhappy victim of the press. The same plea has been so often put forward by the Prime Minister that when he advances it we take no notice of it. Whenever any quotation is used against the Prime Minister, we at once expect him to say—“I was misreported there.” Indeed, the other day he carried this defence so far as to say that he had been misreported even in the case of a paragraph read to him from the latest British Blue-book. Let us think for a moment what would be the result if any man were to make charges against the Minister for Trades and Customs in his administration of the department, and the same law were applied to the Minister that he insists upon applying in prosecutions against merchants. What is the law in the Customs Act in the case of a merchant charged with any offence? It is “that the averment of the prosecutor, or the complaint contained in the information or declaration or claim, shall be deemed to have been proved in the absence of proof to the contrary.” In the same way every averment or statement made against the Minister for Trade and Customs ought to be deemed to have been established in the absence of proof to the contrary. Surely what is just in the case of the one should be just in the case of the other. Have honorable members ever considered the way in which the Minister for Trade and Customs overrides an Act of Parliament when he thinks it stands in his way? When the duty on cartridges was before us, it was decided that the shot used in their manufacture should be dutiable, but that cartridges themselves should be free. The Minister for Trade and Customs now seeks to override that decision, which is contained in an Act of Parliament, by inserting the word “empty” before the word “cartridge.” When the matter was before Parliament, another place pointed out what would be the effect of making shot dutiable, while allowing cartridges to go free. The duty, indeed, was referred back to us by another place; but at the very last moment the Minister, together with his colleagues, insisted that the provision should stand as it was. The desire of the Government then was that cartridges should be admitted free of duty. They refused to take any notice of the request made by another place, and they called to their assistance the force of their majority to prevent the rectification of the anomaly. Several honorable members in this House also pointed out the anomaly that had been created. I believe I suggested that as shot would be so much cheaper on account of the duty, the Minister, as a believer in that doctrine, declined to alter the provision. It appears that he has learnt a little since then, and now desires to override an Act of Parliament. But there is only one way in which an Act of Parliament can be overridden, and that is, as the Minister for Trade and Customs, as a lawyer, must know, by passing an Act of equal solemnity. An Act of Parliament is required to remove the anomaly, and the Minister has no right to interfere with the law in the way he has done. During the recess, the right honorable gentleman has been travelling in Queensland and elsewhere, and asserting that he is against black labour—that all his sympathies are in the direction of encouraging white labour. Acts, however, speak louder than words, and we must judge a man not by his statements, but by his deeds. And what do we find? We find that when the Minister is proposing a duty on sugar grown by black labour—and the bulk of the sugar imported from Sumatra and other foreign countries is grown by black labour—he fixes it at £6 per ton. We find that this so-called hater of black labour absolutely discriminates in favour of sugar grown by black as against white labour, and that whilst he fixes the duty on that grown by black labour at £6 per ton, he imposes a duty on sugar which is the product of white labour—namely, beet sugar—at £10 per ton. In matters of this kind we must consider not what a man says, but what he does, and that is the way in which I regard the Minister's declaration that he is seeking to bring about a sound administration of the Customs department, while at the same time he brings men before the courts in respect of cases which should not be treated in that manner. How can it be said that the right honorable gentleman is really administering this Act to the best of his knowledge and ability? I have shown the way in which at least two State Acts were administered by the Minister for Trade and Customs as Premier of South Australia. He did not then hesitate to break the law, so to speak, in the exercise of his discretion; but I decline to say that it is a breach of the law to refuse to put in motion all the severe provisions of those measures. One of them contains a provision "that a certain class of persons found wandering in certain streets or highways, or being in any public thoroughfare, or place of public resort, shall be liable to imprisonment for a couple of months." But was that provision enforced against that large class of persons whom we know to be inevitable in all great cities? No. That law was asked for that justice should be administered; but the exercise of justice lies in the administration of the law, and we find that when the right honorable gentleman was Premier of South Australia, he did not insist upon the arrest of every woman found loitering in the streets. The Act requiring that they should be dealt with in the way I have mentioned, still stands, but the Minister exercised his discretion. I mention this matter only because of the Minister's assertion that he is bound by hard-and-fast rules, and that he must administer the law. It is difficult to know why he did not do so in times gone by. If he exercised a discretion in carrying out the South Australian law which I have mentioned, why is he not able to do so in the administration of the Customs department? That is a question to which we ought to have an answer, and the experience of merchants and others engaged in trading shows that no true answer has yet been returned to us. The right honorable gentleman should recollect that if the law were applied to him as it is applied by him in Customs cases, all charges made against him would be considered proved in the absence of proof to the contrary, and if that recollection will cause him to administer the Tariff with that discretion and due regard for justice which should cause the punishment to meet the offence, the complaints of honorable members on all sides of the House will not have been in vain. Several measures are promised during the present session. One of these is a Defence Bill. I need hardly point out that the action of the Government in regard to the Defence Bill introduced last session is another instance of neglect of duty on their part. If they were not guilty of neglect of duty, they at least showed a want of foresight that deserved to be reprehended. They should have been able to estimate the work of the session, and if they were not prepared to proceed with the Bill they should have let it alone altogether. They should not have taken over the defence forces until they were ready to do so, and, having taken them over, they should have proceeded at once with the passing of a measure to place the whole of them upon a common basis. At the present time there is, and there can be, no sound administration of the Defence department, because there is no Act upon which to work. This brings me to the question of the naval subsidy, in regard to which I find myself in a difficult position. If any one had told me a few months ago that I should object to a naval subsidy, my answer would have been that we were not paying all the contributions that we could. But a considerable change has taken place since then, and although I have not yet absolutely determined how my vote shall be cast in the matter of the proposed subsidy, I do say that when we read the utterances of one party in the British Government—utterances which are calculated to plunge Great Britain into industrial war with other nations—it becomes us to seriously consider our position. We know that industrial war is nearly always followed by a war of bloodshed. We know that the greatest guarantee of the preservation of the doctrine of "On earth peace, good-will toward men" is that there shall be no such thing as industrial warfare. A political party in England at the present time assert that they are likely to ask a large section of the British people to join with them in carrying out a certain policy. If that policy be carried out, I have no hesitation in declaring that, from the very date of its inception, the dismemberment of the Empire must begin. It would not be possible for honorable members to vote for a naval subsidy without a much more serious consideration of the matter than has yet been given to it; because if a bloody war follows an industrial war in Great Britain, our position will be very serious. We shall be in a position in which we cannot by our voice or vote have a share in the councils of the Empire. Whatever she may do for the cause of the Empire itself, Australia cannot, and will not, be dragged at the heels of any party which is about to enter upon a serious industrial strife. While for the present I may continue, as I undoubtedly should have done a few months ago, to give my support to the naval subsidy proposals of the Government, if, when the speeches of Ministers are delivered, they are found to bear in one way, and if we are to be absolutely committed to industrial war with other nations, I shall not be able to see my way to support the tie which holds us together. It cannot be either in the interests of the people of Great Britain or of ourselves. If in Great Britain the people of Australia are to be used as a lever to induce the great mass of the electors there to vote in the way suggested, we on this side cannot be induced by any Imperial representations to risk being plunged into wars of aggression. Our part will be sufficiently performed in wars of defence. I trust that the tie of sentiment arising from the possession of a common language, a common literature, and a common ancestry will never be broken. It is a sentiment against which reason itself would struggle in vain. Who can measure the sentiment of affection? But when we create political ties, however strong they may be, there can always be valid arguments used against them. The stronger these ties are made upon paper, the more we call in the aid of the lawyer to draw up the bond, the more likely are we to weaken the only real tie there can be—the tie of affection which exists at the present day.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member is very rough on the lawyers.

Mr. CONROY.—Well, it is not by the wax and parchment of any lawyers that any country becomes great. It is not by merely scribbling upon paper that the minds of men are to be measured. I say it is most unfortunate that the opposite view should be taken by the Minister for Trade and Customs, because it is that which is landing us in so much trouble to-day—producing a feeling of unrest amongst the bulk of the trading community. Every merchant is anxious to punish the man who commits fraud, because when he pays his own duty he desires that those who evade the payment of duty shall be prevented from underselling him. But he does not desire to be brought into the police court without any real offence being committed. He asks that he shall be treated with exactly the same measure of justice which the Minister for Trade and Customs desires for himself, and that no matter shall be brought into the court unless there is some proof of the commission of an offence. He does not ask that he should be treated as though the mere averment of the Customs authorities should be deemed to be proved until there is proof to the contrary.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—The Act says so.

MR. CONROY.—But why does the Act say so? Is it not because the right honorable gentleman fought for it and insisted upon it, in spite of the fact that members on both sides of the House fought against it and argued that there should be room left for the exercise of discretion? One matter which is to be brought before the House will require a very great deal of consideration. I refer to the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill. Where is the man who is not anxious to see strikes put an end to?

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—We are all anxious for the millennium.

MR. CONROY.—Strikes are, in my opinion, as bad as civil war. There is this difference, that after a civil war the number of persons amongst whom the capital of a community is to be divided is found often to have been lessened, whilst I do not know that during a strike the number of children coming into the world is limited. We must all be desirous of trying whether something cannot be done in the direction suggested, but before we try it would be as well perhaps if we considered what has been done in the past. We know that there have been many statutes regulating these matters before, though they may not always have been similarly named. We know that they sometimes have been used as weapons against the poorer people, and sometimes solely on behalf of the various guilds which from time to time sprung up. I need hardly refer honorable members to the history of guilds throughout France and Germany, and even in England itself. Throughout France and Germany those guilds obtained enormous power. "Guilds" is, of course, only another name for unions, and the powers they were allowed to exercise, mostly from custom and partly by statute, were so great that when the French Revolution broke out, half the leaders of guilds were guillotined. We see inserted in the French Declaration of Rights a most famous clause, which might well be studied by men considering the cause of labour and desiring its true advancement in the real interests of the people. The clause runs as follows :—

We hereby declare the inalienable right of every man to the property of his own labour, and that he be free to sell or dispose of it as seems best to him.

That was a famous declaration. It could not be objected that that legislation did not come from the mass of the people, nor could it be objected that they had had no experience of various Acts operating in the other way. They certainly had. I mention matters like these to show what tremendous injustice and oppression the mere regulation by statute of wages, and so on, may sometimes inflict. In my opinion such a declaration would probably have prevented the great advance in wages that has taken place during the last 30 or 40 years, but I decline to believe that, because some of us hold that view, and, therefore, do not hope for so much from Conciliation and Arbitration Acts as is hoped for by others, we should allow ourselves to be regarded as conservatives. We may be conservatives in the sense that we are striving to keep what is best of the old laws, and in that sense no man can object to being called a conservative. In my view the great mass of the people have less to hope for from legislation than from any other cause. What they have most hope from is the abolition of legislation which, in many cases, restricts and hampers their advancement in every possible way. Therefore, until I have seen the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill which is to be submitted to Parliament, I feel myself unable to say whether or not I shall give it my support. If it will soothe the feelings of the great mass of the people, and tend to make them believe and feel that justice may be more certainly administered than it otherwise would be, there will be a very great deal to be said for the passing of a law of that sort. If, on the other hand, it is found to be a law which may be brought into operation simply because a union in one State may become affiliated with a union in another, the case will be very different. It must be remembered that there are employers' unions as well as employees' unions, and if under the proposed Bill either of these unions may make a dispute a federal matter by simply calling upon some body in another State with which it is affiliated, to strike, I could not possibly support such a measure. The aim of all thinking men will certainly be to lessen and not to extend the area of strikes. There is so much in this idea of restricting the area over which men may even produce, that some socialists recommend the cutting up of various countries in which particular occupations are carried on. I need only refer to Fourier and Owen as socialists who express themselves against any extension of the area over which a strike may occur. It would be well for men who regard themselves wholly and solely as socialists and who desire the advancement of the people from the point of view of socialism, to sometimes study more earnestly the works of socialist writers. There is one other matter to which I shall refer, and that is the High Court of Judicature, which the Ministry propose to deal with. The Judicature Bill has been before Parliament for a very long time. It is now two years since Parliament first met, and two years and a half since the Ministry was formed. When they first met the House they made the statement that it was absolutely necessary to pass a Judicature Bill, and I am inclined to think that had such a measure been brought forward at that time it would have been passed. I admit that personally I should not have supported it, even at that early stage, but to-day we are in a different position. Upon reading through the sections of the Constitution, which give us the power of creating a High Court, I was very much struck by the arguments advanced by Sir John Quick and Mr. Robert Garran, as set forth in their book on the Commonwealth Constitution. They give what appears to me to be very valid reasons why the expense involved in the creation of this court is to a large extent unnecessary, and they even go so far as to suggest that tentative proposals should be introduced under which the various State courts might be empowered to deal with all matters which might arise.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—State Judges would have to be paid to do the work.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member is not correct.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—More Judges would be required in each State.

Mr. CONROY.—The appointment of one or two Judges would not be a matter of any importance. I would ask the honorable and learned member to remember the cases which would likely arise, and I remind him that the Customs Act, the Post and Telegraph Act, and a Defence Act already apply in every State. What are we going to create a batch of Judges for? Is it to settle questions arising out of the Constitution?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—How about appeals?

Mr. CONROY.—Under our Constitution, as the honorable and learned member knows, appeals will nearly always go direct from our State Supreme Courts to the Privy Council. I am not arguing now as to whether it was or was not wise to make such a provision, but there it is, and does any one doubt that in the bulk of cases the appeals will go to the Privy Council? I think the honorable and learned member, when laying down a big principle or fighting on its behalf, recognises that the Privy Council is composed of some of the finest judicial brains in the wide world. Many of the decisions of the Council are absolute masterpieces, and may be read with a vast amount of pleasure by laymen and lawyers alike. Even before I became a member of the bar I derived pleasure and instruction from the reading of decisions given by these eminent men. They were invariably in accord with great principles, and I may say that it was the study of great principles in a copy of these judgments which led me to the study of the law upon which I entered as a member of an entirely different profession. The first thing we have to consider in regard to the establishment of a High Court is whether it is needed. Is it intended to give the administration of Federal Acts to the Federal Judiciary alone? Are the State courts not to take cognisance of Federal Acts? Is it intended to take all jurisdiction in federal matters from the Judges of the Supreme Courts, the district courts, the police courts, and the courts of petty sessions of the States? If so, we shall want for the federal bench not five Judges, as the Ministry propose, but at least 50. If we are to dispense justice, we must bring it as nearly as we can within the reach of all; and it will not be within the reach of all if none but expensive courts are available to suitors. If we abolished the magistrates' courts, fully one half of the people of Australia would be denied justice—not in so many words, because there would still be the district courts and the Supreme Courts for them to appeal to; but, inasmuch as they could not afford the expense of appealing to those courts, justice would actually be denied to them.

The great bulk of the people are satisfied with the decisions given in the minor courts, where impartial magistrates decide according to the equity of the cases which come before them. The amounts involved may be small, but the cases are very important ones to the people concerned in them. To bring justice in regard to federal matters within the reach of all, federal jurisdiction must either be given to these courts, or we must appoint federal magistrates, and set up similar courts throughout the States for the hearing of federal causes only. The same line of argument applies to the district courts. Are we going to take away federal jurisdiction from those courts, and set up federal courts to do the work? If so, we shall require 40 Judges for those courts alone, even if they travel round the various centres, and give the people there an opportunity to bring cases before them every three or four months. So again with the Supreme Court. Is it proposed that the Judges in the Supreme Courts of the States shall not have jurisdiction in federal matters? If so, we shall require, not five, but fifteen or twenty Supreme Court Judges to decide such cases.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What will it all cost?

Mr. CONROY.—The cost of providing for only five Judges will be very great. I think that it cannot be less than £40,000 a year after the first year, and that in a very short time it will reach £70,000 or £80,000 a year, because the Federal Court will endeavour to attract all the work it can, and a separate body of sheriffs and constables will be required to execute its decrees.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Perhaps it would be better to cease for a time to make laws.

Mr. CONROY.—That would be much better for the whole community. It would be a wise thing to abolish many of our laws. What the people might very well ask is, "Where is this expense going to end?" and it behoves us as a Parliament to answer that question. I think that it would be sufficient to pass a short Act, conferring jurisdiction in federal matters upon the State courts. I am not in favour of the creation of a Federal Court which is to be only a Court of Appeal. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, showed the other day, in a very masterly speech, that the number of appeals likely to be made to such a court will be very few. His speech reflected great credit upon him, inasmuch as during the framing of the Constitution he was in favour of the abolition of the appeal to the Privy Council, and wanted a local appeal court. He says now, however, that the position is different. The Constitution gives a right of appeal to the Privy Council, and we must be guided in our deliberations on this matter by that. He pointed out that in Canada and in the United States the average number of constitutional questions arising in any one year was only two, and he asked whether we should go to the great expense of creating a Federal High Court to try the very few cases of appeal that would be brought before it. It is not to be forgotten that even if a Federal High Court be established, its members cannot hope to be altogether uninfluenced by the interests of the States as whose representatives they have been chosen, although they may earnestly strive to be impartial. But even if they act impartially, and a decision is given against a State, if the Judges from that State do not agree with the judgment, the people of the State will be ready to cry that justice was not done to them, because the court was not impartial. With an appeal to the Privy Council things would be very different. It could not be said that that tribunal is other than impartial. Suppose, however, that the Federal High Court were established, and a question affecting the right of South Australia to use the waters of the Murray were brought before it, and the judgment of the court was in favour of the States of New South Wales and Victoria, and against South Australia. Suppose, too, that the South Australian Judge on the High Court Bench was against the judgment. Would not the people of South Australia then say that the court was biased, and that its Judges leaned towards the States from which they came? In the early days of federation it is most important that nothing should be done to foster State jealousies, and therefore decisions which effect State interests should come from a body whose impartiality is unimpeachable. I do not say that the High Court might not come to the same conclusion that the members of the Privy Council would come to; but I think that the feeling of a State against whom judgment was given would be that her interests had not been fairly dealt with by the Federal Court. Then the objections to the High Court are very great on the score of expense. I think that the expense will be so great that we shall see growing up in the minds of the people a feeling of indignation against those who are responsible for its creation. We have already strained their loyalty to federation to a point of extreme tension. Indeed, I had no idea that people could become so hot, or that the condemnation of Ministerial action could be so general throughout Australia as we have seen it of late. In whatever State you visit there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with federation. People think that things have not gone on rightly. In my opinion, the fault lies, not with the federal machinery, but with those who have been in charge of it, and who have failed in every instance to exercise the common sense which the occasion has demanded. Wherever you go you hear some fresh complaint. One man complains that he cannot get a telephone connexion that he wants; another man has some other complaint to make; and so we find that the general feeling of the community is that the federal administration has been a gigantic muddle. For this the Ministry are entirely responsible. They undertook the administration of departments before they were ready to do so. Those who hold office have been too long accustomed to the little matters of State administration to be safely intrusted with the larger matters that fall under the administration of a Federal Cabinet. The time has passed for the Government to administer the affairs upon the same lines as were formerly observed in the States. Ministers should consider the interests and wishes of the whole of the people over whom they have to govern, and however convinced they may be of the advantages to be derived from certain measures they should not bring them forward until they are likely to meet with the approval of the great body of the people who have to submit to them. That is a very sound principle to be followed, not only in the framing of the laws, but in their administration. During the stormy times through which the Federal Legislature of the United States passed in the last century, Alexander Hamilton found that so much opposition was being displayed by the people of two or three of the States to an Excise Act that, like a wise administrator, he allowed the law to almost fall into abeyance in those States; that is to say, he administered the Act with such discretion and care that it was made to appear less offensive. I wish the Minister for Trade and Customs had exercised the same care with regard to the administration of his department in at least one of the great States of the Commonwealth. I wish that he had had some appreciation of the fact that a radical change was being made in the laws under which the people of that State had to live, and that the public were likely to feel some resentment, because they believed that they had not been able to secure the truest and fullest possible representation in the Federal Parliament. He should have recognised the feeling which existed there that the Prime Minister had not made the electors fully acquainted with the Tariff that was to be submitted to Parliament; that, if he had done so, many of those who were returned as supporters of the Government would have been rejected in favour of others, and that as a necessary consequence the Tariff would not have been carried in its present form. A certain amount of soreness exists not only in regard to the Customs administration, but also with respect to that of the Postal and Telegraph department. Such changes have been made in the latter department that for the last two years all extensions of the telephone system in the country districts have been denied, and all development has ceased. This is a very serious state of affairs, and complaints have been loud and general. Then, again, the residents in the country districts have been called upon to submit to the imposition of postage upon newspapers. Surely if the question of issuing a common stamp for all Australia had to be postponed for some years on account of the operation of the financial clauses of the Constitution, the imposition of a common tax might very well have been similarly deferred; especially when the people of New South Wales were already contributing to the revenue to a much larger extent than was reasonable. The hundred-and-one pin pricks to which the public have had to submit have created a feeling of irritation against not only the Ministry but the Federal Parliament. If the resentment had always been directed against its proper object, namely, the Ministry, I should not complain, but I am convinced that the great majority do not distinguish too clearly between the Ministry and Parliament, and that consequently there is a likelihood of the Parliament being embraced in the wholesale condemnation. The Opposition have made perhaps as strong and as patriotic a protest as was ever made by any body of individuals. They have attended here under great disadvantages as compared with many honorable members who sit behind the Government. Of 23 Victorian representatives, nineteen sit behind the Government, and it is therefore very easy for Ministers to rally their supporters to their aid at any time; whereas the majority of the members of the Opposition come from other States. I regret that a motion of censure was not proposed. It is true that possibly from a party point of view it would not have been wise to propose an amendment to the address, but I think there are higher considerations than those of party. The continuance of the present Government in office is a misfortune, because it is daily adding to the load which Australia has to bear. The longer they continue in office the greater will become those vested interests which are likely to make a strong and bitter fight against liberalism and progress. Therefore, I should have unhesitatingly supported a motion of censure with a view to ejecting the Government from office. I know that the leader of the Opposition thinks that it is absolutely impossible to carry a motion of censure against the Government, but I should have liked to attach to all those honorable members who support the Ministry the full responsibility of their action. I should have liked to see them go forth as a body of men who, up to the very last moment, expressed their belief in the Ministry as being the best that could be placed in office; and if it is considered advisable even at this late stage to move an amendment to the address I shall be glad to support it. I never cared about fighting against jelly fish. I always like to have something to fight against, something definite against which to direct my efforts. I should like to carry the fight against the Government to the very last point, and show that I recognise that their continuance in office is, through the perpetual maladministration of the departments, a menace to Australia. When the next election comes I shall do my best, by the use of my voice and pen, to see that the people of Australia are made fully acquainted with the misdeeds of the Government. It is not my fault that they are not well acquainted with them already; but, owing to the frequent mistakes that are made by nine Ministers, it is impossible for one man's tongue to proclaim them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I do not intend, as on a former occasion, to occupy four hours in commenting upon the matter which is contained in the Governor-General's speech. Honorable members may remember the circumstances under which I addressed the House at such length at the beginning of last session. I think my action then resulted in some good, as it enabled honorable members to call upon Ministers and their supporters to defend their position. The Prime Minister is, in my opinion, open to blame for the way in which he has treated the people of the Commonwealth. It is all very well for the right honorable gentleman to tell us that he did not mislead the electors as to his intentions regarding the Tariff. His speech at Maitland was delivered with a view to induce free-traders to record their votes in favour of the Government, and the old-age pension scheme was put forward as a sop to the labour party. The Government must have known perfectly well—as they have admitted since—that it was impossible under the "Braddon" clause to adopt an old-age pension scheme, because of the difficulty of raising the necessary funds. They told us that they would not resort to any direct taxation, and they confessed their inability to raise the extra £4,000,000 required through the Customs without imposing intolerable burdens upon the people. They have now dropped the scheme altogether. Referring to the Tariff at Maitland, the Prime Minister said—

A business Tariff, a practical working Tariff, and a real Federal Tariff is what we require. If you desire revenue destruction, then you must look for another representative, and the Australian Parliament must look for another Ministry, for we shall not take part in such a task as that.

Reports have appeared from which it would seem that the right honorable gentleman stated that a Tariff yielding £4,000,000 would enable the Government to get over the difficulty caused by the "Braddon blot." The right honorable gentleman has repeatedly stated that he was misreported, but although he denies the accuracy of those reports, I think he will admit that the statement appeared in quite a number of the newspapers.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not know in how many it appeared, but I saw it in one.

It seemed so ridiculous and so utterly at variance with all my public utterances on the subject that nobody could possibly believe I had ever said it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The publication of that statement in the Sydney Morning Herald, the Daily Telegraph, the Evening News, and the Australian Star, not to mention some of the country newspapers, must have exerted considerable influence upon the electors of that State regarding the question then at issue.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Is the honorable member referring to a period prior to the referendum?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. I come now to a manifesto issued by his party upon the night that the Prime Minister was addressing his meeting. In offering these observations, I wish honorable members to understand that I am anxious to avoid all personal reflections. I think that we should endeavour to raise the tone of the Federal Parliament by avoiding all references of a personal character. In the manifesto to which I have referred—some thousands of copies of which were distributed—

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Has the honorable member a copy of it here?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have a part of it here—the other portion is at home. Amongst other statements contained in that manifesto is the following:—

Free-trade and a high protective Tariff are both impossible. The necessity of raising a large revenue makes free-trade impossible, and for the same reason a prohibitive Tariff is out of the question. Therefore, there is nothing to prevent both free-traders and protectionists from joining the ranks of the association.

Mr. BROWN.—The name of the association was altered for that purpose.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Exactly. The effect of that statement was to mislead the free-traders of New South Wales, and to induce them to vote differently from what they otherwise would have done.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Was that manifesto issued prior to the referendum?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; it was issued upon the night that the right honorable gentleman delivered his address at Maitland.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It says that a prohibitive Tariff was impossible.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. In his address the right honorable gentleman declared that he desired to raise revenue.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have always stated that revenue was the first consideration.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is so; but the Prime Minister must admit that after reading the statement to which I have directed attention, the people of the Commonwealth would scarcely expect a Tariff of the character originally proposed by the Government to be submitted to this House. Why, the duties levied upon some of the items which it contained amounted to 80 per cent. and 100 per cent. That the right honorable gentleman misled some of his own supporters in this matter is evidenced by the fact that Mr. Thomson, who formerly represented a free-trade constituency in the New South Wales Legislature, and who took the chair for him at one of his meetings, immediately upon the character of the Tariff being made public, wired as follows:—

Great wrath at betrayal of constituency by breach of promise. We expected heavy revenue duties, but not a one-sided Victorian monstrosity.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That shows that he did not understand the subject about which he was talking.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It shows that the Prime Minister misled the free-trade electors of New South Wales.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—At the meeting over which Mr. Thomson presided I distinctly stated that the Tariff would be a protective one, that the Ministry was almost entirely composed of protectionists, but that the measure of protection afforded must be moderate, having regard to the circumstances of the States.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Did the Prime Minister say—

It will be a business Tariff, a practical working Tariff, a real Federal Tariff? That is what we will fight for. If you desire revenue destruction, then you must look for another representative and the Australian Parliament must look for another Prime Minister, for we shall not take part in any such task as that.

It will be generally admitted that some of the duties which were originally proposed by the Government must have been destructive of revenue.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No; the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The duties originally proposed must necessarily have produced a large revenue. The other night my honorable friend intimated that I had something to do with the defeat of the duty upon tea. I take my full share of responsibility in that connexion. Why did I assist in bringing about the defeat of that duty?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member had his leader's pair in his pocket.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did so because on the 19th of March of last year the Treasurer brought down to the House an amended financial statement showing that up to that date he would, so far as he could ascertain from the estimates, receive nearly £600,000 more than he had anticipated, notwithstanding all the reductions which had been made in the Tariff. At that time we had dealt with all the principal items of the Tariff. The Treasurer's statement was submitted the night before we were called upon to deal with the tea duty, and in view of the fact that the revenue was so much in excess of the Ministerial estimate, many honorable members like myself, who believe that tea is a fair subject for duty, felt that they could not support a proposal which would provide the Government with an additional £500,000 or £600,000.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member admits whipping on that occasion?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit having taken part in it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member did not say that in Tasmania.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes, I did; but when the Minister for Home Affairs was in Tasmania he told the people of that State a nice little fairy tale, which, I am glad to say, was not received with much appreciation. In dealing with the tea duty the Treasurer made the following important statement:—

I venture to say that if we had told the States which have been loyal to the federal movement from first to last that their finances were to be disarranged to a considerable extent, we should have found that they would not have entered into the Federation at all.

In the case of Tasmania the question at issue was to relieve that State of taxation to the extent of £15,124. But what was the position of New South Wales? The Prime Minister has frequently told the electors of that State that federation would not cost them the price of the registration of a dog—that it would not amount to 2s. 6d. per head of the population. Indeed, he has recently declared that its actual cost is only about 1s. per head of the population. Yet, according to the last financial statement of the Colonial Treasurer under the Federal Tariff, the people of New South Wales are taxed to the extent of £1,250,000 more than they were previously taxed. This sum represents about £1 per head, notwithstanding which the Prime Minister assured them that federation certainly would not cost more than 2s. 6d. per head.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That was the estimate which was always made of the "new" expenditure caused by federation. It does not reach that sum even now.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Did the right honorable gentleman tell the people of New South Wales that they would be compelled to submit to additional taxation through the Customs representing £1,250,000?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No; but I told them that there must be a heavy Tariff in order that proper returns might be made to the States.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Tariff at present operating yields about £9,500,000 annually, notwithstanding that reductions were made in it representing taxation to the extent of £1,250,000 a year. Yet my honorable friend opposite blames the Opposition, because in a fair fight they defeated an attempt on the part of the Government to extract an additional £500,000 or £600,000 from the pockets of the people.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member explained that matter differently in Tasmania.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I explained it as I am explaining it now: I never make speeches calculated to mislead people.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member cannot have been correctly reported.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not make much complaint of misreporting, of which, however, I have to take my share. This is not the first time the Prime Minister and myself have come into collision over the matter of misleading the electors in reference to a Tariff. A few years ago the Prime Minister was a supporter of our free-trade Ministry, and when an attempt was made, shortly after his election, to raise the fiscal issue, he said that "he would have nothing to do with the Opposition." The Government was defeated a few weeks later, and the right honorable member accepted office as Attorney-General. Mr. Wise, the present Attorney-General of New South Wales, speaking in reference to a partly protective Tariff which was introduced in the New South Wales Parliament, said:—

The honorable and learned member for East Sydney, Mr. Barton, has had two opportunities of making his choice, and on each occasion he has deceived those who trusted him. I tell him now that upon the great question of a union of the colonies his chance of leadership has gone by forever. The man who will not be a leader upon that question, or upon any other great question requiring the confidence of the people, is the man who has betrayed that confidence twice.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — Mr. Wise has repented of that since.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I dare say that Mr. Wise has repented of a good many things since, but that was his opinion as a free-trader. At any rate, these remarks show that the Prime Minister was not true to the promise he made to the people of East Sydney when he was elected, but that he brought in a protective measure, which was contrary to the wishes of the electors, as was proved by the subsequent defeat of the Government. The Minister for Home Affairs has been making some speeches in Tasmania in reply to those delivered by the leader of the Opposition. It must be admitted that the Minister for Home Affairs had a very small audience at the meeting to which I am about to refer.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I had a very large audience; the honorable member must have been reading the Launceston Examiner.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I saw by one of the newspapers which support the honorable gentleman's policy that at that meeting there were about 500 people present. At the meeting addressed by Mr. Reid, although a charge of 1s. per head was made for admission, up to ten minutes before the hour of commencement—

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—To see the play.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is a play which the Prime Minister does not like, and which he will like less before the general election is over. I was about to point out that, notwithstanding this charge for admission—which, I may say, was made against the wish of the leader of the Opposition—the hall was packed. On the other hand, when the Minister for Home Affairs addressed a meeting in the same hall the audience was so small that a curtain was drawn half-way down the hall, while in the galleries there was not a single auditor. At that meeting the Minister for Home Affairs endeavoured to show that protectionist Victoria had made great progress as compared with free-trade New South Wales, and to support his position he referred to the deposits in the Savings Banks of the two States. As a matter of fact, during the last ten years the Savings Bank depositors of New South Wales have increased by about 79 per cent., as against an increase of 34 per cent. in Victoria, while the deposits have increased by 105 per cent. in New South Wales as against 71 per cent. in Victoria. During the same period the average per depositor was £38 11s. 8d. in New South Wales as compared with £24 14s. 8d. per head in Victoria, while in 1901 the amount per head of population in the Savings Banks of Victoria was £8 8s. 8d. as against £8 13s. 9d. in New South Wales. In 1891, in all the banks, building societies, and other provident associations of Victoria, the deposits amounted to £7,195,001 more than did the deposits in similar institutions in New South Wales, whereas in 1901 the reverse was shown, the amount in New South Wales being over £5,000,000 more than in Victoria.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is comparing a boom year with a drought year.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I will take any year the honorable member likes to mention. The Minister for Home Affairs, in the course of his speech in Tasmania, said that in the Savings Banks of New South Wales the deposits amounted to £11,000,000, ignoring the fact that they amounted to nearly £900,000 more.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I gave the exact figures.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I took the figures from the report in the Sydney Daily Telegraph.

Mr. MAUGER.—How much was there in the banks generally?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Give the number of Savings Bank depositors.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports changes his ground as soon as he finds the facts against him. I admit that there were more depositors in Victoria, but I have shown that the deposits per depositor and per head of population were greater in New South Wales than in Victoria.

Mr. MAUGER.—Where are the friendly societies?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—All these societies are lumped together in Coghlan. The Minister for Home Affairs talked about the enormous sums of loan money expended in New South Wales as compared with Victoria. It must be remembered, however, that the way in which the figures are used in Victoria would deceive most honorable members. In New South Wales the expenditure of loan money includes such works as sewerage, tramways, and local government, and the amount comes to £51 4s. per head; but in Victoria, for the purpose of reference, water and sewerage works and tramways are kept apart. If in Victoria all these works were taken into consideration in the same way as in New South Wales we should find that in 1900, which, I believe, was the last year of office of the Reid Administration—and we are not responsible for what has taken place since—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member intend to connect these remarks with the question before the House?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think I shall be in order in showing that New South Wales has made progress under free-trade, while Victoria has gone back under a protective policy. The expenditure per head of population in New South Wales in 1900 was £51 4s., while in Victoria it was £54 2s. 4d. The Minister for Home Affairs stated that the New South Wales Government had received £40,000,000 from the public lands, but if we compare the alienated lands in Victoria and in New South Wales we find that the latter State has parted with 24 per cent., and Victoria with 41 per cent. It must further be borne in mind that Victoria has received from her minerals no less a sum than £263,000,000 sterling; while from the same source New South Wales has received only £138,000,000. Victoria thus had a splendid start with £125,000,000 more than New South Wales from this source.

Mr. MAUGER. — How about the last ten years?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I am now speaking of the total receipts. The Minister for Home Affairs tried to gull the people of Tasmania by speaking of the great success of manufactures in Victoria as compared with those in New South Wales. But during the last twelve years, the number of males employed in the factories of Victoria has decreased by 2,046, as compared with an increase in New South Wales during the last eleven years of 11,258. It must be admitted that the number of females employed in the factories of Victoria has, during that period, increased by 11,143, but the total increase of males and females in New South Wales has been 15,256 as against 9,097 in Victoria. Then the Minister for Home Affairs tried to show that even in the matter of population Victoria could compare favorably with New South Wales. But surely it is no evidence of prosperity under protection that in the last ten years Victoria has lost one tenth of her population, and is still losing it in large numbers. The Attorney-General himself admitted in a speech he delivered on this question in the Victorian State Parliament on the 5th October, 1892, that in Victoria the miners had nothing to expect from protection, while the farmers had obtained all the benefit they possibly could from that policy, and would soon be in the same position as the miners, thus showing clearly that protection could not possibly be of any advantage to either of these classes. As to trade, I should like to refer to the figures of Mr. Fenton, the Victorian statistician.

Mr. MAUGER.—He is all wrong.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Everybody is all wrong, according to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. But Mr. Fenton shows that in the years from 1860 to 1900 there was a decrease in extra-Australian trade amounting to £600,000 in Victoria, as against an increase of £26,000,000 in New South Wales during the same period.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does not the honorable member know that Mr. Fenton has said that he forgot to include the whole of the timber trade?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That will not amount to a great deal.

Mr. MAUGER.—Over £100,000.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The difference in favour of New South Wales was £26,000,000. Forty years ago the extra-trade of Victoria exceeded that of New South Wales by about £14,000,000. Whereas in 1900 the extra-trade of New South Wales exceeded that of Victoria by £11,000,000. In this debate references have been made to the administration of the Customs department. Like my honorable friends on the opposition benches I believe in the law being administered in a fair and just way.

man attempts to defraud the revenue, let the Minister enforce the law; he ought to discriminate between a man who has deliberately tried to defraud the revenue and a man who has made a mistake, as has been the case very often.

I could cite a number of cases where the magistrates have told the Customs authorities that there was no intention to defraud the revenue, but that they were bound to impose a fine of £5, although the sum in dispute amounted to only a few shillings. I hold that in such cases a man should not be made a criminal where he is guilty of no wrong intent, but of only a simple mistake. I wonder what the Minister would say if every person who did business with his department were to be round and say—"I shall proceed with you for every mistake which I have made in administering the law."

If that policy were adopted, prosecutions would be instituted for every mistake must have been made in hundreds of cases. If the Customs authorities proceeded against for all the mistakes which they have made, we could well understand what would happen. The Minister has a very novel method to prevent the possibility of any mistakes on his part coming before the courts. In this connexion, I may refer to the case which was tried in Sydney yesterday. I do not know anything of the merits of the case; I do not know the merchant concerned, and no one has communicated with me on the subject. I have only read the report which appeared in the Evening News yesterday evening. If Mr. Goldring, the merchant in question did wrong, he must pay the penalty for his wrong-doings according to the statement which was submitted on his behalf to the court, his goods, books, and papers were seized, and have been held, for some considerable time—perhaps, I believe—the department prevented him from going on with his business, refusing to give him a reason for their course of action. I shall quote the exact words of the Sydney telegram which appeared in the Evening News:—

The case of Magnus Goldring against the Collector of Customs occupied the attention of the Full Bench to-day. It came before their Honours on an application by Goldring, who is an importer of watches and jewellery, to make absolute a rule by which the Commonwealth Collector of Customs had been called upon to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not be issued to compel him to sign entries for two parcels of watches, and to state his reasons for refusing to do so.

A man whose business is being interfered with by the Customs department has a right to know the reason for their action.

He was also called upon to show cause why he should not either deliver up applicant's books, which were taken away by him under certain powers exercised by him under the Customs Act, or, in compliance with the requirements of the Act, give applicant certified copies, for the purpose of enabling him to carry on his business.

If this thing can be done to Mr. Goldring it can be done to any other merchant in the Commonwealth, and any man is liable to have his business ruined by the action of the department. One would have thought that the Minister would have been only too glad to have a full inquiry made into the case in order that Mr. Goldring might have an opportunity to obtain justice if he had a cause of complaint against the administration of the law. But what did the Government do?

The application was based on the ground that the delay in returning the books of the applicant or furnishing copies within a reasonable time was a denial of his rights; that he was entitled to have his entries passed, and to have the goods delivered for home consumption within a reasonable time after the production of the material for such entries, or to be informed why the entries had not been passed.

Surely that is a reasonable request for any merchant to make! How would any merchant who holds a seat in this House like the Customs authorities to seize his goods, books, and invoices, interrupt his business without ascribing any reason for their course of action, and decline to allow a copy of his invoices to be made? I am sure that the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh, would not like to be treated in that way. Mr. Goldring does not appear in the character of a dishonest man when he publicly appeals against the action of the Minister, and courts the fullest inquiry into his transactions with the department. It does not look as if he was afraid of an inquiry being held.

Sir Julian Salomons, when the affidavits in support of the application had been read, took a preliminary objection that the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

Last session it was the duty of the Opposition to point out to the House how persons in the Commonwealth were prevented from taking any action at law against any member of the Commonwealth Government, and a short Bill was introduced in order, as I understood, to enable any aggrieved person to apply for some measure of redress. Apparently the Minister for Trade and Customs can interpret the law as he likes, and will not allow a court or any one else to intervene and give redress to a business man who feels aggrieved by his administration. It appears to me to be an extraordinary proceeding on his part, and to need explanation. According to this report his action looks very bad indeed. Sir Julian Salomons, acting for the Government, said that the Commonwealth Constitution having transferred the Customs department to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commonwealth Parliament and its Executive, no officer of the Customs, any more than any officer of the Executive Government, was open to mandamus from the State Court.

What remedy does this man possess?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If he had paid the duty he would have obtained his goods, and then he could have sued for the deposit which he had made. Instead of that, he chose to take another course, and to ask the court to command a Commonwealth officer to do something.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The Attorney-General can give the explanation at a later stage.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I should like the Attorney-General to be allowed to give the explanation now, sir.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I can assure the honorable member that Mr. Goldring having two other remedies open to him, chose a third, which would have meant coercing the Commonwealth without the Court being properly informed as to the circumstances. He had his remedy under the Claims Against the Commonwealth Act, and he did not choose to take it. He had his remedy under the Customs Act, and he did not choose to take it. He chose to do something else.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Why should not the Minister for Trade and Customs allow him to have access to his books and to make a copy of the invoices?

Mr. KINGSTON.—He could have got them at any time by depositing the amount of the duty.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I understand that in some cases where merchants have overpaid the department, the Treasurer will not refund the excess amount. I have been told of one case where, because the importer did not take action within a certain time, he could not get the excess payment refunded. It is a fair and straightforward course for a man to appeal to a court, and in every such case the Minister ought to give a reason for his action—

In giving judgment, the Acting Chief Justice said that, under the 60th section of the Commonwealth Act, Customs and other matters were transferred to the Commonwealth, and officers were appointed to perform the duties of such Customs, including a comptroller and collector for each State. It was quite clear our State Legislature and Government had nothing to do with the matter, and that this court had no power to say whether a federal officer had or had not discharged his duties properly. That was entirely a matter between him and the authority which appointed him. The Collector of Customs owed no duty to the State Government.

Seemingly, it is difficult for a man to get any redress in a case of this kind. Mr. Pilcher, who is a leader at the Sydney bar, advised Mr. Goldring as to what was the proper course for him to take; his advice was followed; and the Government immediately set up the plea that the court had no jurisdiction. It is a case of such importance that an explanation ought to be given by the Minister. The action of the department does not reflect much credit on the Commonwealth; and it is not fair that the Commonwealth should be placed in such an invidious position. When the Prime Minister spoke at Maitland not long ago of the work which had been done by the Government he referred to the Act which had been passed. He took a great deal of credit to the Government for the passing of the Public Service Act. He pointed out that it was a splendid measure, inasmuch as it took away all political patronage and influence from the Ministry. I wish to ask the right honorable and learned gentleman who was responsible for taking away political patronage and influence from the Ministry? In their original Bill the Government took to themselves all the necessary powers to make appointments, increase salaries, and effect any adjustments; and the honorable member for Wentworth proposed an amendment which compelled the Government to obtain a recommendation from the Public Service Commissioner before they acted, in order that he might have a voice in every case of the kind. The influence and power of the Public Service Commissioner which had been annulled under the Bill as introduced by the Government was in that way restored.

Mr. WILKS.—He would have been merely a recording clerk.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. That would have been very handy no doubt for some members of the Government, judging by certain appointments that have been made. There was certainly need for a Public Service Act to prevent political influence, because I think even honorable members opposite were shocked.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member is an authority on that point.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I was for many years a member of a New South Wales Government, and I defy any one to point to any case in which I allowed political influence to interfere with appointments in the department I administered.

Mr. WILKS.—They tried to get at the honorable member, but could not manage it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not say that I was any better than any one else; but I defy any one to point to any appointments in the public service of New South Wales of which I have reason to be ashamed. I think the honorable member for Eden-Monaro will admit that I always obtained the services of the very best men.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We all give you credit for that.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Prime Minister cannot take much credit for the Public Service Act, because if it had been passed as proposed by the Government it would not have got rid of the political influence to which reference has been made. I come now to one or two other matters which I think are of much importance. In speaking of the Tariff the Minister for Trade and Customs in December last made a notable admission. It is not often that we can get a protectionist to make any admission of the kind; but that made by the Minister was in keeping with assertions made from time to time by honorable members on this side of the House, and as often denied by protectionists. In speaking in the House on the 2nd December last, the right honorable gentleman is reported by Hansard to have made this statement—although, I suppose, the Ministers will attempt to deny the correctness of Hansard—

The honorable member may look it up as much as he likes; but he will find that the figures are as I have given, showing the importations from Germany, France, and Belgium. And I say as regards these countries protection and cheap labour reign supreme.

These are the countries which my right honorable friend has always urged that we should copy. He says that we ought to adopt protection because it benefits the working classes.

Mr. WILKS.—If the honorable member reads the newspapers of Melbourne to-day, he will not think it has done so.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think we can obtain plenty of evidence that it has not helped Victoria. We are all sorry for that, because we have no feeling against this State. We recognise that the men of Victoria are as good as those of any other part of the Commonwealth.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Almost.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall not make that exception. A large number of former Melbourne residents live in my constituency, and they are splendid men. They came over to free-trade New South Wales, and they have done well. They have obtained there the benefit of fresh air and freedom.

Mr. WILKS.—And they are now on the honorable member's committee.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Of course they are. I take exception to the action of the Prime Minister in regard to the proposed preferential trade between England and the colonies. When a cablegram was published in the Melbourne newspapers giving the substance of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, my right honorable friend, not as Sir Edmund Barton, but as the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, sent a cablegram to England intimating his approval, as head of the Federal Government, of the proposal, and presumably the authorities at home would believe that he was speaking for the Federal Parliament.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did not send any cablegram; I simply expressed my opinion in answer to a request by a representative of a press agency.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That opinion was cabled home by the press agency, and my right honorable friend will admit that it was transmitted to England as the opinion of the Prime Minister, speaking for the Commonwealth.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The opinion of the Prime Minister, speaking for his Government.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If that is the opinion of the Government they should have the courage to admit it; they should come down to the House and say—"This is our opinion; we do not want any mistake. We believe we are voicing the opinion of the people of the Commonwealth, and we are prepared to stake our existence on it." In view of what Mr. Chamberlain has said, it is singular that in the speech which the Prime Minister delivered at Maitland in 1901 he made a statement, which also appeared in the Governor-General's speech of 10th May, 1901—

Some time must elapse before the financial conditions of the Commonwealth will admit of provision being made for old-age pensions. It is, however, the desire of my Ministers to deal with the subject as soon as possible.

The right honorable gentleman told the people what he was going to do. First of all, he caught the free-traders like Mr. Thompson, who was gullible, but found out his mistake. Of course, some of us knew the right honorable gentleman too well. We had been in Parliament with him, and knew that on the question of free-trade he was able to turn somersaults without any trouble. The Prime Minister told the people of the Commonwealth, in the course of his Maitland speech, that he was in favour of old-age pensions, and that the workers could expect them, not from the Opposition, but from his Government. He told the free-traders of Australia that his Government were not going in for any Tariff to destroy revenue, but for one which free-traders and protectionists alike could join hand in hand in supporting. He gained his point through what I say was a piece of deception. He knows that had it not been for that deception the Vice-President of the Executive Council, for whom I have the greatest respect, could not have obtained anything like 50,000 votes. In this way the right honorable gentleman gained his point. He secured the support of a large number of free-traders, as well as that of a great number of workers, and passed this objectionable Tariff. No doubt Mr. Chamberlain read the Prime Minister's speeches, and said—"The Prime Minister of the Commonwealth is a pretty shrewd fellow; he humbugged the workers and the free-traders."

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member must not say that the Prime Minister humbugged the electors.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am speaking in a political sense. I will say that he misled them.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not mind it, Mr. Speaker. The honorable member said just now that I deceived the electors.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I will say that the right honorable gentleman deceived them.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not say that.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Then I will say that he led them astray. No doubt Mr. Chamberlain, on reading my right honorable friend's speeches, considered that the Prime Minister had done very well; that he had been able to lead the workers astray by the promise of old-age pensions; that he had led the free-traders astray; and had succeeded in getting his Tariff through—

Mr. THOMSON.—Not "his" Tariff.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He succeeded in passing, not the Tariff he proposed, but one to which we objected because of the heavy duties which it still contained. No doubt Mr. Chamberlain hoped to succeed by adopting similar questionable tactics.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—A Tariff that the right honorable gentleman did not understand.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not say that. I am sorry that Mr. Chamberlain supports the system of preferential trade proposed, because we all give him every credit for his action in connexion with the South African war. We all cordially supported the action of the Government—or most honorable members of the Opposition did so—in sending troops to assist the Empire, and we should do it to-morrow if the occasion arose. We are all anxious to do what we can to assist the Empire, because if it goes down we must go down with it. I start therefore with a fairly good opinion of Mr. Chamberlain, but I must say that I am astounded that he should be a party to the system of preferential trade proposed. What does Mr. Chamberlain say—

The workers must be convinced that they would be recouped the tax on food by extra wages, by social reforms, and by old-age pensions.

Mr. WILKS.—He laid great stress on old-age pensions.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—They will need them if a tax is placed on food.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—After two kites had been flown, first by Mr. Chamberlain and then by Mr. Balfour—one speaking one way and one the other—those gentlemen considered that they could correctly interpret public opinion, but I think they will be mistaken. Mr. Balfour, who was at first half-hearted, then made this statement :—

Is it so certain that the working classes would repudiate such a tax? If by a general tax on foodstuffs it was possible to obtain from the colonies large measures of free-trade in manufactured goods, I am not sure it would not be worth while. I do not know whether the British working classes would consent to the sacrifice, or whether the colonies would consent to modify their Tariffs.

As free-traders we should welcome the opening of our doors, because we realize that we are able to hold our own. The Minister for Trade and Customs referred in the extract I have given to the imports from France, Germany, and Belgium, where, he said, low wages and protection reigned supreme. Our imports from those countries amounted to about £3,860,000, but our exports to those countries totalled about £6,520,000. We are sending goods to those countries, and receiving in return 70 per cent. more goods than they get for the goods they send to us. We have gained in one year £2,660,000 by our trade with the foreign countries to which reference has been made. Then it appears that the Government believe that England is going down, for I presume that is really the effect of the Prime Minister's cablegram. He indorses Mr. Balfour's opinion that England is going down. I see no evidence of it. According to the latest returns there is no likelihood of anything of the kind. The latest report issued by the Board of Trade does not indicate anything in that direction. What do we gather from it? In 1871 the population of the United Kingdom was 260 per square mile; in France it was 177 per square mile; in Germany 196 per square mile, and in the United States 10·7 per square mile. In 1900 the United Kingdom maintained a population of 342 to the square mile; France, 191; Germany, 269; and the United States, 21. If these countries were called upon to maintain the same population per square mile as England, with its 120,000 square miles of territory, France, instead of maintaining 39,000,000, would have to maintain 71,230,000; Germany, instead of maintaining 56,367,000, would have to maintain 72,000,000; and the United States, instead of 75,000,000, would have to maintain nearly 1,226,735,400. This is according to the last statistics supplied to Parliament by the Board of Trade.

Mr. MAUGER.—If the honorable member compares New South Wales with Victoria on that basis, where will New South Wales be?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am endeavouring to show that England is really going ahead, and will presently give figures showing trade, &c., per head of population as well as per square mile. We know that, as a matter of fact, Victoria is going back.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Chamberlain had better withdraw.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He will be made to withdraw. I do not say that my speech or any speech made in this Parliament will have any effect upon Mr. Chamberlain, and I dare say that even the speech of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro will have less effect upon him than that perhaps of any other member of the House. When the honorable member for Melbourne Ports speaks of comparing New South Wales and Victoria, I would ask him whether he will deny that in the value of goods manufactured and in process of manufacture there has been a decline of £2,412,000 for the last year.

Mr. MAUGER.—I do deny it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There we are, Coghlan is wrong again.

Mr. MAUGER.—No; Fenton is wrong.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They are all wrong if their statements do not suit the views of honorable members opposite. I would ask honorable members whether the figures dealing with the annual production of coal give any evidence that England is going down. According to the figures supplied by the Board of Trade during 1890-4 the average annual production in tons, per head of the population in England was, 3·79; in France, 4·3; in Germany, 7·9, and in the United States, 1·09. In 1895-99, the average annual production per head of population had risen in England to 5·07 tons, in France to 7·8 tons, Germany 1·69 tons, and in the United States to 2·57 tons. Let honorable members apply any test they like, and they will find that England is ahead. Is that any evidence of decay? Now, let us look at the wages paid to coal-miners, and it must be remembered that one of the arguments used by the Prime Minister at Maitland depended upon the question of wages. The right honorable gentleman told the coal-miners that if they went in for protection factories would be established in the State and more coal would be used. England, as we know, has an open door, and yet her consumption of coal is greater than that of France, the United States, or Germany.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Does the honorable member refer to export or internal consumption?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have referred to the average annual production, but I will give the figures of internal consumption presently. The wages paid to miners in England are 10d. per hour; in France, 4d.; in Germany, 4d.; and in the United States, 5d. Is there any evidence there that British workmen are worse off than those of other countries?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member connect this with the Governor-General's speech?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do. I do not know why I am asked the question. Reference has been made to the question of preferential treatment, and I am endeavouring to show that England has no need to go in for preferential treatment in the way suggested because she is prosperous now without it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There is nothing of that in the Governor-General's speech.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have already objected that the right honorable gentleman had not the courage to challenge us on the question. I should not have blamed him if he had not sent home a cablegram in which he speaks for the people of Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did not send it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman speaking as Prime Minister of Australia gave the information to the press agency.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—They asked my opinion, and I gave it, and I gave them another opinion yesterday.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I say that if the right honorable gentleman, as Prime Minister of Australia, speaks for Australia, he should be prepared to come down here, and take the responsibility of it. However, he does not speak for Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—He speaks for the majority.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Nor does he speak for the majority of the people of Australia.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member speaks for Great Britain.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I speak for Great Britain because I know that if the Union goes down, we go down with her.

I find according to the Board of Trade returns that the estimated consumption of coal per head of population in 1900 was, for the United Kingdom 4·08 tons, for France 1·19 tons, for Germany 1·77 tons, and for the United States 3·08 tons. Does that give any evidence of the decay of England? Now, let us take the production of pig iron, and let it be remembered that while we have here a Government prepared to give certain encouragement to the establishment of the iron industry, there is in England no protection and no bonus for that industry, which is in open competition with all. What is the position in this respect in England to-day. Taking the five years 1895-9, the average annual production of pig-iron per head of population was ·22 tons in the United Kingdom, ·06 tons in France, ·13 in Germany, and ·15 tons in the United States. Is that any evidence of the decay of England? Can any evidence of decay be found in the figures dealing with exports? But I find that the exports of domestic produce per square mile in the United Kingdom in 1900 were valued at £2,338; from France £804, from Germany £1,062, and from the United States £79. Per head of population the average value of exports for the years 1895-9 amounted to £5 19s. 5d. for the United Kingdom, £3 14s. 8d. for France, £3 7s. 3d. for Germany, and £2 18s. 4d. for the United States. There is in those figures no evidence of decay which calls upon us for a change in our whole fiscal policy. Then I take the average trade of the United Kingdom with Germany, and I find that during 1880-85 the imports of the United Kingdom per head of population amounted to 14s. 6d., and the exports to 10s. 3d., while during 1896 to 1900 the average for imports was 14s. 3d., while the average for exports was increased to 11s. 9d. That certainly shows no evidence of decay. If we take the totals, the figures are £3,700,000 and the total exports £5,500,000. Now, if we take the imports of merchandise in relation to the total we will find that in 1880 the percentage from France was 10·25, from Germany 5·92, and from the United States 26·04. In 1900 the percentage was the same from France, it was 5·96 from Germany, and 26·53 from the United States, showing a very little increase. In connexion with exports the figures for 1880 were, for France 6·99 and for 1900 6·97, for Germany for 1880 7·60 and for 1900 9·34, and for the United States for 1880 13·83. I have not the figures for 1900. If we take the figures relating to shipping we find that in the United States of 92½ per cent. engaged in foreign trade 7 per cent. of the trade was carried in American vessels and 85½ per cent. in British vessels. This has been so strongly brought under the notice of the American authorities that they have instituted an inquiry to discover whether their position cannot in some way be improved. If we take the figures affecting exports of domestic produce we shall find that the exports of the United Kingdom for the five years 1895-1900 gave an average value of £226,000,000, for France £135,000,000, and for Germany £166,000,000. In 1900 our British exports increased to £283,000,000, or an increase of £57,000,000. In France the increase was £29,000,000, and in Germany the increase was from £166,000,000 to £222,000,000. Let us take another test in the number of unemployed in all trades covered by the returns of the trades unions, and we find that while during 1892 to 1894 the number was 7 per cent. in 1899, in 1901 the number had been reduced to 3 per cent. In the engineering and metal trades the number of unemployed in the years 1892 to 1894 was 8½ per cent., and in 1899 it was only 3 per cent. These figures do not show any evidence of decay. If six of the great Powers were called upon to maintain the same population per square mile as Great Britain, with her 120,000 square miles, we should find that instead of maintaining 390,000,000 people, as they do at present, they should maintain 4,400,000,000.

Mr. MAUGER.—Will the honorable member apply that reasoning to New South Wales and Victoria?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think I have been fair with honorable members in giving these figures of population, wealth, trade, and the consumption of coal; and while I give the figures for free-trade England I give the figures for the other side as well. I only ask that honorable members opposite should do the same in regard to Victoria. The Secretary to the Board of Trade, in commenting upon those figures, says—

Whatever these figures show, it is clear that they do not show that there has been any material displacement of home manufactures in our markets by Germany.

Mr. MAUGER.—In what year was that written?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The document from which I am quoting was laid upon the table of the House of Commons in 1902, and no later figures are obtainable. Those statements show that there is no evidence of the decadence of British trade.

Mr. MAUGER.—Surely the British Government do not say that England is decaying.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No, but they are trying to reverse the policy which British statesmen have followed with remarkable success for the last 50 years. We are told that France and Germany are getting our trade; but there is not a workman's paradise in either of those countries. I have a return here which shows that in 33 German towns, each with a population of about 100,000, the highest wages paid in 1901 were 19s. 3d. and the lowest 13s. 9d. a week. In France, in the summer of 1882, men got 2s. 6d. a day, and in the summer of 1892, 2s. 4½d., while the wage paid to women was 1s. 9½d. and 1s. 7½d. in the two periods respectively. In Belgium, in 1874, men were receiving 1s. 7½d., and in 1895 1s. 7d. a day, and women 11½d. and 11½d., a decrease in each case. It must be remembered, too, that in those countries people ordinarily work not eight, but ten, twelve, and thirteen hours a day. Sir Robert Giffen, a well-known writer of financial essays, pointed out that in Great Britain during the last 50 years the wages of carpenters have increased 43 per cent., of bricklayers and masons 30 per cent., of pattern weavers 55 per cent., of weavers 115 per cent., of spinners 160 per cent., and of miners 50 per cent. When under protection wheat was 94s. a quarter, the farmers used to pay their labourers 7s. a week. In 1878 wheat was 46s. a quarter, and they paid 15s. a week, while in 1886 they paid 15s., though the price of wheat was then only 30s. a quarter. The working class representatives in the House of Commons are unanimously opposed to any reversal of the fiscal policy of the country. They know that wages are higher, hours of labour shorter, and conditions of employment better in free-trade England than in any protected country. I find from another return that in 1887 the weekly increase in wages was £45,000, in 1898 £95,000, and in 1899 £114,000. The total increase for 1889 was £6,000,000, and for the first eight months of 1900 £150,000 a week, or a total of about £8,000,000. On page 52 of the document from which I have quoted there is a return called table G, which shows the average annual value of the importations into England from Germany in the periods 1880-1884, 1891-1895, and 1896-1900. In dealing with this return I shall take no notice of the importation of sugar. We all know that sugar is not produced in the United Kingdom, but her importation of that commodity is very large, amounting, I believe, to over £9,000,000. If the Germans like to pay bounties to produce beet sugar cheaply for the advantage of the people of England, I am sure the English workers have no cause to complain. Comparing the periods 1880-1884 and 1896-1900, the increase of importations into the United Kingdom from Germany, deducting sugar, is £353,333, not much more than £400,000. Is there in those figures any evidence that the productions of German workmen are displacing in the English markets the productions of British workmen? The Board of Trade report says—

Our exports consist more largely of manufactured goods in proportion to our whole exports than do those of France and the United States, but we are run very close by Germany in this respect. Nevertheless, measuring per head of the population, we are far ahead of Germany or any other of our competitors.

The importations into Great Britain consist largely of raw material which comes from America, Germany, the colonies, and other countries, to be made up by British workmen, and re-exported very largely to the countries of original production. For example, the United Kingdom imports immense quantities of cotton from the United States, and, under free-trade, manufactures 66 per cent. of the cotton goods used in the world. That is done under free-trade, and by workers who are paid better wages than are received in protectionist countries.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Are the wages paid in Great Britain better than those paid in the United States?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—On that subject I should like to quote the opinion of Mr. Hoskins, a well-known manufacturer of iron, who, in New South Wales, prospered under free-trade. When, in 1900, a contract was opened for the supply of cast-iron pipes for the Geelong waterworks, he was ready to land the pipes required at Geelong, if the duty were remitted, for £26,000, but the Otis Company, a Melbourne firm, wanted £32,000. As the Government of the day would not remit the duty, the Melbourne tender was accepted, so that the Geelong people are now paying interest upon £6,000 more capital than would have been expended if the tender of the free-trade manufacturer had been accepted. In 1901, after a visit to America, Mr. Hoskins, speaking about the conditions of labour there, was reported to have said that in some of the large steel works, and notably in Carnegie's, men were called upon to work for eleven hours a day, and for thirteen hours on the night shifts. American employers take more out of their men in many ways than do employers here. Generally ten hours is a working day, but in the Homestead Works the hours were eleven in the day-time, and thirteen at night, and the majority of employes were not Americans but Russians. Returning to the subject of the importation of raw materials into England, I may point out that materials for textile manufactures were imported to the extent of £77,347,363, for sundry industries to the value of £65,079,691, and that the imports of metals represented a value of £33,195,391, the total being over £175,000,000. Of manufactured goods, England imported only £93,225,005 worth. Now, looking at the other side we find that the manufactured goods worked up by British workmen—paid at higher wages than continental employes, and working for a smaller number of hours per day—and exported from England, represented a value of £234,789,389. Thus England exported manufactured articles to the value of £141,000,000 in excess of her total imports of manufactured goods. That does not tend to show that England's manufactures are being displaced by any of her competitors. These figures are taken from the official returns of the Board of Trade, and the position in regard to Germany is summed up as follows:—

In the period under review there was an increase in our imports from Germany to the extent of 3·7 million pounds. There has been some decrease in the imports of agricultural produce from Germany, balanced by an increase in the imports of sugar, and some slight increases in the imports of cotton, woollen, glass, and iron manufactures, none of which, however, are imported to any great extent. On the other hand, our exports to Germany increased by £5,500,000, or over 30 per cent. This increase was largely due to one special article, coal; but, woollen yarns, cotton manufactures, iron and steel manufactures and machinery also contributed their share. Whatever these figures show, it is clear that they do not show that there has been any material displacement of home manufactures in our home markets by Germany.

I think that this supplies the best evidence that could be produced as to the progress made by England under free-trade. I had not intended to speak at such length, but the interruptions of my honorable friends opposite have shown the necessity for affording them a little enlightenment. They evidently do not read the latest reports, or do not properly digest the facts contained in them. I have quoted from the reports of the Board of Trade, and I now wish to read an extract from a statement by Armitage Smith, who in his Fifty Years of Free-trade says :—

Statistics of wages and prices show that with easier work and shorter hours a labourer gets now about 65 per cent., factory operatives 75 per cent., and a skilled mechanic 90 per cent. of necessities than he did 50 years ago. Sir R. Giffen has stated that nearly the whole of the economic advantage of the last 50 years has gone to the working classes, that is, their position has not only changed absolutely as regards the comforts of life, but relatively as regards other classes in their share of the general prosperity. While the capital has increased, the income from capital has not increased in proportion. The increase of earnings goes exclusively, or almost exclusively, to the working classes. What has happened to the working classes in the last 50 years is not so much what may be called an improvement as a revolution of the most remarkable description.

The condition of the British Empire is so satisfactory to-day, and the progress she has made during the last 50 years has been so marvellous, that it is extraordinary to find a man like Mr. Joseph Chamberlain contemplating such a leap in the dark as has been indicated by recent cables. England now enjoys a position among the nations such as has never been achieved by any great power, search the annals of history as we may. Taking her population per square mile, I have pointed out that if the six great Powers are to maintain a similar proportion of people to area, they must sustain 4,400,000,000 instead of the 390,000,000 they have now. England under a free-trade policy has controlled over one-quarter of the surface of the globe; her population to-day represents one-quarter of the whole population of the earth, and her surplus wealth is sufficient to pay the national debts of all the nations twice over, and leave a substantial balance.

The policy of free-trade, which has done so much for England, and has produced such marvellous results, is one that we should seek to engraft upon the Constitution of Australia. We should endeavour to avoid the adoption of a protectionist policy, and we should not for one moment agree to sink the fiscal question, as has been advised by the Prime Minister. The Melbourne Age has supported the Government view that we ought not to raise the fiscal issue at the next elections. We are told that we should defer the revival of that question until after the close of the next Parliament, by which time the protectionists hope that they may obtain a still larger majority than they now possess in this House by the same objectionable tactics as were adopted at the last election. The advantage which the protectionists now enjoy in this chamber is not very great. We have 35 free-traders here as against 40 protectionists, including the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh, who was returned as a free-trader, but has voted as a protectionist. When I was in Tasmania I was told that "free-trade" was one of the most prominent features in the placards on the cabs which conveyed the honorable member's supporters to the poll. Notwithstanding the honorable member's apostasy, the protectionists have a majority of only five in this House, whilst the free-traders have a majority in the Senate. The Government majority in this chamber was obtained under very questionable circumstances, and I venture to say that upon the fiscal question, this House does not represent the views of the people of Australia. We shall not, therefore, follow the advice of our enemy, the Melbourne Age. I warn free-traders that, although the present Tariff is not one of which they can approve, they have been saved by the exertions of the free-trade party from much more calamitous results. Instead of having revenue duties upon some articles and protectionist duties upon others, they would have had to submit to all round high protective duties, and if the Government secure a large majority at the next elections, there is a strong probability that an effort will be made to still further increase the burdens of the people. The Government have crippled the great mining, agricultural and pastoral industries of Australia, which cannot derive any benefit from a protectionist policy. They have ignored the example of New Zealand, which admits agricultural and mining machinery free of duty, and they have condemned our agriculturists, miners, and pastoralists, who are obliged to seek markets for their produce in competition with the whole world, to bear heavy taxation upon all the necessities of life, and upon all the implements used in carrying on their several industries. As against this, we find that the Victorian manufacturers who have enjoyed the benefits of protection for the last 35 years, and are still unable to stand alone, are allowed to obtain their machinery free of any impost. Our staple industries have not received fair treatment, and I feel convinced that when the time arrives for the people to express their opinions regarding the action of the Government, they will return a substantial majority of honorable members who favour a free-trade policy.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I had hoped to hear some speech from the Government side before being called upon to address the House this evening. It is remarkable that the Government should have been willing to allow the debate to close, as it certainly would have done if I had not risen at this time, without some reply by the Minister for Trade and Customs, to the very severe criticisms which have been passed upon his administration. We have had speeches from the leader of the Opposition, the honorable member for North Sydney, and others, containing very serious charges against the administration of Ministers, and especially against that of the Minister for Trade and Customs. In regard to some of these charges, Ministerial action should have been taken to offer an explanation the moment they were uttered. I know that in many respects a Government has to be thick-skinned; but, if charges concerning the administration of justice and of the great departments of the State largely affecting the industrial life of the country are made in Parliament, they should be the subject of immediate inquiry, and honorable members should, at the very earliest opportunity, be placed in possession of the actual facts. No Government, however large its majority may be, does itself any good by stolidly ignoring the questions and asseverations of a minority. Having passed through a very anxious session, in which the great work of the Commonwealth was completed—I refer to the framing of the Tariff—it might naturally have been thought that during the present session, in which to a large extent our attention will be focussed upon what may be called non-contentious subjects, it would not be necessary for honorable members to deal exhaustively either with legislative or administrative matters. But, on the other hand, I cannot forget that this is probably the last occasion in connexion with a debate of this kind in which honorable members will have an opportunity, prior to the general election, of criticising the administration of the Government. If I may be permitted to say so, I do not think that I can be regarded as an unfair man. During the whole of my political career, as the Prime Minister knows, I have been anxious to accord fair play even to my opponents. In the first Administration of the Commonwealth, I recognise that even if the Government had been composed of angels from heaven friction would have been inevitable. Difficulties were bound to arise, and under any circumstances many were sure to be greatly dissatisfied. But after making all allowances for these considerations, I feel very strongly as a federalist, who is as ardent, pure, and, I hope, as patriotic in my aims as is the Prime Minister, that the first two years of the Commonwealth Administration have been disastrous to the tone, the character, and the sentiment of federation itself. I feel that there is a great deal of justice in the chagrin and disappointment which are felt by people in all parts of Australia concerning the first two years of the administration of the Commonwealth Government. It was perhaps unfortunate that in forming his administration the Prime Minister had to choose—naturally, I suppose—men who had taken a leading part in the political life of the different States, and that offices had to be allocated to them without any regard being paid to their previous training or capacity to fill those offices. It is a curious circumstance in connexion with human affairs that sometimes one error—one small accident as we might call it—alters the whole tenor and character of a period of history. I have no desire to be personal, but I say that if you, sir, could have been placed in the position of Minister for Trade and Customs, and if the right honorable gentleman who now fills that office could have been elevated to your chair, the whole history of the administration of the Government during the past two years would have been changed. I do not hesitate to say that if the Minister, who is undeniably possessed of very great abilities and talent, but who is utterly unfitted by character and experience for his present office, had not been placed in that position, and if the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister at Maitland had been carried out in the faith and integrity of its evident meaning, I should not have had to rise to censure the Government for having broken its pledges and exhibited to the Commonwealth a series of administrative blunders which have brought contempt upon it in all parts of the world. We have, unfortunately, a Cabinet of lawyers. No man has a greater respect than I have for the legal individual who devotes his life to what is probably one of the highest professions in the country ; but I do think that in many respects a legal experience is not the best training for the broad administration of business affairs. It seems to me that the Minister for Trade and Customs has made two mistakes which have been fatal to his administration. In the first place, he does not seem to know the difference between administration and adjudication. In dealing with his department he has imagined himself to be upon the Supreme Court or the magisterial bench. Now, all Governments—not merely Governments such as those in Australia which undertake the control of a great many business enterprises, as, for instance, the management of the railways—must possess departments of a purely business character. In itself the Customs department is a great business department. Let us look at the history of the legislation connected with it. This Parliament enacted a law which conferred upon the Minister the most stringent possible powers for the prevention of fraud. The Minister gave us his sacred promise—a promise which was repeated elsewhere—that a certain provision which we inserted to show that the highest would be punished equally with the poorest would not be put into effect unless a prima facie case of fraud had been made out. Again, when some prosecutions took place in Sydney, the leader of the Opposition put substantially the following question to the Minister:—“Does the Minister acknowledge that in every case, even where it is clear that no fraud has been attempted, but an error has been made, he is bound to prosecute?” In reply the right honorable gentleman said

—“I do not say anything of the kind. I hold that I am not bound to prosecute unless I see that fraud has been attempted.”

Mr. KINGSTON.—I have never said anything of the sort at any time.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Then I ask the Minister if, because we inserted in the Customs Act a provision which gave him power to call a clerical error a fraud, he has resolved to send the most trivial cases of error into the police court. Is that the administration of the right honorable gentleman ?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The administration is that if an importer truthfully declares the nature of the goods and their value, and produces the proper invoice, he will not be prosecuted.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is only recent administration.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I beg the honorable member's pardon. It has been the administration for nine months.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — The Minister has said that he is anxious, if every possible information is given to the department by the importer, that no prosecution shall take place. But let me remind honorable members of some of the facts connected with his administration. In New South Wales it used to be the practice for merchants and importers to do all in their power to assist the Customs department. When any doubt was entertained regarding an entry, the custom was to consult the officer of the department and for that officer, together with the individual interested to decide what was the correct duty. The Minister for Trade and Customs heard of this arrangement, which, to any man imbued with business principles, would seem fair and straightforward. But he immediately said—“We will do nothing of the kind. You must make your entry, and if any error be found in it you will be prosecuted.” In other words, the Minister laid a trap for the importers. What was the reason for this prosecution ? This was the reason : the Minister, when he began his administration was imbued with the idea that nine-tenths of the importers of Australia were rogues. Otherwise there is no sense in his administration. Yet for many years Customs administration in these States had proceeded smoothly enough. The very provision which is contained in the Commonwealth Customs Act was embedded in the Act of Victoria. Wherever did we hear of such prosecutions and persecutions as have taken place under the Commonwealth Act? It is all very well for the Minister to put on a courageous front? It is very easy for him to use the money of this country to prosecute and persecute small struggling traders, but it is an act of absolute cowardice for him with the machinery of Government at his back, and with the whole of the revenue at his command, upon discovering a pure error, involving perhaps 10s. or 12s., on the part of firms which for 30 or 40 years have held unblemished records, to haul them before the police court and to brand them as criminals for the remainder of their lives. Either it is childish administration or the right honorable gentleman has some object in view. What has been the result of his administration? Only a few days ago on my way from England, I saw in one of the newspapers a declaration by him that his experience led him to believe that the huge majority of the merchants were perfectly honest. Even if he did make some mistake in the early part of his administration, when once he found he had been befooled, as I believe he was befooled, he ought to have had the candour and courage to go back in his steps. He ought to have said, "The majority of these men are honest, and I want to get them on my side; I, by my administration, will call on these men as honest traders, as other Treasurers and other Collectors of Customs have done, to help me in the administration of the Customs department." But what did the Minister do? Befooled at the beginning, he steadfastly, with that pig-headed obstinacy which is his characteristic, went on his course simply because he had begun it, and, at a time when he knew the great majority of commercial men were perfectly honest, he did everything in his power to set them against himself and his administration. I call that childish. This honorable gentleman has seen other departments administered. We have, in this Ministry of all the talents, men who, like the Minister for Home Affairs, have probably each of them in the course of his public career administered three departments of State. The Treasurer, who never would be guilty of such absurdities as I have indicated, and the other Ministers of the Crown who form this Government, have personally administered the Mines, the Lands, and other departments of State. Will anybody tell me that any business in this world could stand the treatment to which this unfortunate Customs department has been submitted by the Minister? But I go further, and ask every member of this Ministry on his honour to tell me whether he has not dissented from the administration of his colleague. I defy any Minister to-day to tell me that he has not so dissented. And this is what is called responsible government. One Minister out of nine defies the other eight, and also defies the public opinion of the country. I say it is a farce of Government. There is no other Minister on the Treasury benches who would have acted like the Minister for Trade and Customs. I do not know what his purpose is, or what he is aiming at. It is well enough for him to lie by when these charges are made, but I say the country must call him to account. If we are a democracy we must have no class legislation. Yet, in this first Commonwealth Government, within two years, we have a gentleman who knew nothing about trade and commerce—who was simply the square peg put into the round hole owing to exigencies of the formation of a Government—but who takes it on himself to be the guardian of the morality of the people. I tell him that there are firms whom he has prosecuted and persecuted for 2s. or 3s., but who can stand this prosecution and persecution, and whose honour is equal to that of himself and of his colleagues. I am not a lawyer, but I have always understood that it is the intention which constitutes the crime. I have to speak to-night without notes, but I can cite from memory, on the authority of the public prints, the case of Messrs. Sargood and Co. A certain gentleman from the Customs department went to the Police Court and said: "Mr. Magistrate, this is a case of error; there is no fraud; there is practically no stain on the character of these people, but I press for a conviction." The result was the imposition of a penalty of £5, with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment. Supposing the representative of the firm, in the face of that expression of opinion on the part of the prosecuting officer, had gone to gaol, as many men would do in order to assert a principle and show the absurdity of such administration, would there not have been a cry throughout the length and breadth of the country? One of the most respectable men in Sydney wrote to the Minister a letter, a copy of which I had the opportunity of seeing. This took place at one of the earlier stages of the persecution ; and in that letter the merchant pointed out that he had an unsullied record of 20 or 30 years in the capital of the mother State. I know that man well ; and in his case a mistake was made in connexion with an Inter-State certificate—a mistake which arose in consequence of the clumsy way in which the law was framed. It was one of those mistakes in connexion with which the administration ought to have saved a man from persecution. It was a case in which, I think, certain boxes of butter were imported from New Zealand, and these were mixed up with other boxes. These details, however, do not matter in an illustration of the kind. The duty had been paid, and no question was raised on that score—there was no question whatever of any benefit accruing to this man. But through the error of his clerk—an error which probably arose because the boxes were not definitely marked—the consignment was sent on to Queensland as, I believe, New South Wales butter ; at any rate, it was a matter arising out of an Inter-State certificate. This man, although he wrote to the Minister, had to present himself at ten o'clock in the morning at the Criminal Court, and, to use his own expression, had to "mingle with the drunks of the day." He was kept at the court till about four o'clock in the afternoon before his case came on ; and this was a man who had probably never before in his life been in a criminal court. Surely that is a position in which even the most extreme radical or labour member, or anybody else, would not like to see a decent honest citizen. I quite agree that there must be very stringent regulations, and I realize that a man with fraudulent intent might continually plead clerical errors. But let me give another case. People are not generally assumed to be fraudulent when there is overwhelming proof that they are honest. This is the case of a large firm ; and, in the first place, any person who conceived the opinion that the firm was fraudulent would have to imagine that the principal, who represents probably some £300,000 or £400,000 of invested capital—the principal of a firm the honour of which is at stake, and which deals in large transactions—went to his shipping clerk, whose salary was probably £200 a year, and said—"Look here, we want you to put in fraudulent entries." In other words, it has to be imagined that a firm of this stamp would place itself at the mercy of a shipping clerk in receipt of a salary of £200 a year. On the face of it, such a supposition is childish and absurd. No man with a mind capable of grasping anything beyond the narrow technicalities of a narrow profession would ever think such a thing. I will take the case of one such firm, which had paid £27,000 in duty to the Government of Australia without a single hitch. This firm in the whole of its career never had a charge of any kind brought against it ; but in an invoice there was made what on the face of it was an error. I shall describe what I mean, and, without really mentioning the particular firm, give an analogous case. If a person imports nails in packets marked as containing nails, and exhibits an invoice, and the shipping clerk, by one of those mysterious mistakes of which all men are capable, in the entry describes the consignment as screws, that on the face of it would to all reasonable men be an error. No prima facie case of fraud could be imagined under such circumstances, except by a lunatic. Against the firm which I have in my mind there had never before been a word of suspicion, and although they had previously paid from £25,000 to £27,000 in duty, they were brought up before a police court to answer a charge involving about 25s., and were met with the alternative of a fine of £5 or fourteen days in gaol. What is all this wonderful talk about the saving of the revenue ? I believe it to be an absolute fabrication. There has been such a reign of terror exercised in the Customs department that the officers are becoming mere hirelings. There are things done in the Customs department in Sydney that would never be done except under a system of terrorism and tyranny. I do not know why the Minister for Trade and Customs pooh-poohed a statement made to-night by an honorable member that "conscience money" had been paid in a case where an importer had found he had made a mistake in his statements to the department. But there is no doubt that, such is the terror of re-opening a question of the kind, merchants refrain from openly admitting that errors have been made. I tell the Minister for Trade and Customs that at the present time there are delicate questions with regard to the payment of duty ~~excessing~~ the minds of certain people in Sydney; and there is a terror, no matter what may be said by Customs officers, that by some insidious means the very candour and honesty of the merchants involved may be taken advantage of, and that there may be a retrospective investigation. Up to the present moment these merchants—and they have taken advice from me—absolutely do not know what to do. I always understood, from the first time I became acquainted with political economy, that one of its axioms is that taxation, although it may happen to be burdensome, ought, in its collection, and in the administration of the law, to be as pleasant and as free from friction as possible. Men ought to know what they are going to be taxed. They ought to know what the law is; but instead of this, there is such a system in the Customs department that men are afraid to be even candid in their expressions to officers. I want to know whether this state of things is to go on. I want to know whether this great Commonwealth Government, which was to be broader, freer, more liberal and magnanimous than any mere provincial or State Government, is going to say that because men have money, or belong to the capitalistic class—that because men belong to the class which has made England, and made possible the introduction of Englishmen into these States—it is better to persecute them, and thus play to the gallery. Then, again, I want to know whether this House is going to be true to itself. This House passed the Customs Act on the sacred understanding from the Ministers of the Crown that the particular provision to which I have referred, would in practical administration be used only as a weapon against fraud. Are members on that side of the House so biassed by party feeling, or are members of the Government so frightened or so loyal to their colleague, that, although they know the administration has been wrong, no steps are to be taken to alter the present state of affairs? When we find this provision, which was to be exercised only in cases of fraud, taken advantage of by the Minister to persecute a great section of the community for his own purposes—whatever those purposes may be—I want to know whether Parliament is going to be true to itself and say to the Minister—“We gave you this provision, because we thought you were going to treat the community as an honorable administrator; but now that we find there a desire to please certain sections of the community at the expense of others, we will take this weapon out of your hands, fully determined that this Act shall be reformed.” That is the question which we have to face. I feel that in many ways we have not very much to boast of in our legislation or our administration. I feel that instead of taking a broader view, not merely in legislation, but also in administration, we have been narrow, provincial, suspicious. We have not risen to the national standard which might have been expected to be reached, and what is the result? Ardent federalists at one time thought that by good government, by the best men of the community being attracted to this Parliament, a higher standard of public life would be attained, and that a greater confidence in administration would permeate the community than prevailed in the smaller communities. The federalists of a few years ago thought that bit by bit, through the provisions of the Constitution, certain services and certain powers of a national character would be handed over by the States to the Commonwealth Parliament. But that all depended on the first few years of our administration. What is the ghastly result of the past two years? I venture to say that if you were to ask the States to-morrow to transfer any great service like that of the railways to the Commonwealth, they would scout the proposal. They would say—“What! give over the administration of our railways to men who have shown such ignorance and imbecility both in the Post-office and in the Custom-house; do you think that we are mad?” No, sir; it will take many years of wise administration by future Governments before the effects of the narrow-mindedness and the inefficiency of the administration of the present Government are wiped out. I am sorry that I have not brought my notes. I wish now to call the attention of the House for a few minutes to a question which—although I understand from the Governor-General’s speech it is not to come practically before us during the present session—has been brought into such great prominence during the last few days that I think it is necessary that any honorable member who has made a study of it should state his views clearly and unmistakably. I mean tion of giving preferential rates to the United Kingdom. I believe that honorable members are not quite of the whole importance of this subject. I know well enough that in talking to certain sections of protectionists I am talking to deaf ears. On the other hand, I wish honorable members to understand that this is a question on which both protectionists and protectionists might stand or to shounder. In the first place, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that any preference by the colonies to the mother country must mean, if it has any sense in it at all, some preference to the mother country to the colonies. I made that statement in a speech which I made in London before Mr. Chamberlain's latest manifesto. But that is the question of England's fiscal policy. It may be said that we have nothing to do with her fiscal policy; that we cannot give a preference to her from a selfish motive. But if it is clear that the question of preferential trade must lead to the abandonment of England's fiscal policy, then we are very largely interested in anything which affects the mother country. I can quite imagine many protectionists saying, quite candidly, "Although we are in protection for Australia, we believe in protection for the mother country." Many persons will say that, but to ask, what is the object of this preference Mr. Chamberlain? The object is to tie the Empire by closer bonds than have ever been known before. I take it there is a further reason, and it is to make the Empire stronger as a whole by union and by these bonds. The British Empire is composed of about 40,000,000 people in the United Kingdom, and, say, 10,000,000 white persons outside its shores. Its policy involves a renunciation of the world's free trade, and if such renunciation strikes a vital blow at her commercial policy, where is the benefit of the union? I take it that we desire to continue union with the mother country, to draw year by year those bonds closer, because she is the great centre of power and influence which the whole Empire hangs. Look at the question in the most desultory way, it is likely that such countries as England and Scotland, which are really the great centres of our activities, and which do a business of £100,000 or £200,000,000 in export and imports will do anything to offend customers numbering 300,000,000 or 400,000,000 of civilized people for the sake of conveniencing 12,000,000 persons in their own territory! The idea is absurd. There is absolutely no basis for what is called a Zollverein. But, again, there is a much higher aspect of this question than even that which appears on the surface. Up to the present time the safeguard of England and the safeguard of the Empire has been the free untrammelled operation, politically and commercially, of the different parts. Canada has gone its own course, and it has obtained its own systems of responsible and local government. Australia, by a gradual evolution—nobody having blundered on the other side—has bit by bit got rid of almost every prerogative of the Crown except the links which bind us to the mother country in the persons of the Governor-General of the Commonwealth and the Governors of the States, and in the right of appeal to the Privy Council in London. Lately we have been bound more closely together as comrades in arms on the fields of South Africa. We are bound by religious ties. We are bound by this fact, that Australia is the purest British possession in the world. With the exception of a few aliens our people are entirely British, and we are as free as any nation in the world can be, with simply an Imperial link in which Imperial interests, being our interests, too, have to be studied as well as our local interests. What is this the first step towards? It is the first step towards a mechanical arrangement which, if it is once begun, can never be retraced, and also a mechanical movement in trade and commerce. What is the destiny of this country? Its destiny is to trade with all the world. We grow a peculiar kind of wool which every nation buys. We have meat, wheat, and cattle to sell, and we are placed in the centre of the Pacific, with congested populations in the Eastern world. I never there was a country which by nature and geographical position was intended to be free from commercial shackles of that kind, it is the island-continent of Australia. It must be recollected, as I said before, that if this course is once pursued, we may never be able to retract our steps, and, instead of qualifying the Empire, instead of drawing the bonds of union closer, we may be creating a source of irritation which in the future may be too great to bear. I quite agree with Mr. Chamberlain that everything goes not consist in cheapness. I quite agree with Mr. Chamberlain and others that sentiment is a magnificent force. I hope that the day will never come when, in great national crises we may not be ready to venture all for the sake of our common country. But that is high pressure. That is not the every day business of life. No political union can go on unless it is based not merely upon sentiment but upon the mutuality of material interests. Any arrangement which in the future might seem to be detrimental to the real trading, commercial, and other interests of this country from which it seems impossible to recede, might, by the operation of the very system, by the irritation which it engendered, sow seeds of dissolution which would prevent the ultimate union of the British Empire. For years we have been trading directly with all parts of the world. Instead of our foreign trade being done through London it is done directly by men who have come here from Germany, Austria, France, and America to buy wool and other products, and that trade has been increasing by leaps and bounds. We do another trade not merely with the United Kingdom, but with the British possessions. Can any sensible man conceive of any system of preferential rates which will be satisfactory to all parts of the Empire? Knowing how different are the conditions of countries like Canada, South Africa, and Australia, can he conceive of any blending of interests to such an extent that we can have any harmonious system which will work smoothly everywhere? It is all well enough for Canada to take this view. It wishes to be the granary for Great Britain. It wishes Great Britain to be protectionist, and it was the first promulgator of preferential duties. Most distinctly we are bound up with the interests of the mother country, and in looking at the question of preferential trade we must consider the effect on the mother country. As a free-trader, as well as for other reasons, I look upon any proposal at the present time to disturb that fiscal system which has made Great Britain the mistress of commerce throughout the world, which has given to her these colonies, and made it possible for us to exist, as an invitation to commit suicide. I cordially indorse the action taken by the Prime Minister in London with regard to the naval subsidy. Unlike some of my legal friends, I do not want to split hairs on the question of representation and matters of that kind. I desire a plain, business-like transaction, and if ever there was a bargain struck in the world, that bargain by which, for £200,000 a year, we gain the security of the British Navy is one of the greatest. We continually hear it said that Great Britain must defend her own shipping. But is there no colonial shipping? One of the greatest enterprises that we have is that of the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand. We have also Howard Smith and Sons' fleet; we have the Adelaide Steamship Company, the Australian United Steam Navigation Company, and a large number of others. It would probably cost over £1,000,000 a year to protect even our own waters. When we take the interest on expenditure, as well as the absolute destruction of obsolete warships, and other points into consideration, we must see that the bargain we have made shows us to be almost as cut-minded a people as are our cousins of the United States of America. As for the future, as sensible men we can leave that alone; what is to be done twenty years hence need not bother honorable members of my age, and I think the Government are to be commended in proposing to put their stamp upon this arrangement. I also feel that in this short session we should not do more than is absolutely necessary to complete that part of the Commonwealth structure which will render justice to all our people, and make the different requisite services run smoothly. There is a great difference between the laws we have to pass that are practically similar to other laws in the different States to which we have been accustomed, and laws like those pertaining to the Inter-State Commission, which relate to the different States in their Inter-State relations. As a body we can have very little knowledge of those at present, and a postponement will enable us to mature our views in regard to them. My own opinion is that if we pass the great Judicature Bill, which will establish a High Court for Australia; if we complete the defence arrangements under the auspices of my right honorable friend the Minister for Defence; and pass a Bill for the appointment of a High Commissioner, so that we shall have proper representation in the United Kingdom, those three measures will probably be quite sufficient for this session. In view of our position as a Commonwealth Legislature, we ought to be careful that all our Acts are as complete as possible. The measures I have named will have to go through both Houses, and if we pass them during the present session I think we shall do as much as is necessary. Compulsory arbitration is one of those matters which I think can very well be put aside. I am aware of the ardour with which the Minister for Trade and Customs for several years has carried out schemes, or dealt with proposed schemes of the kind, but it seems to me that we must class this legislation merely as experimental. We have now an Arbitration and Conciliation Act in operation in New Zealand, while one has recently been passed in New South Wales, and these should be object lessons to us as to the operation of this principle. It would be well for us to pause before we commit ourselves to any piece of legislation which is not urgently required, and on which we shall have far more information by the time that the next Parliament meets. Every one is anxious to stop industrial strife, but in attempting great social changes and great remedial measures we must be very careful that we do not forget those basic principles of liberty to which we owe everything. I do not know how people view the operation of the Act in New South Wales—I do not know how it is going to operate—but I do not like some of the arrangements which have been made. They seem to me to be absolutely a blow at the ordinary principles of human liberty. It is a very serious thing to place the whole industrial life of a community in the hands of one man. At the present time a very able man sits in the arbitration court of New South Wales, and practically adjudicates. He has two assessors sitting with him, but he is practically the dominant spirit. That man has in his hands practically the control of the whole industrial life of New South Wales, for except in a matter of law, there is no appeal from the decision of the court. It may be necessary, it may work well, but it is a fearfully drastic experiment. It certainly does not fit in with the beliefs which have made up the framework of British character and British liberty. At the same time I am no mere clinger to what are called principles if it can be shown that by certain experimental legislation, by certain bold schemes, we may ameliorate the lot of our fellow beings. I am quite willing to put aside any Shibboleth if I see that by doing so I shall help to raise the general condition of my country. But there is no necessity to hurry the passing of a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. It has been put forward to placate a certain section of this House, and I submit that if it is not necessary to deal with it now, if it is better as a matter of wisdom and of statesmanship to wait and see how the principle operates, no pressure of any party ought to influence an independent and courageous Ministry. As regards the capital site, I hope that something definite will be done this session. I feel very strongly that the 100-mile limit—a question which I suppose cannot be opened now—is a very serious detriment to the future settlement of this question. I believe that one of the best sites in New South Wales would be a place a little within the 100-mile limit of Sydney, and that it has all the conditions of water supply and all the conditions of hygiene necessary for such a purpose. I presume that nothing can be done in that direction; but it is a matter which ought not to be forgotten in determining this question. I do not think that it should be delayed; but it seems to me that the unfortunate provision in regard to the 100-mile limit is liable to deprive, not New South Wales or the people of New South Wales, but the people of the Commonwealth as a whole, of a site which, while not in any way interfering with the capital of New South Wales, while in spirit carrying out the provision inserted in the Constitution, would have been at the same time acceptable in every way to the majority of honorable members. I observe that the Governor-General's speech refers to the proposed construction of a railway line between Western Australia and South Australia. With all due deference to those who may have expressed their views, that is a matter on which I do not think any honorable member—at any rate from the States not directly interested—should express a definite opinion unless he has a very peculiar personal knowledge of the subject. In my case I do not think I should express an opinion until I have before me the whole official knowledge that the Government can produce, upon which to form a judgment. I have no doubt in my own mind that the line proposed, or something similar to it, will ultimately come. I have no doubt that as the years go by we shall have for strategical purposes, and for purposes of communication, to make lines which may not be in the category of purely commercial railways; but I think that before many of these lines are completed the railways will have to be amalgamated. It is a very different thing to project a non-paying line simply supported by the Federal Government under the peculiar conditions of our finances, and to project a line on a system of railways which is paying well, and which may be able to stand the loss for national purposes. The question of the appointment of a High Commissioner is a very important one. The position occupied by the Commissioner will not be that of an agent whose duties are more or less of a trading character. The duties of the High Commissioner will be almost entirely of a diplomatic character. He will be the ambassador—if that expression can be used while the two countries are under the same Crown—between Australia and the mother land. But there is one thing which I think the High Commissioner for Australia and the High Commissioners of other parts of the Empire may do. They may be the means of solving the question connected with the future political union of the different parts of the Empire. The gentleman appointed to the position will, I presume, be retained in the office for several years. He will be in close communication with the Colonial-office, with the High Commissioner for South Africa when the colonies there are federated, and the High Commissioner for Canada; and I look to these High Commissioners as likely to form probably the nucleus of the colonial council which must precede any scheme of political union. There must be some mode by which the different parts of the Empire can confer. The proposal of which we have heard so much of late from Mr. Chamberlain is entirely before its time. It has been placed before the British public, and there has been no means of getting at the colonial opinion. I look to these High Commissioners, and to the conferences which may be held in future between representatives of different parts of the Empire, to pave the way for this political union, but I deprecate as I said before, any attempt for electioneering purposes, either here or at home, to force a question so full of great importance to the future destiny of the British Empire. Having expressed myself strongly with regard to the matter of Trade and Customs, I should like now to appeal to the Minister to reconsider the position he has taken up. I believe, and I know he believes, that the present state of affairs cannot go on indefinitely. I presume that the Minister for Trade and Customs is one who would like to see preferential rates established, and that he would like also to see the protective system introduced into England. I should like to ask the right honorable gentleman what would be the result in England under a protective system if one tithe of the trouble that we have had during the last eighteen months were experienced in that country? Why, there would be almost a rebellion in the country. That country is a great commercial country, and the people know that the £2,000,000,000 to which the right honorable member for East Sydney referred in his interview the other day, though perhaps he slightly exceeded the real amount, as being lent to other parts of the world by the British people, was earned from commerce, trade, and manufactures. I say that the inauguration of any system such as that which has been inaugurated in the Custom-house of this country, if it caused one-tenth of the irritation that has been experienced here during the last 18 months would put the people of old England into a state of rebellion. Such a thing would be absolutely impossible. I asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, at the end of last session, if he intended to alter the provision in the Act to which I have referred, because I did think that the right honorable gentleman felt that he was in a peculiar position in regard to it, that he thought he was bound to let things take their course, and let every case go to the courts, as the matter was not one purely of administration. The right honorable gentleman told me that he did not see any necessity to alter it.

Mr. KINGSTON.—If the honorable member has read the report of my last interview with the Sydney Chamber of Commerce, he will know that we arrived at the happiest conclusions.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I believe the right honorable gentleman had an interview with the Sydney Chamber of Commerce, and I believe further that with the fatality which appears to have followed the right honorable gentleman on various occasions, there is now a difference of opinion as to what he really said at that meeting. I am told that what he really did say was this—"If you show me your original invoices, I shall look after the matter of the payment of duty." The right honorable gentleman says now that he did not say that; but I can put two or three gentlemen on oath who will say that they asked him particularly — "Do you mean the entry?" and that he said—"No, I mean the original invoice." Now, the right honorable gentleman was right in what he did say, but he is wrong in his repudiation. The great struggle in connexion with customs cases in Victoria years ago, when I had some knowledge of it, was on the question of the original invoice. Certain firms passed what they called copies, or passed invoices coming from their own agencies in London, and not from the original manufacturers; but the Customs authorities were perfectly satisfied the moment the importer showed the original invoices. I may tell the Minister for Trade and Customs that as a result of the Customs authorities acting harmoniously with the merchants, those merchants who did show original invoices brought pressure to bear upon others. They formed themselves into a vigilance committee, by means of which they assisted the Customs authorities, and the result was that after a certain time original invoices had to be shown. That is the attitude which the right honorable gentleman ought to assume.

MR. KINGSTON.—Really the honorable member is barking up the wrong tree.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The right honorable gentleman now says, I presume, "Show me the entry." What sense is there in that? Is there any conciliation in that? "Show me the entry, and I will get you in a trap. I will not allow my officers to tell you whether the duty upon these goods will be 15 or 10 per cent. No. Make out the entry. If you are wrong, and I decline to give you advice, it is a fraud, and I shall have you before the police court."

MR. KINGSTON.—I think the honorable member must be mad to say what he is saying. We came to a very happy understanding in Sydney.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I hope for the sake of his original intelligence that the right honorable gentleman is mad. I shall now give the facts of a case that occurred in order to show the spirit in which the Act is administered. The Minister may say that this was done by an officer of the department, and that he cannot be held liable for whatever may be done by officers of the department in all portions of Australia; but I say that the right honorable gentleman has so permeated the officers in the department in every city of Australia with terror and fear, and has so brought them down almost to the position of State serfs, that they are practically frightened to do what is right. I can give proof of this case, and cases after all are better than mere declamation. A certain firm was not quite satisfied as to its interpretation of the Tariff in relation to certain goods imported in a case. They passed a sight entry, and the goods were opened. The Customs officers decided that certain lines were dutiable at certain rates. By that time the fear and want of confidence in everything connected with the department were so great that this firm's customs clerk said to the officer—"You put down opposite these lines in pencil what you say are the duties." The officer did so. Of course, this instance would not have come before the right honorable gentleman, but I am giving it to him as an instance of what has been going on. A short time afterwards a similar case arrived consigned to the same firm. They, of course, did not pass a sight entry, because they had the opinion of the Customs officer, and they put the goods through as usual. They were seized by the Custom-house officer, but he was confronted with his own decision, and if it had not been for that document with his own pencil-marks upon it, the firm would have been brought to the court and fined £5, with an alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment.

MR. KINGSTON.—But the honorable gentleman says that nothing at all was done to them.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Nothing was done, because nothing could be done. There was the proof of the officer's previous decision, and even the glaring injustice of the right honorable gentleman was not capable of doing anything to the firm in those circumstances. I have only one or two words more to say. The peculiar and glaring injustice of this administration in one of its phases arises out of these circumstances: We began the consideration of the Tariff about the 8th October, 1901, and the right honorable gentleman knows that it went through innumerable revisions in both Houses. If the whole community had been as intelligent as the Minister for Trade and

Customs, which of course they could not be expected to be, they could not possibly have known where they stood owing to the kaleidoscopic changes made to the Tariff. In the next place, the classification was bad in many cases, so bad that the right honorable gentleman knows that if we had taken the verdict of twelve men as to the class to which certain goods belonged, six men would give one opinion and six another. In all the circumstances, I ask whether this was not an occasion for fair and lenient consideration? Was it not a time for discretion in administration, rather than for the right honorable gentleman to call not merely an error a fraud, but to denounce as a fraud an error which was the result of our own operations and the general difference of opinion? What has been the result, even with the Minister himself? He has changed his opinion time after time. He has given different decisions, and with a meanness contemptible in a Minister of the Crown, in cases in which duties were paid, when it was thought the goods were dutiable, and in which the importers have appealed to have the amount returned, by taking advantage not of the law, but of a technical arrangement of his own, under which notice had to be given within a certain time, he refuses to this day to pay back money which was never due to the Customs. I say that all this sort of thing must come to an end. The Minister for Trade and Customs may remain stolid, and the Government may remain stolid, but whatever I may think on the subject of the prejudices of honorable members opposite, I recognise that it does not follow that because a man is a protectionist he has no desire to see pure administration of the Customs. Because a man is a protectionist it does not follow that he desires to see any persecution of the mercantile classes of the community. If we are a democratic community, we shall desire equal law and justice for everybody. Though we may have our own differences and our own ideals, at the same time, so long as under our industrial system a certain class does exist, and so long as that class is under the law, and is honest if we put taxation upon it, though it may be heavy, its collection ought to be made as light as possible. We believe that justice should be done, no matter what the consequences, and the name of the Commonwealth Government ought to stand as high, if we are going to be a great nation in this country, as that of the British Government.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until tomorrow at half-past 2 o'clock p.m.

ADJOURNMENT.

CUSTOMS DECISIONS: TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY TO WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Motion (by Sir EDMUND BARTON) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—I promised to give some information to the honorable member for North Sydney with reference to the dates upon which certain opinions were given, and received at the Customs House. I find that the first opinion was given on 26th September, 1901, to the Treasury. It was afterwards forwarded to the Customs on 27th February, 1902. Another was given on 6th February, 1902, to the Audit-office, and received at the Customs-office on 11th February, 1902. Three other opinions, dated 26th March, and 23rd December, 1902, and 27th March, 1903, were also given.

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie).—There is a matter connected with the transcontinental railway to Western Australia to which I should like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister before we adjourn. We are getting a considerable amount of information regarding the proposed line, and one of the arguments most commonly used concerning the railway is that it would be of advantage for defence purposes. I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he will get exact official information regarding the proposed Western Australian trans-continental line for strategic and defence purposes. It is, I think, the only point upon which the Government are not now endeavouring to get information for the benefit of the House, and I fail to see why we should not have information upon that point.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I will do my best to satisfy the desire of the honorable member.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 3 June, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

FORTIFICATIONS: ALBANY.

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact, as reported in the Western Australian newspapers, that during the recent visit of Japanese warships to Fremantle various officers from these vessels were invited to Albany and shown over the fortifications there?

2. What officer was responsible for these gentlemen being shown over these fortifications?

3. Is this action indorsed by the General Commanding the Commonwealth Forces?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Japanese officers were not invited to Albany.

2. The Officer Commanding Royal Australian Artillery, Albany, permitted certain Japanese officers to visit the Princess Royal Battery.

3. No. The Officer Commanding should not have done so without special authority.

POST-OFFICE: MOUNT GAMBIER.

Senator MCGREGOR asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Is it the intention of the Government to improve the post-office buildings at Mount Gambier; if so, when?

Senator DRAKE.—The following is the answer to the honorable senator's question:—

It is the intention of the Government to either improve the post-office buildings at Mount Gambier, or to erect a new building. The Deputy Postmaster-General of South Australia has reported that, in his opinion, alterations, for which plans have been prepared, and some general repairs, costing together about £750, will be sufficient to meet all requirements. It has, however, been represented to the Postmaster-General by some of the residents and others interested in Mount Gambier that the course recommended by the Deputy Postmaster-General will not adequately meet the situation, and that a new post-office is necessary. The cost of such building is estimated at £3,000. The whole question is still under consideration.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS: VICTORIA.

Senator DE LARGIE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the State Government of Victoria failed to carry out the conditions of contract for the carriage of mails within the State of Victoria during the late strike?

2. If so, does the Postmaster-General intend to take action against the State Government of Victoria for non-compliance with the conditions of contract?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The State Government of Victoria are not under any contract for the carriage of mails.

2. Under the existing arrangement between the Post-office and the Commissioner for Railways in Victoria for the carriage of mails within that State, which was made when both were State departments, and which prescribes the rates to be paid for such service, a claim will be made for a rebate for services discontinued or reduced during the late strike. Financially, the rebate will not affect the State of Victoria.

AUSTRALIAN CONTINGENTS, SOUTH AFRICA.

Senator CHARLESTON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

If it is his intention to cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate copies of all correspondence passed between the Auditor-General, the Treasurer, and the Attorney-General, including opinions given by the Attorney-General to the Auditor-General, with reference to moneys received from the Imperial War Office by the Federal Government towards defraying the cost of sending the Australian contingents to South Africa?

Senator DRAKE.—The following is the answer to the honorable senator's question:—

This correspondence is contained in the report of the Auditor-General already laid upon the table of the Senate.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

What was the decision come to at the Premiers' Conference in London regarding the coinage of silver by the Commonwealth?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

Coinage of silver was not the subject of discussion at the Premiers' Conference in London. The Government is in communication with the Secretary of State for the Colonies regarding the question.

NEW SENATOR.

The PRESIDENT laid upon the table a letter from the Governor-General, forwarding a certificate under the hand of the Governor of Western Australia, notifying that Mr. Henry John Saunders had been appointed to be a Senator for the State of Western Australia.

Certificate read by the Clerk.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers :—

Transfers approved by the Governor-General in Council for the financial year 1901-2.

Transfers approved by the Governor-General in Council for the financial year 1902-3.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS.

Resolved (on motion by Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD for Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD)—

That unless otherwise ordered, private orders of the day take precedence of private notices of motion on alternate Fridays.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DOBSON)—

That Senator Robert Wallace Best be Chairman of Committees of the Senate during the present session, and until the 31st day of December next.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH :

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 28th May (vide page 233), on motion by Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER—

That the address in reply be adopted.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I propose to address myself in the first instance, and mainly, to the subject of the administration of the Customs department, and as an introduction to that criticism I desire to refer to a statement in the opening speech that, "notwithstanding the drought," the finances of the Commonwealth are in a satisfactory state. It appears to me that by reason of the drought the Government have been putting their hands into the pockets of every man throughout Australia, and in this way helping themselves to the cash of the people. In an unusual and unexpected way they have amassed hundreds of thousands of pounds, and now they come down and coolly tell us that, "notwithstanding the drought," they have plenty of money. It is in consequence of the drought, and in consequence of duties which have been levied that ought not to have been levied in a time of great distress, that the Government have got money in hand. I have noticed two or three things during the recess with regard to wheat. In a country which, perhaps, we do not look upon as a very first-class country—that is Afghanistan—some time ago the Ameer issued orders that any family having more than enough grain for its own use was to sell it ; and within the last few weeks a further order has been issued abolishing for the time being the import duties upon grain. That is a country which we look down upon, but it has some thought for the consumers of food. I have noticed, too, that in another country that, perhaps, does not stand very high, namely, Mexico, similarly strong steps have been taken to protect the consumer. I read—

The Mexican Government is determined that the wheat ring that has been cornering the grain market shall be treated with much severity, and for this purpose a decree has been issued lessening the duties on wheat, and the railway rates have been reduced from the border. The Government proposes to establish municipal bakeries and to sell bread to the poor. The policy of the Government is to break up all monopolies that raise the price of living to the masses.

That has been done in Mexico. But in the Commonwealth of Australia we have caused wheat to be raised 100 per cent. in value without one thought of the consequences to the great mass of the people by so doing. Perhaps the most singular thing of all is what has occurred in Germany. I suppose that the German is the last man whom we should think of accusing of anything in the nature of sentiment. Yet, in the new German Tariff, of which I hold in my hand a translation issued by His Majesty's Imperial Government, I find that there is a section which provides that an estimate or calculation shall be made of the amount that has been collected on the average per head by duties on grain and on meat imported during the last five or six years, and that in future the amount collected in excess of that average shall be put aside for the benefit of widows and orphans.

Senator PLAYFORD. — How many years hence?

Senator PULSFORD.—I was interested to see a paragraph in to-day's newspapers referring to the year 1910. This provision takes effect at once. It is section 15—

If the net Customs yield per head of the population of the German Empire derived from produce to be taxed under Nos. 1, 2, 102, 103, 105, 107, 107A, and 160 of the Customs Tariff exceeds the net Customs yield per head of population derived from the same goods for the average of the financial years 1898 to 1903, the surplus is to be used towards the establishment of a provision for widows and orphans. Provisions for guarantee will be made by a special law. Until this law—comes into force, the additional yield in question is to be collected for the account of the State.

That is until the year 1910.

and is to accumulate at interest. If this law does not come into force by the 1st January, 1910, then from that time onward the interest of the additional yield, and also the additional yield coming in, are to be made over to the individual invalid insurance establishments in proportion to the insurance contribution furnished by them in previous years for the purpose of provision for the widows and orphans of the persons insured with them. The requisite statute is to be approved by the Imperial insurance law.

Well, that is an important step. So it appears, Mr. President, that more and more throughout the world, in small countries and in large countries, there is a growing feeling that the bread of the people ought not to be subject to taxation. But the Commonwealth has thought differently—at any rate the Government of the Commonwealth has thought differently. They have collected moneys right and left from every householder throughout the length and breadth of Australia, and they come down now and say, "We have got plenty of money notwithstanding the drought." There is one thing which should never be forgotten. The people of Australia owe the free-traders a great debt of gratitude with regard to the Tariff, because by action that was taken the duties which the Tariff proposed to impose on imported meats were abolished. We all know that meat has surely been dear enough. Prices unheard of before in Australia have been paid for meat, and things have been very hard in regard to it, notwithstanding that there has been no duty. But let me ask what would have been the price of meat, and how much more would the working people of Australia—the consuming classes—have had to pay if the duty of 20 per cent. on live meat, and one penny per lb. on dead meat had remained on the Tariff and had been collected, or had stood as an obstacle and bar to the importation of meat from New Zealand?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Has any live meat been imported?

Senator PULSFORD.—A very large quantity was imported into Sydney, and there were a number of shops that for a long time sold nothing else. If it had not been for the importation of New Zealand meat into Australia—

Senator STYLES.—Live meat?

Senator PULSFORD.—Live meat; if it had not been for that importation the price, heavy as it has been, would have been very much heavier. What has this large revenue been mainly used for? I will tell the Senate. It has been mainly used to white-wash the Customs administration. The Minister for Trade and Customs is going round the country saying—"Look at this big revenue; it is my stern, rigid, just administration that is collecting all this money." In this way they are using the money extracted out of the pockets of the people improperly, as a means, as I say, of white-washing the Customs administration, or attempting to do so. The Minister is acting like "little Jack Horner," who—

Sat in a corner,
Eating his Christmas pie;
He put in his thumb
And pulled out a plum,
And said "what a brave boy am I!"

That is what the Minister is doing. He is pulling all this money out of the pockets of the people, and then he struts about the stage of Australia and says—"What a brave boy am I!"

Senator DAWSON.—In the other House they blame him for not collecting money enough from the public.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is news to me. I do not think any one is likely to blame the Minister in that direction, although I am of opinion that a less drastic administration would, perhaps, bring in rather more money. But the whole talk about bringing in revenue by this rigid administration is pure moonshine. The Minister for Trade and Customs poses as a democrat. I really believe that he is under the impression that he is one. But I do not know any man who, in the official orbit in which he revolves, is more of an autocrat. What he desires to do, that he does, quite irrespective of what Parliament or the people desire or say.

Senator HIGGS.—No; according to the law.

Senator PULSFORD.—According to the law says Senator Higgs. What did he do? Let me read from the report of the Auditor-General—

Notwithstanding the opinions given, the department of Customs dealt with the duties collected from the date of the uniform Tariff and so on. The Minister for Trade and Customs was a law unto himself. He defied the Auditor-General, he defied the opinion of the Attorney-General, and he persisted in dealing in his own way with the revenue. I believe, Mr. President, that it was mainly owing to steps which were taken by myself that Tasmania has since, despite the Minister for Trade and Customs, received the sum of £11,000, and that Queensland is also to receive money. I mentioned what was going on to several members representing Tasmania, and one of them I know undertook to speak to the Treasurer of that State. It was upon the representation of the Treasurer of Tasmania that this adjustment took place, and the adjustment has got to be made to the whole of Australia. It is idle, therefore, for Senator Higgs to ask us to believe that the Minister for Trade and Customs is a gentleman who is perfectly willing to do what the law directs him, whether or not he thinks fit.

Senator CHARLESTON.—He gave way on that occasion.

Senator PULSFORD.—He gave way because he was compelled. The Ministry compelled him. I will give one or two instances in which the Minister has been overridden.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How does the honorable senator know? He was not in Cabinet.

Senator PULSFORD.—We shall see later on whether I have not shown that the Minister for Trade and Customs has been overridden in more ways than one. I will give another instance of the waywardness of the Minister. Here is his new book—a guide to this wonderful Tariff of his. Honorable senators may remember that last year I drew attention to a regulation, a decision, an order—I do not know what he calls it—issued by him in which he said that all importations of free goods and goods subject to specific duties, were to be valued in the same way as goods subject to ad valorem duties are valued—that the shipping value was to be taken and 10 per cent. added thereon. I pointed out the consequence of doing that—that it was just ruining our statistics. But the Minister is deterred by nothing except pure force from a course he has decided upon. The rule made by the Minister is still followed in entering all goods; but 10 per cent does not cover the freight of the hundreds of thousands of pounds worth of grain coming into Australia. In the case of the maize which is being landed here, the freight is more like 40 or 50 per cent. In this way the valuations in our statistics are being distorted. Yet what do we do? I, like other honorable senators, and perhaps to an even greater extent, refer from time to time to our statistics of exports and imports.

We take our Customs returns, and we say they show that we have imported so many millions of this and so many millions of that, and that the quantities received from this and that country are so much. But the Minister is totally destroying the value of our Customs returns by the system which he is following in defiance of what has been pointed out. I am certain that there is no other country in which this system of valuing bulk imports rules. The Minister for Trade and Customs is following a certain course which, as I have said repeatedly, both in the Senate and out of it, Parliament was assured would not be followed. In a speech delivered in the Senate, Senator O'Connor is reported at page 4288 of Hansard to have made this statement:—

Of course with regard to these trivial matters, which are always used as an illustration, the answer is in the first place in 99 cases out of 100 there will be no prosecution over these small things; and in the second place, if there is it is not likely that they will be pressed in any way for the recovery of the few shillings or the pound or so which may be involved.

Was Senator O'Connor sincere and honest in making that statement? I am perfectly sure that he was, and that he was stating what he implicitly believed would be the line of conduct adopted in administering the Customs Act. After the Act had been administered for some time, and after various statements had been made with regard to it in another place, the honorable member for Melbourne (Sir Malcolm McEacharn), according to Hansard, page 16313, made this statement in another place:—

Before the Bill was discussed by this House the Minister kindly sent a copy of it, and of the regulations, to the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce, and I was one of a deputation from the chamber who waited upon the Comptroller-General, Dr. Wollaston, and went through various matters with him. He afterwards submitted our representations to the Minister, and many alterations were made. When at the time we pointed out the hardships that would fall upon ship-owners and merchants if the Act was literally administered, we were assured that many of the clauses to which we took exception were to be found in existing Acts, and had never been harshly enforced in the past, and that there was no intention whatever that anything but a fair spirit should be adopted in dealing with merchants and ship-owners. As a consequence, those who were vitally interested in certain clauses of the Bill refrained from fighting them as they might otherwise have done.

That statement showed that certain honorable members of another place would have opposed some of the clauses in the Customs

Bill had it not been for the assurance they received that they would not be administered in a drastic manner, but would be given effect to wisely and with discretion just as were similar clauses in State Acts.

Senator HIGGS.—That assurance was not given by the Minister.

Senator PULSFORD.—Does an assurance by Dr. Wollaston or by the Vice-President of the Executive Council count for nothing? Let me remind honorable senators that Mr. Kingston was Minister for Trade and Customs for more than nine months before the Federal Tariff was introduced, and that he then had powers similar to those in the various State Acts. How did he exercise them? Did he put them into force? No. He allowed us to discuss the Customs Bill, knowing that certain clauses which he asked us to pass were similar to those in various State Acts—that they were only being used in cases of fraud, and that they were not being brought into force as weapons to be used against persons making innocent mistakes.

Senator HIGGS.—To what clauses does the honorable senator refer?

Senator PULSFORD.—I refer specifically to such a clause as that under which a clerical error is called a falsification, and the importer responsible for it becomes liable to be brought before a police court. There are various other provisions, with which I suppose Senator Higgs is just as familiar as I am.

Senator HIGGS.—A forged cheque might be a clerical error.

Senator PULSFORD.—I wish to draw attention to various statements which have been made defining the practice that should be followed in any sensible administration of the Customs department. I shall quote first from a speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition in another place, Mr. G. H. Reid—

It is essentially foreign to the genius of British administration for any department of public business in dealing with any class of His Majesty's subjects to make innocent mistakes the ground of police court prosecutions. Right through the web and texture of our principles in applying the force of authority and law to the different classes of His Majesty's subjects we have always maintained the great sound and humane principle that we should never endeavour in the administration of our statutes to put the honest man and the swindler side by side in the police court.

That is well put, and I do not see that it contains anything to which any honorable senator could take exception. Then Senator Symon is reported in Hansard, page 16076, as follows :—

Police courts are not the places in which to rectify clerical errors, but the places in which to punish offenders. . . . It is admitted on all hands, even by the magistrates, that there is no element of wrong-doing, but that it is simply a question of accident which may occur in the best regulated firms and amongst the most honest people.

Those are the opinions of two opponents of the Government. Let me now quote those of two of their supporters. Sir John Quick is reported in Hansard, page 16311, to have made this statement—

The Minister ought to be careful and not institute a prosecution where there had been merely an error of judgment. . . . I hope that the Minister as far as he possibly can will not institute a prosecution in respect of merely an innocent mistake, but will always consider whether there is associated with the offence some element of neglect resulting in personal advantage or loss to the federal revenue.

Then what was said by Senator Best in the course of a speech delivered in the Senate—

Errors and mistakes are inevitable in the passing of entries and in connexion with customs business. . . . Who of us are not in sympathy with men whose integrity and probity have never been doubted and who have been taken to the police court because a clerk has been guilty of some inaccurate statement in connexion with a customs entry. . . . I say it is harsh and cruel, and calculated to cause much bitterness to insist upon the merchants in such circumstances (where there is no fraud) being dragged before the court.

What we demand is, that where there is no crime there shall be no resort to a criminal court. Surely that is a simple demand which ought to be attended to by any Minister worthy of the name. When the Customs Bill was before us, Ministers either honestly assured us of the way in which it would be administered or they were guilty of some misrepresentation—not in the Senate, and not in another place as regards most of the Ministers—and I cannot understand the position taken up by the Minister for Trade and Customs. He has administered an Act in a way which his colleagues have said should not be followed. The position is one which I have called upon him and his fellow Ministers, one after the other, to explain. If they do not explain it they must submit to the consequences.

Senator CHARLESTON.—But they are not threatened with any consequences.

Senator PULSFORD.—How easy it is for mistakes to be made. On the basis of an estimate of the business transacted in the Sydney Custom-house, I believe that the import entries for all Australia in one year amount to the enormous total of about 500,000 ; while the export entries represent about 250,000 more. These figures will give the Senate some idea of the enormous amount of clerical work involved, especially as some entries each contain ten, twenty, or 50 items. In order to show how easy it is for a mistake to be made I shall instance a case which occurred not long ago in Sydney. An importer received a parcel of muslin of which he knew nothing. He had not ordered it, but he found it in a case containing some other goods. He took the muslin to the Customs officers who valued it at between £3 and £4 and he paid duty on that valuation. Two or three days later, however, he received the invoice which showed that the value was between £19 and £20, as the muslin was of a very special kind, and he went at once to the Custom-house and paid the difference. That illustrates how easy it is to make a mistake. I have before to-day mentioned an extraordinary error which took place in the Sydney Customs-house some time ago, when a Customs clerk in compiling the statistics relating, I think, to boots and shoes, made an error of £100,000 in his addition. He carried over the mistake from page to page till the final total was reached, but it was never discovered until I challenged the figures. Then the collector wrote to me that a mistake had been made. It was a mistake of one figure, but it occurred in the sixth column and thus made a difference of £100,000 in the total. These illustrations show how easy it is for clerical errors to arise, and how serious a simple error may sometimes be. I have now an opportunity of showing how business is done through the Customs. I have here an invoice of a shipment of goods landed in Sydney to the order, not of a very big house, but of a suburban retail establishment.

Senator HIGGS.—Is it a genuine invoice?

Senator PULSFORD. — I decline to answer that question. The invoice comprises no less than 22 pages, and embraces 448 different items, although the total value is only £354. The firm in question, conducting only a suburban retail shop, had to employ a custom's firm to clear the goods for them. They went to the Fuller Carrying Company of Sydney, and gave them the invoice with instructions to pay the duty, and the firm in question proceeded to follow out their orders. What did they do? In regard to £7 worth of goods they entered them at the Customs-house at a duty of 5 per cent., when they should have been entered at a duty of 15 per cent. There was there an error made involving a shortage of duty to the amount of 15s. 5d. Then in one page of this long invoice they came across a lot of muslins, which were invoiced in a peculiar way. Instead of being invoiced by the yard, it happened that they were remnant pieces, and were invoiced at so much the remnant, and were valued at 5s. and 6s. each. The firm's clerk said to himself, "That cannot be the price at per yard, these are muslins made up." And so he entered the goods as apparel, and though they were liable to a duty of only 5 per cent., he paid duty upon them at the rate of 25 per cent. Being a small quantity the total duty only came to £1 9s. 2d., but the amount of duty overpaid was £1 3s. 4d. The amount underpaid in the other case being only 15s. 5d., it is clear that the Customs authorities received 7s. 11d. more than they were entitled to. What did the Customs authorities do? They proceeded against the firm for the short payment. They said afterwards that they did not know there had been an over-payment. Though that information was given in the court the prosecution was not withdrawn, and being proceeded with the firm had to pay a fine of £5, and 5s. 6d. costs, on account of the error involving the short payment, although the Customs authorities were money in hand. The firm had to do more than that, however. The Customs authorities demanded that before the goods were taken away the firm should give a bond for their value. We must remember that whenever an error occurs, however innocent and trivial, if it is an error upon which the Customs authorities can secure a conviction in court, the goods are liable to forfeiture, and a fine inflicted in court is a legal condemnation of those goods. This firm, therefore, had to give a bond for the value of these goods before the Custom-house authorities would allow them to be removed. Although they knew all the circumstances of the case, and although this took place so long ago as last August, it was only on the 28th April last that the Collector of Customs in Sydney wrote to the firm cancelling the bond in these terms :—

I beg to inform you that the Acting Minister of Trade and Customs has decided that in this instance the forfeiture of the goods shall not be forced.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator does not complain about that?

Senator PULSFORD.—“Shall not be forced”—after duty had been overpaid! That is surely adding insult to injury. Yet I am asked to believe that the Customs administration is honest, just and proper.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was in this case, all events.

Senator PULSFORD.—Honest?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would not have been honest if the Customs had kept the goods.

Senator PULSFORD.—Was it honest bringing a man into court when he had overpaid duty?

Senator PLAYFORD.—They did not know that he had overpaid.

Senator PULSFORD.—They had known for months, and had made no attempt the interim to settle the matter. Let me go further with the experience of this firm. This day week, in Sydney, this firm was again had up at the police court in connexion with a matter which was just out as paltry as the previous one.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They must have been under suspicion of them.

Senator PULSFORD.—If Senator MCGREGOR happened to be doing any business which led him into contact with the Customs-house, and he were to offend the lowest employé in the department, that officer would be enabled to throw upon him the reflections of a very objectionable and unserved character.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is very mean of the honorable senator to suggest that an officer would do such a thing.

Senator STYLES.—Would he do it?

Senator PULSFORD.—Does my honorable friend, Senator Styles, know anything about human nature?

Senator STYLES.—No.

Senator PULSFORD.—Probably not. I hold in my hand the summons issued to the firm to which I have referred. They are charged with having passed an entry which is “false”—that odious phrase which all honest men object to when levelled at them when they have fallen into some simple mistake.

Senator DRAKE.—It is the term used in the Act, is it not?

Senator PULSFORD.—I know there is that provision in the Act, and the Minister has power to use it, and ought to use it where he knows or expects that there is fraud at the bottom of what has occurred.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But it seems that these people were in the habit of making mistakes.

Senator PULSFORD.—I object to the honorable senator's interruptions.

The PRESIDENT.—I must ask Senator MCGREGOR not to interject. The speaker has appealed to me, and the standing orders strictly prohibit interruptions.

Senator PULSFORD.—I have the particulars of this case. I have here the invoice which shows that there was one case of linings shipped to Sydney, and entered at Sydney in the month of August last year. The firm passed the entry at the Customs, and described the goods in the entry as linings according to the invoice. There were six different descriptions of linings; but one portion of the shipment worth £7, out of a total value of £32, happened to be a lining which had a little stripe in it. It was absolutely a cotton lining, but because of this little stripe the Customs authorities said that it was partly a silk lining. And because of that silk stripe they decided that the lining was liable to the duty on goods containing silk. The contention was perfectly right. Now, what took place? The firm who had imported these goods went insolvent, and the Customs agents were told by the Customs authorities that if they gave a guarantee that they would pay the value of the goods if their forfeiture was decided upon they might take delivery. The agents said—“No, we cannot guarantee the value of these goods when the real owner of them has gone insolvent, but we are willing to pay the difference in duty if it is due.” They were not sure that it was due, and they sent to the Customs various samples of goods. I may say here that the parcel of linings upon which the extra duty was claimed was invoiced at 13½d., while other linings in the same shipment valued at 15½d., were properly charged duty at 5 per cent. only. These goods remained in the custody of the Customs from August last till the 27th May last, when the firm received this summons to appear at the Water Police Court. What were they to do? The owner of the goods was bankrupt ; they had passed the entry according to form, and they thought the trustee in the insolvent estate would have fought the case, because they were not sure that the stripe was really silk. However, they said that it would be the safest and cheapest thing in the end to admit that a mistake had been made, and allow themselves again to be fined £5. Now, what was the amount involved ? It was only 15s. 3d. The mistake was as simple and transparent as possible. I have here the invoice which says so many yards of "striped sleeve lining." This is another instance, and will any honorable senator venture to tell me that the Customs Act under which things of this kind can be done is being rightly administered ? I shall now draw the attention of the Senate to two or three matters of a different character.

Senator HIGGS.—Will the honorable senator give us some on the other side—the just cases.

Senator PULSFORD—Some time ago a foreign vessel called the Barfilen arrived at Newcastle to load a cargo of coals for some far foreign port. The cook of the vessel during the voyage to Newcastle, as all ship's cooks do, had been collecting the cook's perquisite in the shape of the waste fat, known always in shipping circles as "slush." When he arrived at Newcastle a man came on board and offered to buy it. There was about 2 cwt. of it, and the utmost value that he would be able to obtain for it would be somewhere between ten and fifteen shillings. The cook sold the slush and delivered it to the man who bought it. What did the Customs authorities do ? They said there was a duty on "slush," only they did not call it slush, they called it tallow unrefined ! "There is a duty upon this of 2s. per cwt. It is under Customs control, and you had no right to move it." The cook who owned the fat and sold it was summoned to the police court and the man who bought it was also summoned to the police court, and they were each fined £5. I suppose the captain of the vessel came to the relief of the cook and advanced the money, because in this case the fine was paid and he was able to go away. But the shoreman could not raise the money and he went to gaol. The Customs authorities themselves admitted in court that the cook of the vessel knew nothing about the regulations. From inquiries I have myself made, I believe that the man on shore did know that he was running a risk, but I confess that I have not much sympathy with a Customs administration that draws "slush" into the net. I am, however, chiefly referring to the case of the cook of this vessel who was a foreigner visiting our shores, and was treated in this way by being mulct in the sum of £5 and costs. Is that honest, fair, or reasonable ? Is it administration of which we may be proud, or such as should satisfy us ? Take another case, which happened not long ago. The Orient steamer Oruba arrived in Sydney, and on board there was a young sailor named Tingey. He had, whilst in London, been given a small parcel sent by a sister in London to a sister in New Zealand. It contained some small articles of drapery and a bible. He was to bring the parcel to Sydney, and there post it for New Zealand. In the full light of day he went ashore to go to the Post-office, and he was stopped by a Customs officer. He was treated even worse than the man in Newcastle, because he was put under arrest for moving something that was under Customs control. He was taken to gaol, and was subsequently brought before the police court and fined £5, and the parcel was confiscated. Two or three days afterwards, when I had ascertained all the facts of the case, the Prime Minister was advertised to speak in Sydney. I made all the facts public, and asked him to express some opinion on administration of that sort. What did he say ? He said he had seen this statement in the newspaper, and sent for the papers in relation to it. He told that big meeting that the man ought not to have been arrested, and that there was no ground for the infliction of a fine ; and he added :—"I have ordered that the confiscated parcel shall be returned and that 80 per cent. of the fine shall be remitted." You might have talked till doomsday before you would have got that amount of reason out of the Minister for Trade and Customs. That is one case in which perseverance has brought about a small measure of justice. But a strange thing happened in connexion with that case. The gentleman in Sydney who was representing the sailor wrote to the Customs authorities in Melbourne, and they replied a fortnight after the speech by the Prime Minister, stating that they agreed to return the parcel, but that they could not remit the fine. This has led to some controversy; but in the other House a day or two ago the Prime Minister repeated his statement, and said that he was going to see that his promise was carried out.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Mr. Kingston ought to resign after that.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Mr. Kingston had nothing to do with it. It was done by Sir George Turner, who was acting for him.

Senator PULSFORD.—Excuse me, Mr. Kingston had everything to do with the infliction of the fine.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The court inflicted the fine.

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes, but the prosecution was instituted under the administration of Mr. Kingston. If my honorable friend had been administering the Customs of Australia, he knows as well as any man knows that this prosecution would have been impossible.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In our colony, when I was a Minister, if a man came on shore with silk, we would arrest him straightway, and make him explain himself pretty quickly, too.

Senator PULSFORD.—Under circumstances such as I have narrated, an arrest would have been an impossibility.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would not have been in South Australia.

Senator PULSFORD.—I have stated the true facts of the case, and shown the position taken up by the Minister for Trade and Customs, the Prime Minister, and the Treasurer. It appears that the letter declining to remit the fine was written on the authority of Sir George Turner, who did not know at the time of what had been said by his chief in Sydney, and it was not written with any intention of disputing the decision at which his chief had arrived.

Senator DRAKE.—That might easily happen.

Senator PULSFORD.—It only shows what room there is for difference of opinion. Let me now refer to another case which occurred only a fortnight ago. The ocean steamer Sierra arrived in Sydney from San Francisco. The chief steward was a man named Hannigan, who had been sailing between those ports for eighteen years, and the voyage to which I refer was his last one. He had brought with him a few small presents for some friends in Sydney. He instructed the barman to take these to the Customs officer in his box on the quay. Anybody who travels knows this usage.

You take the goods to the Customs officer and he fixes up the amount of duty, and settles it for you. The chief steward gave the boy who took the goods a £10 note, as he had no smaller English money in his possession. When the boy got to the gangway he was stopped by an officer still within the ground of Customs control, and told—"No, you shall not pay the duty. You are moving goods without right. You shall not take them back, nor shall you take them to the Customs officer's box. You are to be summoned." So the Customs authorities summoned the steward, the bar attendant, and also a cabman who was employed at the ship to take the things away, and who was carrying some of the parcels to the Customs box. At the police court there was no defence. There could be no defence to a charge of having moved the goods before they got the leave of the Customs authorities. If a Customs officer chooses to bring an action there can be no reply to it. Each person was fined £5 and costs, and, like a man, the steward paid the fines, amounting to £15, and costs amounting to 20s. In that way, after running for eighteen years between San Francisco and Sydney, he has finished up his connexion with the Australian trade.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Very likely he did the same thing many a time and never passed entries through the Customs.

Senator PULSFORD.—My honorable friend wishes to throw suspicion all round. If he were travelling he might be asked to take charge of a parcel, or of a present. If there is a Minister who is determined that every possible opportunity for suspicion shall be availed of, and a charge laid on every occasion, what possible chance is there of business being got through in a creditable way? What possible chance is there of avoiding all such prosecutions as those which have been disgracing Australia and arousing the indignant spirit of our people during recent months?

Senator DRAKE.—Oh, no.

Senator PULSFORD.—What I say is quite right. I am speaking specially about New South Wales, in which there is rising a spirit of intense indignation at the administration of the Customs.

Senator STYLES.—One out of twenty.

Senator PULSFORD.—I am not exaggerating; the statement I am making is absolutely true. Other charges have been made from time to time in regard to Inter-State certificates. Let me now give the particulars of a case in which the Treasurer came to the rescue and quashed a fine that was imposed some time ago, and then let honorable senators tell me if they ever heard of anything more ridiculous. In Sydney there is a firm named Rich and Co., with branch houses in Bourke and in Brisbane. The firm were sending two bags of rice from New South Wales to Queensland, and they had paid duty on 98½ lbs. In the Inter-State certificate the weight of the rice was put down as 100 lbs. instead of 98½ lbs. There was some difference of duty on 1½ lbs. of rice which affected the statement in the Inter-State certificate. This was alleged to be a falsification, and the firm were dragged to the police court and fined. I wonder if Senator McGregor indorses an action of that kind. What has been done in connexion with that case? In the Sydney press of yesterday I read this letter to the firm from the Customs department—

With reference to the proceedings taken against you by the department in respect to an incorrect Inter-State certificate for certain rice, I beg to state that the Acting Minister for Trade and Customs having reviewed the circumstances connected with the matter, has decided that the fine imposed may be refunded.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does the honorable senator object to that?

Senator DRAKE.—Is that unjust?

Senator PULSFORD.—That is the decision arrived at by Sir George Turner many months after the fine was paid, and, mind, not by Mr. Kingston. Sir George Turner has stepped in and reviewed the case. I know of no case, however trivial, however unjust the fine, and the proceedings may have been, in which Mr. Kingston has voluntarily come forward and attempted to rectify the injuries done and to lessen the results of a harsh and cruel administration. In Sydney we have a firm named Warren and Strang connected with the boot and shoe trade. They have had several experiences of the Customs. In one case, of which I have already stated the particulars, a mistake was made by the Customs. On another occasion, a few weeks later, the firm received a parcel of tray cloths enclosed in a case of muslins, but without advice being received. The case was passed and opened in their warehouse, when the parcel was discovered. On the same day the mail arrived, and brought an invoice for the goods, value £8 5s. 3d., duty being 20 per cent. They immediately communicated with the Custom-house, explaining the mistake and paying the duty. In these two instances the firm only did what was right, and what we should expect any honest firm to do. From America another shipment arrived for the firm which I said deals with boots and shoes, and unknown to them in one case was a small shipment—about £10 worth—of calf skin. This time the Customs people found out the enclosure before the case was delivered, and summoned the firm to the police court. The firm wrote to the collector and drew attention to what had been done on two prior occasions. It was all of no avail. In the police court they desired to fight the case and give evidence of what they had done on the two previous occasions, and the solicitor prosecuting for the Customs objected to their bringing forward that evidence of their honesty. Is that the sort of administration of which we can be proud? The firm was fined £5, and I for one do not know what has become of the goods.

Senator CHARLESTON.—In Adelaide I do not think they are allowed to make post entries.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It appears that the Customs were dealing with people who were very unscrupulous, and the revenue might be greatly defrauded. I know that I used to fine such offenders pretty heavily when their tricks were found out.

Senator PULSFORD.—What sort of tricks?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Putting goods in a case and stating that it contained goods other than those which it really did contain. That is a false statement.

Senator PULSFORD.—If the honorable senator knows anything about trade and commerce he must be aware that it is a very common thing for a parcel to be enclosed. Persons going to or from England are constantly asked by friends to take charge of a small parcel or perhaps a large parcel and it is a common thing for a small quantity of goods to be enclosed in a larger package through some friend. In this world where mistakes are constantly happening is anything much easier than now and then for the advice of such an enclosure being made to fail?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Then it ought to be punishable for it opens the door for any amount of fraud.

Senator PULSFORD.—I am quite agreeable for a fine to be inflicted, but I am not agreeable, nor would my honorable friend be agreeable, if he received a parcel of the sort to be charged with having made a false entry and fined £5.

Senator CHARLESTON.—I am surprised that they were allowed to make those post entries.

Senator PULSFORD.—What else could be done? I happen to have a memorandum about post entries. It shows the style of the administration. It is from a firm in Townsville, and is contained in a letter written to me. This firm had been prosecuted for a simple clerical error, and they said that they were very much astonished a day or two after to receive the following letter from the Custom-house :—

Customs and Excise Office,
Townsville, 25th April, 1903.

GENTLEMEN,—

I have the honour, by direction, to inform you that post entry may be accepted for the duty short paid by you on two casks of spirits ex bond.

Your early attention will oblige.

On inquiring what it meant from their Customs clerk, this firm found that it concerned post entries in connexion with the locker's return. A Customs official had gauged the goods, and had given the firm's clerk the quantity on which the entry was to be passed. The entry was taken to the Custom-house, and according to the re-gauging given by the locker made at the Custom-house when the calculation was being made, the locker's mistake was discovered. Then, notwithstanding the fact that the mistake was made by the Customs official, the department wrote in this sort of way, that "post entry may be accepted." They did not say that the mistake was theirs, and made by their official. They did not say—"Be good enough to pay shortage in the form of a post entry." They wrote as though this firm had done something wrong and said—"Post entry may be accepted."

Senator STYLES.—It did not hurt the firm.

Senator PULSFORD.—I object to this style of administration. I object to this tone from Customs officials. I object that when everything is done straightforwardly and according to the Customs officers' own finding that any firm should be addressed in this fashion. To show the Senate some of the difficulties of the position; I should like it to be known that since the Tariff was agreed to by Parliament thousands—literally thousands—of Customs decisions have been formulated, and orders have been made public. Some time ago I treated the public of Sydney to a list of 100 of these. I will treat the Senate to about ten of them. I do not think that honorable senators have seen them. Here is one decision with regard to sewing-machines—

Machines, sewing.—Heads or working parts above plate, free; other parts, of wood and metal, 20 per cent. as furniture; cover, if of metal, 25 per cent.

Sewing-machine accessories.—Oil cans containing oil for lubricating, cans 20 per cent. Oil dutiable under Item 84. Instruction books free, whether imported with or separate from machine. Leather belting in the piece, 20 per cent.

NOTE.—The Minister has decided to admit one belt free for each machine if accompanying same.

The next decision is as follows :—

Coffin Furniture—Mixed metalware, unplated, 15 per cent.; metal and plated, 20 per cent.; balance, 20 per cent. as fancy goods.

Then comes sen sen. This is a Chinese article. The first decision said it was to be entered as confectionery at 2d. per lb. Then another decision came out that it was to be entered as perfumery at 20 per cent.

Drugs in bulk, such as roots, leaves, seeds, &c., not mixed or compounded, free, if not spices.

Chains, key for outside wear, 25 per cent., as jewellery.

Chains, key, not for wear, free.

Watch keys of all kinds, whether for hanging on chain or otherwise, are dutiable at 20 per cent., as accessories to watches.

Then there is a definition of mining picks—

Officers are instructed that mining picks in the Tariff are to be taken to mean double-ended pointed picks, and single-ended picks with hammer head, not exceeding 4½ lb. weight.

Here is another order—

Claims for discount are not to be allowed if supported only by statement in the invoice in a handwriting different from the body of the invoice. Where the handwriting in the invoice showing discount is different from that in the body of the invoice, then corroborative evidence is required.

I will not go any further. Those are some of the decisions given under the Tariff Act—some of thousands in the new Tariff Guide that has been published. I believe that the decisions total altogether something like 10,000, so that the lot of the importer at best "is not a happy one." I want to say now that, despite all the statements about publicity, there is a large number of decisions which are given in private by the Minister. I have told the Senate that a conviction in a court carries with it the forfeiture of the goods—that is, when the Minister chooses to enforce it. The Minister is a law unto himself absolutely on this point. There is case after case in which a man has been taken to the court, and the court has said—"This is a trivial matter: there ought to be nothing done, and no fine imposed." But the court has inflicted the minimum fine, which, unfortunately, is £5. Then, what has the Minister done? Has he given up the goods? No. He has retained them. There are lots of cases in which, despite the declaration of the court that there was no crime involved, and that nothing but a mistake had occurred, the goods have been retained for months and months. In many cases it seems as if there were a determination that they should be finally confiscated.

Senator FRASER.—The only proper course is to have a committee to inquire properly into the administration.

Senator PULSFORD.—I agree that that is the only straight course. The Minister ought not to be allowed to administer the Act in a way which may be thought by some to be for the purpose of obtaining political capital.

Senator DRAKE.—How can he help what the people think?

Senator PULSFORD.—That is the last use to which any Act of Parliament should be put. The Postmaster-General said the other day that these matters ought to go to the court, and that the court ought to decide whether the mistake made was an intentional one or not. Let me tell the Senate that in nearly every prosecution which has been undertaken by the Customs the department has, in the first instance, decided whether it was a case of fraud or not. Case after case has gone before the magistrate, and the prosecuting solicitor has said in court that there was no imputation of fraud, but that what was alleged was a pure mistake. Surely there is a decision. If the Minister has decided that there is no fraud, why go to the court at all? And why, if you have gone to the court, have the audacity to say that you have done so in order to let the court decide? The whole thing is a subterfuge and a misrepresentation.

Senator DRAKE.—An innocent mistake.

Senator PULSFORD.—Is it an innocent mistake on the part of the Crown to prosecute a man whom the department knows to be innocent? Let me go a little further and hit a little harder on this subject of the method of acting adopted by Ministers. The Ministry tell us that they are going to do everything above board—everything in sight of the public—and leave decisions for the court, when in fact they are not doing so. Let us see what is going on in the Postmaster-General's department. The honorable and learned senator told the Senate the other night that he was much "shocked" at what was going on in his department, that he knew that letters were being inserted in parcels, but that he would not have any prosecutions. He said more than that—that he would not sanction any publicity in regard to fines which he inflicted.

Senator DRAKE.—I have not done so yet.

Senator PULSFORD.—He deprecated making public the results of his own private inquiries. Now then, I want to point to something which in my opinion is rather serious in regard to that department. The Postmaster-General, as the Senate knows, deals with troubles of this sort himself. He inflicts, I suppose, a paltry fine on somebody. But the Minister is doing something more than that. He is himself judge and jury in grave cases of embezzlement. If the Ministry find it incumbent on them to take a man to the police court in connexion with three-hap'orth of rice, or some paltry error, are they the persons who should undertake to settle in private a grave case of embezzlement?

Senator DRAKE.—Is not the honorable senator going to give us particulars of that statement?

Senator PULSFORD.—I am about to refer to them. In the Auditor-General's report, under the head of defaults, I find, in connexion with the Postal department, a record of fifteen cases where officers employed at the Post-office have embezzled money, and where the matter has been dealt with, more or less, by the Minister. Let me show what has been done. I will take New South Wales. There are seven cases of officers in New South Wales. In four of those cases the police court was appealed to. One man was sentenced to three months' imprisonment; two others to twelve, and a fourth to eighteen months.

Two of the men who were sent to gaol had paid in the amount in default. But I find a lot of other cases—one in Brisbane, where the amount in question was £495 4s. 2d.—where there was no prosecution. I suppose the man in question had rich friends.

Senator DRAKE.—That is only the honorable senator's supposition.

Senator PULSFORD.—At all events the money was paid, and the man was dismissed. Here we have fifteen cases under the heading of "defaults," in only five of which prosecutions took place. In the remaining ten the men concerned were asked to resign, and did so, or were got rid of in some other way. The money was paid, and the matter was hushed up. That is what is taking place in the Postal department under an administration which we are told strives by every means in its power to do everything in the eyes of the public. Cases involving hundreds of pounds are quietly settled, while trifling clerical errors involving nothing at all are brought before the police court. The whole thing will not bear investigation. An order issued only a few days ago by the Customs department in regard to catalogues introduced into Australia through the Post-office provides that—Duty must be paid on catalogues printed outside the Commonwealth and posted separately to customers here, otherwise they are to be seized under section 35 of the Customs Act.

What does that mean? Occasionally I receive from London publishers a catalogue of new books, but if I accept the next that reaches me I shall be liable to be taken to the police court, and charged under the Customs Act with moving goods subject to the Customs control. Could anything be more absurd? I find that the new German tariff contains a provision that goods imported through the Post-office, weighing up to 250 grammes—that is a little over 8 ozs.—shall be free of duty. Yet in this Commonwealth I may find myself some day visiting the police court, and being fined £5 for moving, without payment of duty, a catalogue sent to me through the post. I shall do my best to avoid the risk. As a matter of fact I have already written to the Postal authorities in Sydney directing that they are not to place any catalogues in my box at the Post-office, or to deliver them to me. But has the Postmaster-General nothing to say with regard to so absurd a decision? Has he nothing to say on behalf of the thousands of people in Australia to whom catalogues and price lists are sent? Why should not a price list come in free?

Senator DRAKE.—It is dutiable.

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes, a single catalogue, dutiable at 3d. per lb. according to weight, would be liable to an impost of something like half a farthing.

Senator DRAKE.—Publishers at home might send out a great many catalogues.

Senator PULSFORD.—Why should they not come in free?

Senator DRAKE.—Why should they not pay duty?

Senator PULSFORD.—How can duty be paid upon them? I get special books, perhaps of a political character, sent to me, and catalogues of such books are not distributed broadcast throughout the land. Perhaps 100 or 200 may be sent out here at a time, and every man who receives one will be liable, under this decision, to serious consequences. This is the precious administration of the Customs department which we are asked again and again to believe is a wholesome one. I have no desire to labour the question of Customs administration, although it is a very sore point with me. Before the close of last session I told the Vice-President of the Executive Council that there would be no peace until the whole matter was settled, and I say again that there will be no peace until that stage has been reached. Let the law be honestly, fairly, and reasonably administered, and let there be an end to proceedings such as those now going on. I should like to give the Senate the details of a case which occurred recently in Sydney, but it would take too long to read the affidavits. Briefly stated, the facts are that about six or nine months ago a Sydney importer named Goldring imported a lot of watches mainly for the Christmas trade, and that these watches were seized by the Customs department. The importer has by every means in his power appealed to the Customs department to hand them over to him. He has tendered money; he has offered guarantees and bonds; he has written letter after letter, and his solicitor has done the same. His invoices, papers, and other documents have been seized, however, and still the Customs authorities have not brought any prosecutions against him, nor have they given him any information of the charge against him. They have simply taken his goods, and more or less ruined his trade. Only a day or two ago this importer, as a last resort, appealed to the Supreme Court of New South Wales for a mandamus to compel the Collector of Customs to state the charge against him, and to return his books, in order that he might proceed with his business. What did the Minister for Trade and Customs do? Did he meet the man straight out? No; he defended the action, and said, "the Court has no jurisdiction."

Senator CHARLESTON.—The Judge said that.

Senator PULSFORD.—That was the defence raised by the Minister, and it was successful. A State Court has no power to issue a mandamus against an officer of the Commonwealth. Behind that want of power the Minister is sheltering himself. Meanwhile, the goods of the unfortunate importer are being detained, and his business is being hung up and practically destroyed. Is this a state of things that we can tolerate? I shall pass now from the unfortunate Customs administration and deal briefly with a few matters mentioned in the Governor-General's speech. In the first place I wish to say that I shall hail with gratification the establishment of the High Court. I shall do all that I can to hasten its creation, because until it is established there can be no relief for a man hampered, as is the importer to whom I have just referred. The statement contained in the Governor-General's speech with regard to the report of the commission on the federal capital site is of a very indefinite character. We are told that it is hoped we shall have it at an early date. I trust that we shall, and that the Government will impress upon the commissioners the urgency of the matter. Then we are told that a Bill is to be brought before us dealing with Conciliation and Arbitration. My support of measures of that kind will be great, in proportion as the principle of compulsion is absent. I have always held that when employé's ask for an interview it is a scandal for their masters to refuse to meet them. I do not hesitate to say that I know of nothing more reprehensible than that. The employers presumably are the better educated and the more gentlemanly of the two classes, and it is not only ungentlemanly, but unworthy of educated men to refuse a request that they should meet their employé's in conference. I should agree to inflict whatever penalty was asked upon employers who refused a conference, but I have no belief in compulsory conciliation. The Prime Minister went to England under a very strong promise and pledge that he would commit Australia to nothing, but he seems to have almost absolutely committed us in the matter of the proposed naval subsidy. We are in a position in which it is very difficult to escape from agreeing to the payment proposed. I admit that the sum is not much in view of the services which will be rendered, but in my judgment the proposal, if carried out, would not place Australia in the satisfactory position that I should like to see her occupying. When the flying squadron has flown away, we must of course be without its services. My opinion is that an enemy would seek to take advantage of an opportunity like that, and that in the absence of any naval power on our coast one hostile cruiser might do us very grave harm. Therefore I think we have to consider carefully what ought to be done in this matter, and I venture to throw out a suggestion. When the war between Spain and the United States broke out, it was found in the United States that a number of the great ocean-going vessels could render very great service if fitted with two or three heavy guns, and sent forth as cruisers. I do not see how we are going to get out of paying the subsidy of £200,000 per annum; but at the same time I fail to see how we are to get rid of the responsibility of keeping some defences round our coast. I, therefore, throw out a suggestion that whilst agreeing to this payment, we should make some arrangement by which perhaps half-a-dozen of the pick of Australian coasting steamers would be subsidized and made available as cruisers, should it become necessary to watch our shores.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They are not fast enough to be of any value. They should be able to do twenty knots an hour.

Senator PULSFORD.—There may be that objection at present, but with the aid of a subsidy we should get a better class of coastal steamers. Of course, we could make arrangements for the use of the big oversea boats, but out of the whole number of vessels trading to Australia only those which happened at the moment to be on the Australian coast would be available if any trouble arose. We could not very well undertake to subsidize the whole of the P. and O. and Orient Companies' liners. I should like to say something now with regard to the patents laws. I have always been a great believer in the value of patents, and I have always attributed the great prosperity of America very largely to its most liberal patents laws. But just fancy the difference: A man in America gets a patent for a few pounds, which gives him protection over a population of 80,000,000, whilst in Australia a man must at present take out half-a-dozen patents, and when he has done so his invention is protected over a population of about 4,000,000. That is not the way to do very much good, and I am anxious to go somewhat further than having patents which merely give protection over the Commonwealth. I desire to bring about a system of Imperial patents. I wish the Australian patent to be valid in the United Kingdom. I see that at the Imperial conference a suggestion was made by the Commonwealth Government with regard to the mutual protection of patents, and I shall read what is said on the subject in the report of the conference—

The conference also discussed the subjects of the mutual protection of patents and the purchase of ocean cables, which had been suggested by the Government of the Commonwealth. In regard to the first of these subjects, the accompanying memorandum, prepared by the Comptroller of the Patents Office, had been circulated to the members, and while it was felt that it was of too technical a nature for effective discussion at the conference, there was a general feeling that it was desirable that the recognition throughout the Empire of a patent granted in one part of it should be facilitated, and that an inquiry should be instituted as to how this could be effected, and the following resolution was passed:—That it would tend to the encouragement of inventions if some system for the mutual protection of patents in the various parts of the Empire could be devised. That the Secretary for State be asked to enter into communication with the several Governments in the first instance, and invite their suggestions to this end.

It was to this suggested correspondence that the question of which I gave notice to-day had reference. I wish to know whether any correspondence has taken place upon this subject, and whether the Bill which the Government are about to introduce is to be a measure limiting the patents law solely to the Commonwealth, or whether there is any hope of that greater achievement of a patents law which shall give Australian inventors protection throughout the length and breadth of the British Empire.

Senator MCGREGOR.—So the honorable senator is a protectionist?

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes, I desire true protection—sometimes even from Senator McGregor. Now, with regard to the question of the Western Australian transcontinental railway. I have no hesitation in saying that the project has my warm sympathy. I hope that the railway will be built. I think it is desirable that it should be built. But there is something to consider. The present is not the time when millions are to be had for the asking. I think we ought to decide that it is a desirable project, we ought to keep it before our minds, and we ought to be taking steps that will tend to make the object easy of achievement when we think the time has actually arrived. I venture to throw out the suggestion that as the project would, we hope, and may presume, be of material advantage to the State of Western Australia, the authorities of that State might consider whether they could not facilitate the achievement of this object by offering to bear some fixed proportion of the loss which must arise in the earlier stages of the history of such a line. Now with regard to the mail services and coloured labour, I confess I look back with some gratification to the time when the debate took place in the Senate upon the Immigration Restriction Bill, and when the clause excluding contract labour was under discussion. I moved an amendment proposing to limit that exclusion to those who were contracted for at less than current wages. It was a very simple amendment, and I think a very desirable one, and its acceptance would have saved Australia from a considerable amount of discredit and disgrace. I hope this session will not pass without our being able to do something to rectify the blunder that was then made. I think the amendment which I proposed ought to have been accepted, but of course when the measure was before us we were all dominated by the central object of the Bill, the exclusion of coloured races, and we perhaps lost sight to some extent of the odds and ends of the thing, and dealt merely with contract labour and white people and so on in various forms. As regards the mail services I hope we are not going to be so foolish as to cut off our noses to spite our faces. I hope we shall still be able to arrive at some sensible way of settling the mail contract business, and that we shall not be relegated to a service of out-of-date slow-going tubs to conduct the mail business of the Commonwealth. I do not hesitate to say that a little calmer feeling is gradually coming over even the most excited Australians on the subject of coloured labour. I see that the men on the Japanese men-of-war now visiting us are being received wherever they go with acclamation.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is at the dictation of national courtesy. We do not want them to remain here.

Senator PULSFORD.—National courtesy is all I ask for; and I wish to dissociate Australia from the national discourtesy which disfigures some of our legislation. I never have been an advocate for throwing Australia open to all coloured races. I do not believe in any policy of the sort. If we take, for instance, the European and Chinese races, we shall find that the white races are practically spending races, whilst the Chinese are a saving race. The European will say with regard to his wages—“How much can I spend; what money have I to spend?”; whilst the Chinaman says—“What money can I save?” That is a wide racial difference, and objection to Chinese labour rests not so much on logic as on a strong instinct, and an instinct which is a true one.

Senator HIGGS.—Then it must be logical.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is because the white races spend their money that with them trade is brisk and profits are large, and good wages and big wages are desirable. The Chinaman, on the other hand, argues, as I have said, from the point of view of saving, and if people wish to put all their money into stockings there will be very little left for trade. The people of spending and generous instincts do not mix very well with those who practise what I may reasonably call a meaner economy. These races are therefore better kept apart. But let all the arrangements be conducted honorably. Let us insult no race, but give them the treatment which we expect from them. I should like to refer to the subject of contracts for the purchase of goods. The various departments of the Commonwealth Government have to buy a great many things in the course of a year. I have been looking at some of their contracts, and it does not appear to me that there is any system about them. For instance, in buying provisions I notice that in some places they buy tea at 7d., 8d., 1s., and 2s. per lb. Why this sort of thing should be I do not know. Then the Commonwealth has to make very large contracts for some goods. Take, for instance, an article so insignificant as sealing-wax, and we find that the Commonwealth buys twenty, thirty, and forty tons of that commodity at a time. I believe that there is only one maker of sealing-wax in Australia, and I wish to know whether, when a contract is being made, advantage is taken of the section in the Tariff Act which gives the Commonwealth power to import free of duty. Is the Commonwealth taking advantage of that section to obtain the goods which it requires for its own services as cheaply as they may be obtained? Another matter I should like to mention is that of life assurance. This certainly cannot be thought of this session, but it is a matter which should be borne in mind, and which should be dealt with as early as possible. It is desirable that Parliament should consider the subject of life assurance so as to safeguard the people of Australia from wild-cat schemes of life assurance. I can tell honorable senators that there are some of these afloat to-day and taking a good deal of money out of the pockets of Australia. There is only one other subject to which I desire to draw attention, and that is the subject of preferential trade. Honorable senators have listened to me so long, that important as this subject is, I propose to make my remarks upon it very brief. As a free-trader, I object to the proposal for preferential trade, and if I had the misfortune to be a protectionist I should still object to it. I cannot conceive of any protectionist favouring the proposals for preferential trade as they are now brought forward. The Australian export trade is really in a remarkable position. It simply stands upon velvet, and we cannot improve its position. We produce large quantities of farm and dairy produce, and for as much as we have to spare of this we have an open and free market in the old country. The people there will take as much as we can send, and a great deal more than we are able to send at present. Then we have also a free market for our wool in the United Kingdom. But here arises a very singular position. Australia produces a very much larger quantity of wool than the United Kingdom can take.

becomes of the balance? It is taken from the continent, and here, in regard to our agricultural products, which the Empire cannot consume, the great countries of Europe have thrown aside their protective duties and become free-traders, and they give free admission. On the free list of the new German Tariff will be found wool, skins, and various other pastoral products.

Senator STYLES.—Raw materials.

Senator PULSFORD.—What does it mean whether they are raw materials or not? They are what we have to sell, and we have to sell the world is ready to buy from us. When Australian trade is on velvet why interfere with it? It can be bettered. How different is the position in which the trade of Great Britain is! The old country has to fight for admission for her products. Nowhere has she to fight harder for admission than at her own kith and kin in the Commonwealth of Australia. Whilst declaiming about their love of the mother country, the Government do their best to impose big duties.

The Minister for Trade and Customs and the Treasurer bring in measures to the effect that they expect to reduce the duties by the amount of £5,000,000. As half of our imports come from the old country what a straight-out blow is intended to be given to the country we love. Protectionists or free-traders, there is no difference that we do love England. But this extraordinary freak in the protectionist policy I cannot understand; it is for them to explain it. However, what I am pointing out is the wonderful difference between the position in the world of our export trade and our import trade. Great Britain has to fight for the entry of her goods everywhere. We have free admissions for all goods which we can produce. Where the Empire cannot take them the great countries step in, throw aside their protective policy, and give us free admission.

Senator STYLES.—They are very glad to take the raw materials.

Senator PULSFORD.—No doubt they are. In the year 1899 Australia bought from France, Germany, and Belgium goods to the value of £3,000,000, and those three countries bought from Australia goods to the value of £9,000,000. Is that a most extraordinary balance? We buy only £3,000,000 worth, and we sell £9,000,000 worth, and we are asked to bring in a differential Tariff to penalize France and Germany. What does it mean? If we give a preference in one direction, we inflict penalties in other directions. Whether I be a free-trader or a protectionist, this fact stares me in the face, and it cannot be got over: that the great countries of Europe are buying enormously more from Australia than they are selling to her. Is not that a good thing to let alone?

Senator STYLES.—They do it because it pays them.

Senator PULSFORD.—Of course it does, and they would be foolish if they bought when it did not pay them. Another point I wish to draw attention to is the general idea of this preferential Tariff. Honorable senators little know I think that even in Great Britain it is very little recognised how big the Empire is, and how big its producing power is. Of course we know that the old country is a great producer of manufactured goods. Taking it all round the Empire is an enormous producer of raw materials, and in regard to a great many articles she is undoubtedly producing more than she can consume. I suppose every body admits that when an article is produced in excess of the consuming power of the Empire it cannot be benefited by a preferential duty. That is agreed to by protectionists as well as by free-traders. Now, let me read a list of articles in which this position has already been arrived at: Wool, tallow, hides, skins, tin, coal, gum, kauri, jute, rice, tea, coffee, palm oil, coconut oil, rum, pepper, ginger, pearl shell, certain kinds of fish, such as salmon, &c., indigo, dye woods, and various drugs. The list might be extended. Of all these items the Empire to-day is producing more than it can consume, and is depending on the rest of the world for the consumption of the balance, and with our enormous extent of country we are rapidly increasing our production, in the matter of agricultural and pastoral products and grain of various kinds. Take the importation of mutton into Great Britain. It is getting very large, and it looks as if the time will not be very far distant when the Empire will be producing more mutton than it can consume. I wish now to refer to the basis of this agitation for preferential duties. The country of its origin, if I may use the term, is Canada. I propose to read a brief extract from an article in the North Atlantic last year, by Mr. John Charlton, M.P., a member of the Anglo-American Joint High Commission on British Preferential Trade and Imperial Defence. In the course of this article he says—

Canada desires preferential entry into the markets of Great Britain for her wheat, flour, oatmeal, animal products, timber, wine products, and fish; and she desires the preferential treatment without surrendering the essential features of her own Tariff policy, which is a moderately protective one. She would readily grant to Great Britain preferential treatment to a greater extent than at present, but she would probably decline to permit this preference to reach a point that would threaten her own industries, established under the moderate protection inaugurated in 1878. It may be assumed with confidence that neither Canada nor Australia can accept absolute free-trade with Great Britain. The dream of certain classes in these colonies is that preference, to an extent that would give them material advantage in the British markets over foreign countries, can be obtained, while they will be allowed to retain the distinctive features of their own policy at present in force. A preference of this amount (10 per cent.) as against the United States, Russia, and other food-export countries, would give to Canada and to the wool-growing and to the mutton and beef-raising interests of Australia very important advantages.

That shows the ignorance at the bottom of this preferential idea, because this Canadian writer is not aware that we produce wool so largely that a preferential Tariff can do nothing for us in this respect. He goes on to say—

She (Canada) has no preference in the British market whatever, while she gives British manufactures the preference above mentioned. When moderate duties were recently imposed upon grain by the British Parliament—amounting to 3*l.* per cwt. on wheat, and 5*l.* per cwt. on flour—it was supposed that Canada, in return for the preference of 33*l.* per cent., would be relieved from the operation of this taxation upon her grain products. This supposition was ill founded, and no recognition of Canada's preference has been designed by the British Government. The result has been a slight soreness of feeling, which could easily be made more acute by injudicious action in the future on the part of the Imperial Government. . . . Last session I introduced into the House of Commons at Ottawa the following motion:—

“That this House is of the opinion that Canadian import duties should be arranged upon the principle of reciprocity in trade conditions so far as may be consistent with Canadian interests; that a rebate of not less than 40 per cent. of the amount of duties imposed should be made upon dutiable imports from nations or countries admitting Canadian natural products into their markets free of duty; and that the scale of Canadian duties should be sufficiently high to avoid inflicting injury upon Canadian interests in cases where a rebate of 40 per cent. or more shall be made upon the conditions aforesaid.”

These statements indicate very clearly the basis of the agitation for preferential duties in Canada. I do not think that any more purely selfish policy was ever suggested than that put forward on behalf of Canada. They desire to keep up their duties to such a point that, after the 40 per cent., or whatever the allowance may be, is taken off, they will still be distinctly protective to their manufactures, and they ask Great Britain to impose a Tariff on the imports of food, from which Canadian farmers and producers shall be free. That is not a policy which I think can commend itself to Great Britain. It is a policy which carries with it the seeds of its own defeat. It must be defeated; it cannot possibly be agreed to, and it is so unsatisfactory that the people of Canada themselves, when the matter is once explained to them, will be the first to repudiate such an attempt to rob the working people of Great Britain. I look forward to the coming elections in Australia with great interest. I shall strive to bring about the return of a free-trade Government, which will bring the Commonwealth into line with the United Kingdom in its fiscal policy, and I believe that when once an important section of the Empire, like Australia, has sided with the old country in the matter of Tariff, all this talk about preferential duties will cease.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I do not propose to follow Senator Pulsford through the whole of his speech, but I shall begin where he left off with his slight reference to preferential duties. Judging by the cablegram in the Age to-day, the time is close at hand when every public man in Australia will have to declare himself either for or against preferential duties. I notice that Senator Pulsford made a reference to what is known in free-trade circles as natural protection, although he did not call it by that name. I wish to point out to him that the butter sent from Australia enters the United Kingdom on exactly the same terms as does the butter sent from Denmark. But we have to get it carried in cool chambers 11,000 miles. No cool chambers are required for the Denmark butter, which has to be carried only 800 or 900 miles. Great Britain gives her own people no preference. The foreigner sends his goods under the same conditions as our people send theirs. The American sends his wheat 3,000 miles; we send ours 11,000 miles, and we had to pay the same duty after April of last year that the American had to pay. It is the same with the Argentine Republic. She sends her wool and wheat to Great Britain under the same conditions as we do, only she is 4,000 miles nearer to Great Britain. She sends her stuff about 7,000 miles, and we send it 11,000 miles. Great Britain does not give her children the slightest preference in comparison with these foreign countries. So I do not know that we have a great deal to be thankful for. Free-traders always fall into one mistake about this matter. They speak of the mercantile community or the buyers and sellers of Great Britain as though they were the Government of Great Britain. A man goes into a business like buying wheat or tallow to make money out of it, and he buys that article which pays him best. The nation has no control over the transaction. But the nation can show some preference if it thinks fit. Senator Pulsford has made some references to the Postmaster-General, who will, however, be able to speak for himself if he is given an opportunity of speaking again in the course of this debate. He compared the Postmaster-General's method of dealing with those who try to over-reach the Postal authorities with the method adopted by the Minister for Trade and Customs with those who try to over-reach the Customs authorities. The Postmaster-General made it clear the other day, to my mind at all events, that the reason why he deals with these cases and inflicts fines is that the offenders are nearly all of the poor and ignorant class who do not understand that they are breaking the law if they stick a letter into a parcel. They think it is all right, and that it does not matter, because it does not cost the Government any more to carry a parcel with a letter in it than it would cost to carry the parcel without the letter. But that cannot be said in the case of the importers. They are not ignorant people. They are well informed, and are surrounded by educated people who understand thoroughly well what they are doing.

Senator PULSFORD.—What about the ship's cook?

Senator STYLES.—Honorable senators opposite have attached undue importance to the "slush case." It is a farce to talk so much about it. Senator Pulsford has reflected upon the Minister, because he administered the Customs of Australia for nine months without taking any extreme steps. But the honorable senator knows perfectly well that during that time the Minister had to administer six different Tariffs, and had at the same time to prepare his measures, including the Tariff, for submission to Parliament. He knows that during that period the Minister must have been up working day and night, doing enough for two or three men. Yet the honorable senator grumbles, because the Minister did not look into all the details for himself, as he is now doing. Of course he did what any other business man would do under the circumstances. He allowed the various officers to administer the Tariffs then in force, until the Commonwealth Tariff was passed, and we had uniform customs duties, when the Minister himself took charge. He only had the name of taking charge before. I agree with the action of the Minister in every respect. I think it was his duty to do as he has done. He may have over-strained it a little at times, but there is nothing like launching a large new concern properly at first, so as to let every one understand from the highest to the lowest that they are to act strictly in accordance with the letter of the law. No doubt the Minister had that in mind. He thought—"If we can start this thing well at the commencement it will run smoothly after a little while." And what after all are these mistakes of which we have heard so much? I suppose that during the time to which I am now referring there must have been £15,000,000 or £17,000,000, probably nearer £20,000,000, collected in customs duties. I suppose there have been hundreds of thousands of entries. And after all, seeing that a new Tariff had to be administered by men who had got into grooves under other systems, I think there have been very few complaints, and very few reasons for complaint. The Minister may have been harsh at times, but he acted rightly in being harsh in launching a new system. That seems to me, as a business man, what any business man would have done who had to start a new system. He would be very particular at the outset, knowing that when things got into smooth working order everything would go rightly. The honorable senator accuses the Minister of doing what he has done for the purpose of gaining political kudos. Whether he did so or not, he has got it.

He is now the most popular man in public life in Australia. Senator Gould may laugh, but it is quite true. This importers' friend to whom I am now referring—Mr. Kingston—stands head and shoulders above every public man in Australia in popularity. And I say advisedly that he is the importers' friend. I decline to believe that the bulk of the importers of Australia are dishonest men. The bulk of them are honest, but if only three or four in a hundred are dishonest, is not the Minister the importers' friend if he brings them to book? The honest and straightforward importer ought to be glad to see the dishonest persons punished. There may be cases of hardship, but I should like to know whether in the conduct of any business that any honorable senator has anything to do with cases of hardship do not arise. It must be so in connexion with the biggest concern in Australia, where there are hundreds of people to come into contact with every day. There are cases of hardship in small business concerns. At all events, in my opinion the Minister for Trade and Customs has acted very wisely and very well. I understand that when an honorable senator is speaking on the address in reply, he is at liberty to wander over the political field in almost every direction. That is the reason why I have followed the tracks of the boisterous previous speaker, who has wandered all over the country. But I should like now to speak in rather a different strain. I am going to refer first of all to the matter of the £200,000 naval subsidy. I am sorry to say, as a supporter of the present Government, that I am entirely opposed to any bargain of the kind. In 1887 a bargain was entered into between these six States—then colonies—and the Imperial Government, under which the Australian colonies agreed to pay £106,000 a year as their share towards the maintenance of the British Navy. Under that agreement there was what is known as the Imperial fleet, and also the Australian squadron, the former consisting of eight ships of various sizes, and the squadron consisting of seven ships. The latter is now known as the Australian auxiliary squadron. The capital cost of that squadron was £854,000. These States have paid £1,500,000 already for property originally worth £854,000.

Senator DRAKE.—What about the maintenance?

Senator Styles.

Senator STYLES.—I understand about the maintenance. I do not base any argument upon these facts, but I wish to observe that for the £1,500,000 which we have paid, we have not got a gun to show nor a trained man to put forward.

Senator FRASER.—If we had had the other arrangement we should have spent double the amount, and had nothing to show for it.

Senator STYLES.—Honorable senators are aware that there was a conference of Australian naval experts who, I believe, originally came from the United Kingdom some years ago. Having come from the United Kingdom they must have been good men.

Senator FRASER.—Not necessarily.

Senator STYLES.—I thought that, as a matter of course, they would be good men if they came from the British Navy. At all events they were naval experts, I take it, and knew more about the subject than any man here knows. They sat in 1899, and this is what they say in reference to the Australian auxiliary squadron, in the up-keep of which these States have spent £1,500,000.

When the Auxiliary Squadron was first established by agreement between the colonies and the Admiralty, it was generally understood in Australia, at any rate, that the ships would form a means of drilling and training Australian seamen. This expectation has never been realized. Payment in specie in return for naval defence, furnished in toto by the mother country, makes no advance whatever. Twenty or 50 years hence Australia's ability for sea defence—self defence—will be as to-day, and as it was ten years ago.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—What is the honorable senator quoting from?

Senator STYLES.—From the report of a conference of naval experts. The conference consisted of Captain Hixson, from Senator Gould's own State; Captain Creswell, from South Australia; Commander Collins and Captain Tickell, from Victoria; and a representative from the State of Queensland. The other two States now forming the Commonwealth were not represented. These are all officers who were trained in the United Kingdom. They are experts. As a layman I am bound to accept their opinion as valuable. They were paid by the States because of their expert knowledge. If they were not worth the money that was paid to them the States would not have kept them, I suppose. The other day Senator Dobson startled me, as he sometimes does, by interjecting, while Senator Symon was speaking, that instead of paying £200,000 towards the British Navy, our fair share would be nearly £4,000,000. I wondered how he arrived at that figure, and he told us in his own speech how he arrived at it. He said that on a population basis our share would be from three to three and a half millions sterling. I understand from that argument that because Australia contains about one-tenth of the population of the United Kingdom, we ought to pay one-tenth of the annual outlay on the British Navy. That is surely an extraordinary argument. I never heard such an argument in the whole of my life. I looked up Senator Dobson's speech in Hansard to see if I had made a mistake, and I found that this was really what he meant—that we ought to pay one-tenth of the total cost of the British Navy. That would be on the assumption that the two little islands lying off the west of Europe constituted the glorious British Empire, on which the sun never sets. But Great Britain is only a portion of that Empire. It is true that she forms the heart of it, but so far as concerns area and population, she is only a portion of an Empire which consists of three hundred and sixty-one millions of people.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—How many of those are blacks?

Senator STYLES.—A great many of them.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—And the honorable senator would pole-axe them.

Senator STYLES.—No I would not, though I am not in favour of their being employed on board the steam-ships which are subsidized to carry our mails. They are to be kept out of the count in a case like this, but are to be employed on our mail steamers. If I am correct, and I believe I am, in estimating the population of the Empire at 361,000,000, we form one-ninetieth part and not one-tenth part of the British Empire, and on a population basis we ought to pay one-ninetieth of the £33,500,000 per annum required to keep the British Navy going. But I am going to show that we should not pay anything.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The honorable senator would put us on an equality with the coloured subjects.

Senator STYLES.—Great Britain trades with the merchants of Ceylon, India, the Mauritius, and Hong Kong. Is her trade with the coloured people there worth nothing?

Are they not to pay a share, whether white or black, if their trade is protected? As I have said, we ought apparently to pay a one-ninetieth part of the £33,500,000 representing the cost of the British Navy, and that would be £372,000 a year.

Senator BEST.—Is it £33,500,000.

Senator STYLES.—I think my figures are practically correct. I have looked up the Statesman's Year-Book on the subject.

Senator BEST.—Do they include India's contribution?

Senator STYLES.—I think so. But a difference of £1,000,000 will not affect the proposition I am about to state. What is it that the navy has to protect? It is not our merchandise that has to be protected, but the ships themselves. We run many ships, but, so far as ocean-going vessels are concerned, not one of them is owned in Australia. They are all owned in Great Britain, and all the income which they earn belongs to Great Britain.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—What about the bullion sent home from here.

Senator STYLES.—If the ship is protected, and belongs to Great Britain, every shilling which she earns going to Great Britain, the Imperial authorities are bound to protect the bullion.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—But that bullion is our property.

Senator STYLES.—If the honorable senator sends sovereigns from here to Ballarat he does not protect them; the State which runs the railway by which they are carried does so. In the same way Great Britain should protect the goods which are put into her vessels, just as the German or French Government would do in the case of goods sent by vessels owned in those countries. From that point of view it would appear that we should not pay anything towards the maintenance of the Imperial fleet. But these facts do not relieve us from the duty of protecting our coastal vessels. We have a right to protect our coastal trade in any circumstances. If we were to pay half the cost, while Great Britain paid half, that would be a fair way of dealing with the matter. The responsible authorities at each end would each practically pay half, leaving out the ports of call, which really ought to pay something as long as we do so.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—We are not going to pay half under the proposed arrangement.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Not one-fiftieth of the cost.

Senator STYLES.—I have pointed out already that we form one-ninetieth part of the 361,000,000 people constituting the British Empire—

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—How many white men are there? That is a fair way of considering the matter.

Senator STYLES.—I cannot say. The question put by the honorable senator is a very fair one, but, white or black, they are all British subjects.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator would not allow the black British subjects to come here.

Senator STYLES.—But their trade has to be protected as well as our own. If a ship is sent from Ceylon to England with a consignment of tea, that shipment, which has been grown by coloured men, has to be protected just as has a shipment of wool grown by white men in Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—And their ports have to be protected.

Senator STYLES.—Exactly. A reasonable way of dealing with the matter is to ascertain, first of all, what would be our share on a population basis. I am taking Senator Dobson's own words. On a population basis, our share seemingly would be £372,000, that being a one-ninetieth part of the cost of the British Navy. But the authorities at the other end should be required to pay half, and our share would thus be £186,000 per annum.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The Imperial authorities are asking for only £200,000 a year.

Senator STYLES.—They have asked for enough. We may take it that when the authorities at home go into these matters we are only as a parcel of children compared with them.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—They ask us to pay five-twelfths of the cost.

Senator STYLES.—No. What they have done has been to take figures similar to those used by Senator Dobson. Perhaps they have taken the white population of the British Empire.

Senator DRAKE.—We are asked to pay five-twelfths of the cost of the Australian Squadron. The cost is not to exceed £200,000, but it may be less.

Senator STYLES.—I would point out that under the old agreement provision was made for two fleets—for an Imperial fleet and what is known as the "Australian auxiliary squadron," one comprising eight vessels and the other seven. The arrangement will be upset by the new arrangement, and there will be one fleet instead of two separate ones.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That was the case before.

Senator STYLES.—No. I am going to show why the authorities in Great Britain desired this alteration. It is made quite clear. If all the vessels on the Australian States were combined and called a "British Imperial Fleet," then, as a matter of course, the Admiral would be in a position at any time to say to his officers "Such and such a vessel shall go to the China station and another shall go to South Africa," and so forth. In this way we should be left wholly unprotected. But under the agreement entered into in 1887, between these States and the United Kingdom, that could not be done.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—They did it, nevertheless.

Senator STYLES.—Then they broke the agreement, and, therefore, we should not trust them again.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is unworthy of the honorable senator.

Senator STYLES.—If they broke the agreement—

Senator BEST.—Was it not done by arrangement?

Senator STYLES.—I do not know. I was not aware that the agreement had ever been broken. Senator Gould informs me, however, that it has been, and I assume from his interjection that the Imperial authorities broke it in spite of us. Of course, if we consented through our representatives to the adoption of that course the matter must end there.

Senator BEST.—Of course, it does.

Senator STYLES.—I propose to make it clear why in a landsman's phraseology the authorities in Great Britain desire to see one body of ships here instead of two. The agreement made in 1887 between Great Britain and these States provided that the squadron—

Shall consist of five fast cruisers and two torpedo gun-boats as represented by the Archer (Improved type) and Rattlesnake classes. . . . Of these three cruisers and one gun-boat shall be kept always in commission.

I come now to the point to which I desire to direct special attention—

These vessels shall be retained within the limits of the Australian station. . . and in times of peace or war shall be employed within such limits in the same way as are Her Majesty's ships of war, or employed beyond those limits only with the consent of the colonial Governments.

The stipulation that these vessels shall be employed beyond these limits "only with the consent of the colonial Governments" is what the Imperial authorities want to break through. As a matter of fact there were seven colonial Governments concerned, because New Zealand was a party to the agreement, and paid about £20,000 per annum, in addition to the £106,000 per annum which we contributed. I have not had the privilege of reading the agreement now proposed; I do not think it has yet been distributed, but I understand that there is to be only one fleet, in substitution for the two fleets—the fleet and squadron as they are called, at present on the station—and that it is to go away at any time the Admiral sees fit. That is, I believe, the substance of the agreement, and that is what I strongly object to. I strongly object to Australian money being paid under any such agreement. I, for one Australian public man, hold that we should not pay away our money in this way without having some voice in regard to the manner in which it is to be expended. We are to tie ourselves down under this proposed agreement nominally for ten years, but in reality I think it will be for fifteen years. The old agreement was to run for ten years, but it is still going on, and probably the one now proposed will remain in force for fifteen years.

Senator DRAKE.—The total naval force is not to be restricted to the squadron.

Senator STYLES.—I have not seen the agreement. I am only going on the documents to which I have had access. In regard to Australian matters I prefer to take the opinion of the naval experts which we have in Australia. Honorable senators have before them two documents bearing on this matter—one a report of the naval conference, and the other a report by Captain Creswell, formerly of South Australia. The impression made upon my mind in reading his report is that he is a very good man for his position. He was one of the board of experts which sat in 1899, and since then he has prepared a report of his own. As a matter of fact he was at one with the other members of the board, who said an expenditure of £191,000—

Controlled by the Federal Government, would be sufficient to provide for the maintenance of five second-class cruisers in peace time . . . and for the raising and maintenance of a reserve of sufficient strength to provide not only for manning these vessels in time of war, but also to furnish a source from which men would be available to meet Imperial naval requirements and to make up waste.

I submit that we must listen to these men.

Senator DRAKE.—But they propose to give us only one ship at a time.

Senator STYLES.—I apprehend that we cannot expect to get five second-class cruisers at once. I believe that a second-class cruiser of the "highflyer" type is generally of 5,600 tons burthen, and would cost about £300,000. As each one of these vessels was put in commission under the scheme proposed by the board we should say to the Imperial authorities—"Take some of the others away." I know enough about the matter to satisfy me that the five cruisers referred to in the board's report would blow out of the water in a very short time the whole of the fifteen vessels at present here. There is only one among the fifteen which could stand amongst them. That vessel has a big gun.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Is that the Protector?

Senator STYLES.—No, I am referring to the Royal Arthur, a vessel of about 7,700 tons, which has one 9·2 gun. The proposal is that we should have a couple of vessels of that kind.

Senator DRAKE.—Under the proposed agreement we are to get one first-class cruiser, two second-class cruisers, four third-class cruisers, and four sloops.

Senator STYLES.—The second-class cruisers referred to in the agreement proposed probably are only small vessels. In his report dated 7th February, 1902, Captain Creswell said—

An appropriation extending over ten years, setting aside £300,000 to £350,000 annually for naval defences, would be a more satisfactory arrangement. It would suffice to provide a fleet of five cruisers suitable for our defence, and leave no debt.

It would provide a sinking fund as well. Captain Creswell went on to say—

If continued even at a reduced amount it would provide for all renewals as required.

Referring to the special type of cruiser, not for long sea voyages, but for the defence of Australia, he says—

By adapting our design to the favouring conditions of a long coast line with many coaling ports, we can . . . largely increase the armament and gun power. . . . Gun power can be so largely increased in an Australian ship that she would be equal to a ship twice her tonnage.

Captain Creswell is one of our leading experts in Australia, and he explains that if a vessel has not to go long journeys, she can have double the gun power in proportion to her tonnage that a vessel would have if she had to go all over the world.

Senator BEST.—For £350,000 a year more.

Senator STYLES.—No, £300,000. I went into this matter before I saw this report, and it seemed to me that five of these ships could be provided for £1,500,000. The working of them would cost about £150,000 a year, interest £45,000 and sinking fund £80,000, making £275,000 a year. Assuming that it would cost £300,000 instead of £200,000 a year, it must be remembered that £200,000 a year means 1s. per annum per head of our population of 4,000,000. The other £100,000 would mean 6d. per head more, and I do not think we should find one man in 100 who would grumble at that.

Senator PEARCE.—And the ships would belong to us.

Senator STYLES.—And, as my honorable friend says, the ships would belong to us.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The estimate is £300,000 a year, and £47,000 a year for maintenance, up-keep, and interest.

Senator STYLES.—I think not. Captain Creswell speaks of from £300,000 to £350,000. He says that to set aside £350,000 annually for naval defences—and that includes everything, and not merely the ships—would be a more satisfactory arrangement, that it would suffice to provide a fleet of five cruisers suitable for our defences, and would leave no debt behind. And if continued, even at the reduced rate, it would provide for all renewals as required—that is, new vessels.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—No; that would not include new vessels.

Senator STYLES.—This is one of the great disadvantages under which the Senate labours. We have here several honorable senators who are well acquainted with military matters, to whom I listen with the greatest attention upon those subjects, but so far as I know we have no one here who can lead us upon questions like this, and in the absence of such advice we must be guided entirely by the experts whom we pay. Of course I am aware that an Australian has no honour in his own country, and that if we require a man, whether it be to manage a railway or to build a ship, we send to some other country for him. For all that, we have managed to build our own railways, and we shall build our own ships and work them, too, as well as pay for them.

Senator BEST.—What would be the probable condition of these ships at the end of ten years?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—They would be obsolete in five years.

Senator STYLES.—I thought that would come, and I admit that it is a very pertinent comment.

Senator PEARCE.—It is not the case so far as the South Australian gunboat, the Protector, is concerned.

Senator STYLES.—That is so. The Protector is 19, and the Cerberus is 30 years old, and is as good a vessel as when she was first sent here.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—With muzzle-loaders?

Senator STYLES.—She needs to be re-armed, I admit. Her armament may be out of date, but the vessel herself is not out of date, and if she had 8-inch breech-loading guns in her, I am told she would now be more than a match for any vessel that could find its way into Hobson's Bay. It must be remembered that the Orlando, which is on the China station, and which was the flagship on this station, is fifteen years old. One of the vessels of the Australian Squadron, the Penguin, for which we are paying, was built in 1876. She is still in harness or in commission, as they call it in the navy, somewhere in the Southern Seas. I should like Senator Zeal to find out, as he may do from "Brassey's Annual," when every one of these ships was built, and what she cost. There is another point to be considered: Australians would man our own ships, whilst the ships coming from England are manned there, and change their crews every two or three years. While I was in Adelaide two or three weeks ago, 139 men and officers, bringing the number up to 150 or 160, were coming out to replace some of the men on the vessels of the Australian squadron because they had been three years on the station. Nearly every shilling earned by the men on board the fifteen vessels is sent to Great Britain.

It is not expended here amongst the people who do the paying.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Do not the men spend their wages here?

Senator STYLES.—No; most of them send their wages to their wives. I am told that what they spend here is only a trifle.

Senator PEARCE.—There is not very much for them to spend.

Senator STYLES.—They have not much to spend, but they send their wages home, naturally enough, to their own people. With our own fleet it appears to me that there would be perhaps £150,000—it is not a great deal, but it is something—to spend amongst the people of Australia who pay for the fleet.

Senator DRAKE.—This agreement proposes that four of the ships should be manned by Australians and New Zealanders.

Senator STYLES.—I did not know that, and, like the old Scotchman, I still have some doubt on the subject. I understand from Senator Gould that the squadron was taken away at one time.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—One vessel.

Senator STYLES.—The statement was made by the board of experts, who sat four years ago, that not one Australian had been trained to naval warfare in the ships of the squadron, although it was understood that they were to be so trained.

Senator BEST.—The proposed agreement is clear upon that point.

Senator DRAKE.—Yes; three drill ships and one other vessel are to be so manned.

Senator STYLES.—When the matter comes before us later on I hope to be better primed.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Four of these ships are to be manned by our own men.

Senator STYLES.—I understand that perfectly well.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Then why did not the honorable senator say so? He kept it back.

Senator STYLES.—I have just told honorable senators that I have never seen the proposed agreement. I have also said that it was understood that the other vessels were to be manned to a certain extent by Australians, and yet the experts have told us that not one Australian was trained on board of them.

Senator BEST.—Was it in the agreement?

Senator STYLES.—I do not know.

Senator DRAKE.—Why not suspend judgment until the honorable senator knows what is really in the agreement?

Senator STYLES.—My judgment is already formed. I do not care two straws what the agreement is. I shall go for an Australian navy to protect our own floating trade, and not to protect oversea trade at all. If Great Britain protects that trade, she will do her duty, for all the money goes to her, and not to us.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—So she does protect it.

Senator STYLES.—And quite right, too. It has been pointed out by the Age that if we did not spend 1s., Great Britain would have to protect that trade. What we require to do is to protect our own coasting vessels that carry the trade which belongs to the Commonwealth. We should spend our money in doing that work.

Senator PEARCE.—And we should then be doing our duty.

Senator STYLES.—We are willing to do that, and I ask whether that is not coming to the assistance of the British Empire. If we have five vessels of our own here the whole of these fifteen vessels may be taken away, and used for service in other parts of the world. We are quite willing to pay £300,000 a year, and I am prepared to say that 99 out of every 100 men in Australia will agree that we should pay £300,000 to have our own ships manned by our own men, who will spend their money amongst us, and live amongst us, and who will have an interest in the place, which no men coming here from the United Kingdom can possibly have, because they will be interested in defending their own homes, their own people, and their own property.

Senator DAWSON.—The proposal now made is to destroy the Australian navy.

Senator STYLES.—There is one little question upon which I should like to say something, and that is the employment of coloured labour in mail boats. I was delighted to listen to Senator Pulsford this afternoon upon this subject. I could almost believe that one of the labour senators was speaking when the honorable senator came out so straight. The labour senators I think were absent when Senator Pulsford told us that he disliked the coloured man and would keep him out if he could. I think I am right in saying that I was the first federal member of either House who directed attention to this question of coloured labour in mail boats. All the rest thought of it no doubt, but I was the first to mention it, and I refer to the fact only to show that I desire to be consistent. The argument is that we cannot do without coloured labour in the mail boats. We are referred to the P. and O. Company who have used coloured people for many years past, and coloured labour on the mail boats is said to be indispensable because they use it. But up till within a year or two the Orient Company, whose boats are quite equal to those of the other company, so far as a landsman can judge, worked the whole of their vessels without coloured labour.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—They have had to give that up.

Senator STYLES.—They employ coloured men only as stokers, even now ; and I can tell the honorable and learned senator that I went from here to Adelaide the other day on the Urotara, which had not a darkie on it at all. Senator McGregor was also on board that vessel, and I do not know that he saw one.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I never smelt one.

Senator STYLES.—I am told that on the French and German mail steamers only Frenchmen and Germans are employed, men who will spend their money in their own country.

Senator PEARCE.—There is a stipulation in connexion with the German line, that none but Germans shall be employed.

Senator STYLES.—I am told that that is so.

Senator DRAKE.—The French boats employ Arab stokers.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—A subsidy of 8s. 4d. per mile is given to the Norddeutscher-Lloyd line.

Senator STYLES.—But there is a bigger question behind all this, and one of very much more importance to my mind as a Britisher, and I am as English as they are made I hope. That is the danger of our vessels becoming manned by coloured crews or aliens of any kind.

Senator BARRETT.—As they are in Great Britain.

Senator STYLES.—That is at the bottom of the whole of this question. The Mercantile Marine of the United Kingdom has, in times gone by, been the recruiting ground for the British Navy. That is where the men came from who did the "deeds that won the Empire." We are, of course, told by the jubilant free-trader that the oversea trade of the United Kingdom is expanding. So it is, largely expanding every day. They say to us—"Look at our enormous mercantile fleet," and when we look at it, we find that 70 per cent. are "boys of the bull-dog breed," and the other 30 per cent. are coloured men or white aliens.

Senator PEARCE.—The black-and-tan terrier breed.

Senator STYLES.—For the fifteen years ended 1900 it was shown by returns laid before the British Parliament that there were 43,000 seamen added to the mercantile navy of the United Kingdom. Of these 19,000 were coloured men, and 12,000 were white foreign aliens, so that 31,000 out of the 43,000 sons of the sea were not British-born at all, and only 12,000, or about 28 per cent., of the increase in fifteen years to the mercantile navy of the United Kingdom were "boys of the bull-dog breed" coming from the country from which we hail, and the rest were aliens. That is the most serious aspect of the matter, and it is very much more serious than the employment of one or two aliens in half-a-dozen ships, and anything which this Parliament, or anybody, can do to stem that tide should be done, even if it involves loss. When you find a paper laid before the Imperial Parliament only two years ago, showing that out of 43,000 additional hands in fifteen years there were 31,000 aliens, it is about time to think over the matter, and to take every possible step to prevent the spread of this thing.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What do the ship-owners care? They will sell their souls for money.

Senator STYLES.—Like most other persons, ship-owners desire to make as much money as they can. I do not know that my honorable friends in the labour corner care about money, but I must say that I should like to make much money. I do not know, however, that I should care to employ these darkies. We are told, as we were told to-day by Senator Pulsford, to give the grand old mother country a show. So far as I can see, the ship-owners in the old country are giving the grand old foreigner and the grand old darkie all the show.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—How is the honorable senator going to assist to get rid of these foreigners?

Senator STYLES.—What I favour is the exclusion of coloured men from the two lines of mail boats that we subsidize at the rate of £36,000 a year each. When we pay such a large subsidy as £72,000 a year to the two companies we ought to have a voice in the determination of a matter which affects not merely Australia but the Empire.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—And even that subsidy does not enable them to pay their way.

Senator STYLES.—If we did not give them the subsidy, in my opinion, they would still come here. We do not subsidize the German or French lines.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The German line is subsidized to the amount of 8s. 4d. per mile, and the French to the amount of 6s. 8d. per mile, as against a subsidy of 2s. 7d. per mile to the British lines.

Senator STYLES.—Let Great Britain subsidize her steam-ships, and send them here. Let her follow the good example set by Germany and France, and serve Germans and French as her own people are served in France. No British ship is allowed to coast from port to port in France; the coasting trade is all done by French-owned vessels. Let us hear what my friend Captain Creswell says—

The great want of every previous naval war has been men to man our ships. Wholesale impressment can no longer be enforced to make up the number. . . . There is at the present time a shortage of some thousands of officers and men necessary to raise the fleet to actual war strength, even allowing for a response by 75 per cent. of the Naval Reserve—a liberal allowance.

That statement, not written with that intention, contains a caution against our doing the very thing which my honorable friends opposite wish us to do—that is, to man the boats with coloured labour. I am sorry that the leader of the Opposition is not present, as I have something to say about him. I desire to show the inconsistencies of that honorable and learned senator who is in favour, not merely of a white Australia, but of a British Australia; who would exclude white foreigners if he could, and who is yet in favour of employing coloured labour on the mail boats. It is a little inconsistent, I think.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—“British ships,” I think, was the phrase he used.

Senator STYLES.—This is what Senator Symon said the other day when he was speaking on this very question.

I am not going to stigmatize it in any way, but I hope it will be repealed. I am dealing with the difficulties created by this extraordinary and absurd—I was going to say disloyal, but I hardly like to use that term—I will say “imprudent” provision introduced into the Postal Act.

I am now going to quote from what I am sure some of my honorable friends would think was from a speech delivered by a labour member, but it is from a speech delivered by Senator Symon in the Senate in November 1901, in which he advocated not a white Australia, but a British Australia, so that he would exclude even white foreigners.

Senator DR LARGIE.—Was he electioneering?

Senator STYLES.—No; that charge is only made against the members of the Government by the free-trade party when they have nothing else to talk about. This is what he said—

We are nearly all of us agreed that Australia is peculiarly fitted to be the home of the British race. Speaking generally, we are agreed that if it is possible we should make Australia the resort and home of ourselves, of our children, and of all of the same blood who choose to come here, especially I would say of all of the same blood.

That statement was made by an honorable and learned senator who would not support the exclusion of the coloured men from the mail boats, but would exclude Germans and Frenchmen from Australia. My honorable friends in the labour corner do not go so far as he does, I am sure. He further said—

I am, and always have been, an advocate of keeping Australia—I would not limit it to Australians only—for those of British blood so far as we possibly can.

He does not say anything about British subjects there, but men of British blood like ourselves. It will be recollected that in 1896 a conference of the political and permanent heads of the six colonies of Australia and of New Zealand was held in Sydney, and from their report I propose to read an extract to show that the Government were quite warranted in taking up the attitude which they have done, and in inserting the provision excluding coloured aliens in the Post and Telegraph Act. It reads as follows:—

“This conference, having considered the reply of the London office to the stipulation of the Hobart conference with regard to the manning of the mail boats by white instead of coloured labour, recognises fully the force of the reason given by the Imperial Government against insisting on the exclusion of coloured labour, viz., the necessity of discriminating between various classes of British subjects; but, in reply, would respectfully point out that by some steamship companies the labour of the contributing colonies is excluded from employment, and an invidious preference given to the labour of countries which do not contribute to the maintenance of the service. No injustice would thus be done by the stipulation that the labour of the countries subsidizing the service only should be employed. And, therefore, this conference is of opinion that the mails to and from Australia and Great Britain should be carried by ships manned with white crews only.

That resolution was telegraphed to London; a reply came back from the Postmaster-General, and then the president of the conference sent this telegram to London—

Much regret you decline to do anything re coloured labour. We are not in a position to call for tenders on our own account, and are therefore compelled to accede to your proposal.

This pronouncement on behalf of all the colonies should be listened to, especially as it was made so long back as 1896. I propose now to say a few words on a subject which will interest Senators Pearce, De Lurgie, and Staniforth Smith. It may be called the alleged "transcontinental" railway. It is not a transcontinental railway; it is only a railway from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta. Before the colonies federated, Sir John Forrest gave the estimate of the cost of construction as £2,500,000; a few months later he raised the amount to £3,000,000; it is now stated at £5,000,000, and, no doubt, in a year or two it will be given as £6,000,000 or £7,000,000. At the present time the estimate is £5,000,000 if water can be found, and £6,200,000 if it cannot be found.

Senator PEARCE.—£5,200,000.

Senator STYLES.—I think that my honorable friend will find that my statement is correct when he refers to the report from which he quoted the other night. He then put the case for the construction of this railway very nicely and mildly, and did not ask us to commit ourselves to anything until a trial survey had been made. The first step which the Government should have taken before a shilling was spent, if they were going to do anything in this matter, was to get the legislative consent of South Australia. The Minister for Home Affairs has had a number of gentlemen traversing a part of the route, and he proposes to have a survey made. How does he know that South Australia will agree to a survey being made? If I recollect aright, the Commonwealth cannot construct, or make a yard of railway in any State without the consent of that State given in the shape of an Act of Parliament.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—South Australia may wish to know what the cost will be before she gives her consent.

Senator STYLES.—Then let South Australia ascertain the cost. I object to any money being spent on this scheme, although I may be called unfederal, unpatriotic, and narrow-minded. We are told that this railway will serve a national purpose; that is the ground on which we are asked to assent to its construction. Senator Pearce told us that if it is built, the English mails will reach Melbourne two days sooner than they now do. If the project comes before the Senate at a later stage, and the details are gone into, I shall show that it cannot possibly be so. Are we to spend several million pounds of the taxpayers' money merely to land the English mails here two days sooner than at present? Surely that is no great reason to justify this expenditure. I heard an honorable senator—I think it was Senator O'Keefe—interject that the railway would be a first-rate thing in case of war. Of what assistance would it be then? Senator Pearce has said that in Western Australia there are 62,000 men between the ages of 21 and 45 years. He will find, if he refers to the returns, that there are 70,000 men in that State between the ages of 20 and 50 years—men who could do some fighting for their country as citizen soldiers—and by the time this railway was built, there would be 100,000 men between those ages, supposing that its construction were begun to-morrow. Surely if 50,000 men were available they could repel any land force likely to be landed in Western Australia, especially when we remember that 70,000 or 80,000 Boers kept 200,000 Britishers at bay, so to speak, for two years, and the attacking troops had only half the distance to travel.

Senator PEARCE.—We shall not have an ammunition factory in each State.

Senator STYLES.—That is quite true, but I suppose that a supply of ammunition will be provided. An enemy's vessel would have to bring her ammunition; she would not manufacture her own supply, and we should provide our own supply. It is quite clear to me that this line is not required for defence purposes, so far as a land force is concerned. It could not be used, I think, in the case of the bombardment of Fremantle. It would be of no service in that respect. You could not take guns and put them into the forts when the action began. It would not be a bit of good to Western Australia. She would be able to defend herself against any land force. The true defence for that State is good batteries, with good guns in them.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable senator put his opinion against that of military experts?

Senator STYLES.—No, I am only expressing my opinion as a layman. But that is how the matter affects my mind, and I happen to have a vote in this Senate.

Senator PEARCE.—The military experts say the railway will be of value.

Senator STYLES.—I shall read what they say with a great deal of interest, but it seems to me that the only point that they have put forth up to the present is with reference to a naval attack, and a railway would not assist in meeting that. I shall be told that I am very unfederal in opposing the construction of the railway. But I am going to show that it is the men who support the line who are really unfederal. Who gave us the overland telegraph line? South Australia, with only 200,000 people, showed the way. South Australia now has 580 miles of railway north of Port Augusta, paid for out of her own pocket. She has altogether 840 miles of railway from Adelaide in the direction of Port Augusta paid for out of her own pocket.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator means owed for.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Paid for out of the Britisher's pocket.

Senator STYLES.—Of course, paid for out of borrowed money, as this Western Australian railway will be if it is built at all. No matter when it is built, it will be paid for out of borrowed money. I am only pointing out how unfair it would be to do damage to South Australia. She is at present building a harbor at a cost of half a million of money to accommodate ships that come to her shores. This expenditure has been incurred—millions of money over the railway, and another half-million for shipping accommodation—and the whole of it is to be thrown aside for the sake of this so-called transcontinental line. Then we are going to add insult to injury by asking South Australia—if the line is to be paid for on a population basis—to pay nearly £500,000 to ruin herself.

Senator PEARCE.—Oh!

Senator STYLES.—That would be her share on a population basis, for she has about one-tenth of the total population. She is to be asked to pay £500,000 for a railway that will postpone the completion of her own north and south transcontinental railway indefinitely. If the railway now running to Oodnadatta was completed to Port Darwin, it would be possible to run a train from Adelaide to Port Darwin, so as to bring the English mails to the Eastern States in about eight or ten days less time than is now the case. We could connect Port Darwin with the trans-Siberian railway by steam-ships, and We could then save quite eight or ten days in our European mail service.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable senator think that Western Australia should build the line herself and still keep so large a proportion of Victoria's population as she does now?

Senator STYLES.—My honorable friend, Senator Smith, told the people in the North-eastern district of Victoria, some time ago, that four out of every six men in Western Australia were Victorians. According to that statement Western Australia is merely a dependency of Victoria. What would become of Western Australia if you took the Victorians away? There would be no Western Australia left—no one to fight for.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Our State is Victoria's milch cow.

Senator STYLES.—I thought when I heard that statement, that the honorable senator had made a good point in favour of Victoria.

Senator BARRETT.—Victorians are making Western Australia.

Senator STYLES.—There is another matter—that of the federal capital. I do not think I should have said anything about it, except that I interjected while Senator Millen was speaking on the subject. I only wish to explain that the Commonwealth Bill of 1898, framed by the Convention, was rejected by New South Wales; then another Bill was framed by the Premiers of the six States, who had no mandate from the people, and no mandate from their respective Parliaments.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But the people condoned their offence.

Senator STYLES.—The Bill was placed before the people of Australia, and it was accepted by them. The people had to accept the whole of it or none. I suppose that the great bulk of the people preferred to accept it, even with that blot upon it—and it was a blot. This Parliament should have been allowed to decide where the capital was to be. But it is in the bargain that the capital shall be in New South Wales, and no one wants to get off from that bargain so far as I am aware. All I have to urge is that it shall remain in abeyance until such time as we have a greater population, so that there may be more people to bear the money loss which will be entailed in building this bush capital. Senator Pulsford this afternoon cried aloud about the grain duties, which, he said, had imposed taxation of about £500,000 upon the people for one year. Suppose it is true that those duties increased the price of grain to the consumer by £500,000 for one year. Senator Pulsford is in favour of the erection of the federal capital, which would compel the spending of £500,000 every year for many years—and this for the erection of a town which is not required. Five hundred thousand pounds, according to Senator Pulsford, is too much to be paid upon grain in one year, although the money goes into the Treasury; but £500,000 per annum is not too much to spend upon a capital that is not required at all! Last session many of my honorable friends opposite and myself were at one in refusing to sanction the expenditure of borrowed money on additions to post and telegraph offices throughout the Commonwealth. That resolution was a good one.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—But this is a great national work.

Senator STYLES.—It would be a great national blunder. The capital is not required for legislative, administrative, industrial, or defence purposes, and I hope to goodness that Parliament will not go any further than talk about it. It is in the Constitution that the capital shall be in New South Wales. That is a bargain. But there is something else in the Constitution—that the seat of government shall in the meanwhile be in Melbourne. It is only a question as to how long. What is a fair and reasonable thing, seeing that the people of Victoria have spent £50,000 upon a new Parliament House, handing over this building to the Federal Parliament; that they have leased a new residence for the State Governor and handed over the large mansion on St. Kilda-road to the Governor-General; and that they have incurred lots of other expenses? Surely every fair-minded man will say that we should not “up stick and away” directly after Victoria has done all this. We have been told that New South Wales came into the Federation on account of this provision in the Constitution. I do not think so poorly of the people of that State as to believe that a matter like that would have brought them in. What induced them more than anything else to enter into the Federation was the prospect of Inter-State free-trade, which was something worth trying for. It was not for the sake of a few buildings being stuck somewhere in the back blocks that they came in. As a matter of fact, their own Premier is opposed to the building of the federal capital. He has spoken out and said—“I prefer that, as a matter of course, the capital should be in Sydney, but, failing that, it should be in Melbourne.” I understand that kind of talk. Sir John See has spoken like a shrewd, level-headed, business man. He would prefer to see the capital site question remain unsettled rather than spend some millions of money in the backblocks of New South Wales on works that are not required, and which will be a burden on the people for all time, whilst not increasing the wealth of Australia by a single pound, nor adding to the population of the Commonwealth by a single person. If the capital is erected it will simply be filled with people who will leave other parts of the Commonwealth to go and live there. They may as well remain in the States where they live at present as go there to make new homes.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Is the honorable senator going back on the promises he made at Bombala and elsewhere?

Senator STYLES.—I was not there. I had more discretion than to go trotting round there when it was raining hard. When I was at Orange I asked some people how much they thought we should have to pay if the capital were fixed at that place. One man to whom I spoke said, “Oh, not much!” I said “What do you call ‘much’?” He said, “Oh, £3,000,000!—You can buy the whole town and enough land for the capital for about £3,000,000.”

Senator DRAKE.—Did you not say the capital was going to be in the bush?

Senator STYLES.—Yes; and Orange is in the bush. It is about 200 miles from Sydney. If I remember rightly it is a bush town. I am aware that there are some honorable senators who do not know what the word "bush" means. It is called "in the country" nowadays. It used to be called "in the bush" when I was a boy. I have to refer to one other item, and then I have done. I allude to the proposed establishment of the High Court. I know no more about the subject than any other honorable senator knows, but my opinion is that the High Court is not required, because we are over-judged now. Victoria has six Supreme Court Judges. Sir Hartley Williams is about to retire on his pension, and the Government are not going to replace him. It is found that Victoria does not require six Judges. I doubt whether she wants five. We are very much over-judged, and it seems to me as a layman that the Supreme Courts of Australia could furnish a Bench when required at any time. All that has to be done is to give these men some little consideration for their extra work and to let them decide any question that arises, giving them the full powers of the Federal High Court. That would be a sensible thing to do. I am sorry that I shall have to oppose the Government in so many of these little matters. Of course we know that we who oppose them in the Senate cannot turn them out. We may damage them a little, but we cannot displace them. I certainly have no desire to displace the Barton Government. But, at the same time, I am not going slavishly to follow the Barton, or any other Government, in every detail.

Senator PEARCE.—But the honorable senator is going to knock out nearly all their policy?

Senator STYLES.—I have only dealt with three or four of the smaller items. The High Court is one that will entail an outlay of £30,000 or £40,000 a year.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—More like £60,000.

Senator STYLES.—If it is not required 60s. would be too much. If it is required let us pay the men well and properly.

Senator PEARCE.—What will it cost if we pay the State Judges to do the work?

Senator STYLES.—We might have to distribute two or three thousand pounds a year amongst them for hearing half-a-dozen cases?

It is a singular thing how unanimous the lawyers are in this matter. I should be sorry to insinuate that they are so eager because they see the prospect of more work to do; but they seem to have a weakness in the direction of the manufacture of more courts. They say that there may be a dispute at any time between two States. Well, there has been a difference of opinion between South Australia and Victoria ever since I can recollect about a slip of country about 2 miles wide on the border between the two States. But there has been no quarrel about it.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—But they had no jurisdiction in each other's territory.

Senator STYLES.—There was such a thing as an appeal to the Privy Council if they had desired to appeal to it, but they have not done so. Those who have had the destinies of Victoria, South Australia, and New South Wales in their keeping for a generation, have never come to any serious disagreement about these matters, and I do not think that anything more serious is likely to arise between the people of the different States. They have all sprung from the British race, which is noted for its level-headedness. Napoleon described the British as a nation of shopkeepers, because they always look to see which side will pay best. There is no magnificent sentimentality about them, although, of course, there may be a little when they are on the stump at election time. I hope that the Government will not feel alarmed when I say that I am going to vote against all the measures that I have named. My vote will not do them very much damage, but I am not quite sure that they will get some of these matters through.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—During the debate on the address in reply, there has been a great deal of discussion with regard to the administration of Acts passed last session. It is not my intention to touch on any of those matters. I think that they have been very well discussed, and that the discussion has to a certain extent obscured some of the very important matters which we are asked to legislate upon during the present session. I think that some of the subjects are of such magnitude, and will be so far reaching in their effect, that even in the debate on the address in reply very considerable discussion is required in order that we may form opinions and arrive at a decision in regard to them. The measures that we shall have to deal with this session are so numerous, and so important, that I am certain it will be quite impossible for us to do adequate justice to all of them during the five months at our disposal. Instead of endeavouring to make amends for their failure to call Parliament together at an earlier date, the Government are accentuating the difficulties under which we labour, by asking us to sit only two and a-half days a week. They ask us to meet practically for only eighteen or nineteen hours a week, although many of the important measures we are promised are of a very urgent nature.

Senator DRAKE.—That is for the commencement of the session.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is just as necessary that we should sit four days a week at the commencement of the session as that we should do so towards the close of the session. If all the measures outlined in the Governor-General's speech are to be legislated upon, there is danger of an endeavour being made to rush them through at the end of the session. Measures of such importance should not in any circumstances be rushed through. I can see no reason why such important measures as the Defence Bill and the Judiciary Bill should not be introduced right away. If the Defence Bill were introduced here, as it could be, and the Judiciary Bill introduced in another place, both could be discussed and dealt with without delay. Instead of that the Government propose that the Senate shall sit for two days and a half each week discussing trivial matters such as the standing orders and a Patents Bill, and practically marking time while waiting for another place. Why have we to wait for another place to deal with these measures? Simply because of the personal feeling of certain Ministers who desire to introduce their own Bills. The Senate is to be placed in a false position, and the whole business of the Commonwealth is to be delayed and interrupted because certain Ministers, from personal feelings, wish to introduce their own measures. I notice that two measures to which prominence was given last session, are not mentioned in any way in the Governor-General's speech. We had a committee appointed last session to report on the question of decimal coinage. That Committee held a great many sittings, called a number of witnesses and furnished a very voluminous and excellent report. The Government, however, have evidently dropped the whole matter and do not intend to deal with it in any way this session.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable senator wish us to deal this session with that matter as well as with all the other Bills mentioned in the Governor-General's speech?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I was going to say that we should at the earliest opportunity substitute a decimal system of coinage for the archaic and obsolete methods at present in use. We shall not have sufficient time to discuss such a question this session; but I hope that the Government, if they happen to be in office next session—which is hardly probable—will bring in a measure to deal with it. Another matter to which no reference is made in the Governor-General's speech, is the question of old-age pensions. I believe that more than half of the members elected to this Parliament pledged themselves when on the hustings to support that necessary provision. They waxed very eloquent on the sufferings of aged people who had borne the heat and burden of the day, and who, when they had reached old-age, were left to penury and starvation. They gained much applause, and no doubt not a few votes, in consequence of their utterances on this question, but now the Government have dropped it. There is no mention of it in the Governor-General's speech, and honorable senators generally by a tacit accord have agreed not to mention the matter at all. We are told now that the cost of maintaining a system of old-age pensions would be so enormous that it is impossible to introduce a measure providing for it during the period covered by the "Braddon blot."

Senator DRAKE.—Who is the honorable senator referring to?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Not to the Government's utterances, because they veil them in such a way that they commit themselves to absolutely nothing if they can help it. But there can be no doubt that the Government have dropped the proposal for an Old-age Pensions Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—In the first Governor-General's speech that matter was made subject to the financial condition of the Commonwealth.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The "Braddon blot," as it is called, is the excuse now put forward by the Government for shelving this matter. It is an excuse which they use to shield themselves from many attacks for sins of omission and commission. It is given as a reason for many broken promises on the part of the Government, and, in fact, it seems to me to be a very great source of comfort to them. It is like the little boy's definition of a lie—"a very present help in time of trouble." We are told that during the operation of the Braddon section it would be impossible to bring in a measure providing for old-age pensions—which would probably cost £1,000,000—because it would be necessary to raise £4,000,000 in order to make the requisite provision. But I would ask honorable senators to consider seriously whether that would be necessary. Last year, in addition to the three-fourths of the revenue which the Braddon section insists shall be returned to the various States, we handed over a surplus of £800,000.

Senator DRAKE.—I think the honorable senator wished, the other day, to use that surplus for post-offices.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If the Government are not going to use it for this work it might as well be put to some other useful purpose. It is estimated that the surplus for the present financial year will amount to £1,200,000—that that sum will be handed back to the States over and above what they are entitled to receive under the Braddon section.

Senator DRAKE.—And they want it.

Senator PULSFORD.—They are entitled to the whole.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is not necessary that we should raise an additional £4,000,000 per annum in order to provide for old-age pensions. It is quite possible to institute a scheme and to pay for it without any additional taxation. The reply, of course, is that to do so would be to starve the revenue of the various States, and perhaps to leave some of them in an unfinancial position. I do not believe in money being raised through the Customs, except on articles of luxury and ostentation, and such things as spirits and narcotics; but, in my desire to redeem my promises on the hustings, I should be willing to vote for a duty on tea and kerosene imposed for the specific purpose of providing for old-age pensions. That would bring in £500,000 a year. I have already said that it is estimated that we shall have a surplus of £1,200,000 for the present year, and that could be utilized.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Would not direct taxation be better?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Both the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition have said that they are opposed to direct taxation, and, therefore, it is not now within the range of practical discussion. The cost of establishing a federal system of old-age pensions is estimated at £1,000,000, but it must be borne in mind that the people of New South Wales and Victoria have recognised their responsibilities and have instituted schemes of their own. They constitute two-thirds of the people of Australia, and thus the extra cost to Australia of an old-age pension scheme would be one-third of the total sum, or about £330,000. If honorable members of this Parliament are going to redeem the pledges which they made on the hustings, they should endeavour to institute this scheme which the majority of them promised.

Senator DRAKE.—We did not promise it, although the honorable senator may have done so.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The majority of honorable members of both Houses pledged themselves to it.

Senator PEARCE.—My suggestion for a Government tobacco monopoly would provide the requisite funds.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—There are many means of providing the money if the Government were desirous of initiating the system. There are two measures outlined in the Governor-General's speech which are of special importance, because they not only affect the Commonwealth, but are of Imperial concern. I refer to the Naval Defence Bill and to a measure relating to preferential duties. These measures are of immense importance, because they practically essay to lay the foundation of an Imperial or Pan-Britannic Kriegverein and an Imperial Zollverein. They demand very wide and very careful consideration. Proposals in regard to preferential trade, however, are not likely to be discussed this session, and therefore they warrant nothing more than passing comment. At the present time the British Ministers are undoubtedly coquetting with protection. I think that Great Britain would make a fatal mistake if she abandoned the policy which has been the chief factor in her magnificent expansion, and ever increasing wealth and power, and

I sincerely hope that Australia, at the next election, will return a Parliament pledged to a revenue Tariff which is the stepping stone to a proper free-trade policy. In the event of Great Britain declaring herself in favour of preferential trade with the colonies, and in the event of Australia deciding to continue a protectionist policy, it would be well worth considering, as a choice of two evils, whether it would not be in the interests of the people of Australia to fix lower duties in respect of British goods than those relating to foreign articles in order to obtain a corresponding advantage. In any event the matter is worthy of consideration. I sincerely hope that Australia will return to free-trade, and that Great Britain will not alter the course that has so greatly enhanced her prosperity. With regard to the naval subsidy, I am convinced that if the present proposals of the Government are carried out, they are bound to prove unsatisfactory, and can only be of a tentative character. They are opposed certainly to the desires and intentions of the people of Australia. The people of Australia do not wish to be dragged into the vortex of militarism, nor to pay large sums of money for other people to protect us. They do not desire to hand over considerable sums of money to be spent by a Parliament, over which they have no control. We have in Australia an army for local defence which I think is efficient, and which has acquitted itself well in other parts of the world. Is there any reason why we should not have a fleet of our own for local defence? The people of Australia will never take any real interest in naval affairs until they have a navy of their own, manned by Australians. The only way in which Australians can be induced to take an interest in naval matters is to have a fleet of their own manned by Australian people, and that is what we should do if we desire to follow in the footsteps of Great Britain in connexion with our naval policy. We have for ten years past been paying a subsidy aggregating over £1,000,000 sterling, and, so far, we have not had a single Australian trained in the fleet. It is impossible for us not to recognise the tremendous advantage which Australia possesses in being under the ægis of the British Navy. It is the most powerful navy in the world, and it is a very great advantage to Australia to have its protection; but it will be time enough for us to of contributing to that navy when Great Britain allows us, and Australia decides to accept, a voice in its control. In the meantime, it is better for us to establish a navy of our own for local defence, which will save us from the incursions of hostile cruisers which might do an immense amount of injury. In Canada, Sir Wilfred Laurier, a very able and patriotic statesman, has said that it would be impossible for the Canadian people to contribute sums of money to be allocated and spent by the Imperial Parliament, and for other people, to defend their coastal interests. He stated plainly, as I think Sir Edmund Barton should have done, that Canada could not approve of a desire set forth by Mr. Chamberlain, the perusal of the kaleidoscopic opinions given by naval experts on the subject before me, is bewildering to the mind of a layman. As early as a few years ago the Admiralty was unanimously in favour of an Australian navy—a local fleet. Sir William Jellicoe in 1879 wrote a minute to that effect. Peter Scratchley, who had been sent here to report upon the defences of Australia, wrote to the same effect in 1881. In 1885 the British Admiralty instructed Admiral Tryon to put forward a proposition on their behalf that the Australian colonies should purchase a fleet of their own in order to provide sufficient protection for the large floating trade on Australian waters. It was thus announced on behalf of the British Admiralty in 1885, that it was necessary in the interests of Australia and of the Empire, that Australia should purchase and own a fleet. Admiral Tryon advocated a naval sea-going force localized to the Australian seas, a force additional to that of the personnel and matériel of the fleet of the Empire provided for by the Parliament in London. Sir Henry Holland, speaking of the clause of the agreement in which it was provided that the squadron should always remain in Australian waters, said—

Senator Staniforth Smith.

The Imperial Government has now given its undertaking, and we consider that the knowledge of this fact—that is, that the fleet must remain in Australian waters—will distinctly reduce the risks of attempted aggression in Australian waters.

Instead of purchasing a fleet the colonies have agreed to an annual payment

5 per cent. on the cost of the squadron, and in 1887 an agreement was come to on those lines. The squadron was to consist of five vessels of the Archer type, and two torpedo boats. That is the agreement which is still in force. It was suggested by the British Admiralty and laid before the colonial Premiers by Admiral Tryon, and will remain in force until 1905. Now we are told by naval authorities and by voluminous press writers that the very scheme instituted by the British Admiralty means "a short-sighted craze for local defence," and "a foolish doctrine."

Senator PLAYFORD.—And the ships are now obsolete.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The bargain that we made with the British was not carried out. Guns of the calibre for which we stipulated were not put into the vessels. The whole agreement has been a very lop-sided one, and it has not been a good one from an Australian point of view, because the vessels are not effective against modern armed cruisers of great speed with very heavy guns.

Senator DRAKE.—That would always happen.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The fleet for which we are at present contributing a subsidy is admitted to be practically a farce. It is well worth our while to note that whilst all the naval authorities in Great Britain have turned a complete somersault, and now state that it is a foolish absurdity for us to talk of having a navy for Australian defence, they adopt a different principle with regard to Great Britain. They have a Channel squadron, a Home squadron, and they are now instituting a North Sea squadron, whilst they have in addition armed cruisers which are not allowed to go more than 70 miles from the coast in the South of England. Let us suppose that the British Prime Minister, or the naval authorities, sent these fleets in time of war to some foreign place on an aggressive expedition and left the British coast bare, do honorable senators think that any British Ministry who consented to such a thing would last a week? Such a course of action would be abhorrent to the British people. Yet the Admiralty, whilst recognizing the necessity for having a fleet, or several fleets, continually patrolling the shores of Great Britain refer to it as being absolutely unnecessary, foolish, and a "short-sighted craze for local defence" when we propose the same protection for Australia. How can these statements be reconciled? Fifteen years ago they advocated that we should take steps in the direction of having an Australian fleet, and now they say that that is all wrong, though in the case of Great Britain they still insist upon coastal defence by special fleets, which are not allowed to leave the coast. In 1905 the existing naval agreement will come to an end, and I think it is far better, and far more in the interests of Australia and of the Empire, that the Australian people, if they cannot purchase them, should hire four or five fast armed cruisers from Great Britain. According to Captain Cresswell, such vessels of 2,000 or 3,000 tons, with heavy ordnance, could be got for about £150,000 each.

Senator DRAKE.—That would cost a lot more money.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The existing agreement does not come to an end till 1905, and it is proposed to increase the subsidy. If the proposal to increase the subsidy were not agreed to, possibly some money might be put by towards the purchase of cruisers.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They would be obsolete in a few years—that is the trouble.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It seems always to be laid down as an axiom by opponents of an Australian navy, that Australian boats would become obsolete in a few years; whereas everyone knows that the boats of other navies do not become obsolete in fifteen years.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Archer type is obsolete now.

Senator PEARCE.—What about the Protector?

Senator PLAYFORD.—She is obsolete now.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—She has been reported upon as being seaworthy and up to date for particular work, and she is I think nineteen years old. If we had four or five swift armed cruisers Australians would take an interest in naval affairs. But under present conditions when they know that they have to hand over a certain amount of money to another Parliament to spend, and have to pay other people to defend them the Australian people do not, and will not take any interest in naval matters. I say that it is in the interests of Australia and all concerned that the Australian Parliament should adopt a policy which Australians can approve instead of adopting a tentative policy which can only be a source of discord and ill-will.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We shall be getting men trained in the meantime.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Several honorable senators have spoken with regard to the construction of the transcontinental railway, and those who have spoken against the project have shown such an utter want of grasp of the large principles which underlie that question that it is necessary for me to very shortly state the facts of the case. It is admitted by all people, I think, that Western Australia came into the Federation in the belief that the result of the union would be the construction of the transcontinental line. I would go further than that, and say that that belief was justified. If we had not the actual promise, we had the implied promise of nearly all the leading statesmen of Australia, of those who took part in the various conferences and conventions, that it would be built if we entered the union. We also had the assurance of the leading statesmen of South Australia, some of whom are now the very ones who are the most bitter in their opposition.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Who are they?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Mr. Solomon is one of them. Writing to Sir John Forrest, Mr. Kingston said—

Replying to your letter of 22nd inst., South Australia has already intimated favour of federal undertaking of railway connecting east and west.

In a further communication he said—

The federal construction of this railway is, in our opinion, entirely the best means of carrying out this great Australian undertaking.

Senator GLASSEY.—Was not that written ten years ago?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—It does not matter if it was written ten years ago or only yesterday; the principles are exactly the same now as they were then. It was written, before the referendum was taken, by the Premier of South Australia to the Premier of Western Australia, and in that letter Mr. Kingston conveyed the opinion to his Cabinet.

Senator BEST.—Does the honorable senator say that Western Australia entered the Federation on the understanding that that project was to be carried out?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—the tacit understanding that it would be done. There was not a leader or any else in Australia who said one word against the project, although it was largely discussed before the federal referendum taken.

Senator HIGGS.—If that is so, the people of Western Australia are a most sensible people, because they have a five years' Tariff of their own.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—The Tariff was made, not by Western Australia but by Sir John Forrest, a member of the Commonwealth Government.

Senator BEST.—But still that was only term of the bargain.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—That was this implied contract—that the transcontinental railway would be built. Continuing Mr. Kingston, in his letter to Sir John Forrest, said—

We hope it will not be long before Western Australia and South Australia are co-operating in the Parliament of the Commonwealth to discuss this about.

When Mr. Holder was Premier of South Australia he gave a promise to the same effect. If there had been any doubt in the minds of the people of Western Australia that this railway would be built, a different vote would have been given, that is recognised by the Commonwealth Government. What do they say in the first Governor-General's speech which was addressed to this Parliament?

Isolation was the chief obstacle to the adoption of the Federal Constitution by Western Australia, until the hope of closer connexion influenced the people of the West to risk the threatened perils of the threatened political union of the continent, which their vote at the referendum did much to complete.

There is an admission that we entered the Federation in the hope that that project would be carried out. If we want a federation—a federation in spirit as well as in act—I ask honorable senators, Is it possible to consummate that federation when we have a portion of the people of Australia living on the eastern littoral, and a portion of them living on the western littoral, divided by thousands of miles of uninhabited country? At the present time it is just as difficult for us to get to the eastern States as it is for us to get to India or for the people of the eastern States to get to New Zealand.

Senator GLASSEY.—Does the honorable senator favour the floating of a loan of £5,000,000 to build that line?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — I favour the construction of the line at whatever cost. Some persons aver that the ground dividing the west from the east is sandy waste desert, but it is nothing of the sort. They ask, Why is not the country inhabited? When you have 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 persons in a continent nearly the size of Europe, you cannot inhabit all the land, although a great deal of it is very good land.

Senator BEST. — Is not the real question whether it is fit for habitation?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — I shall endeavour to satisfy my critical friend even on that point. If we want a closer union, a truer federation, we must have that railway communication. There is too great a separation between the people of the east and the people of the west for them to generate that federal sentiment which should permeate us if we are to become a great nation. We want to increase the community of interest; we want to facilitate trade and commerce, and draw the people more closely together so that we may feel that oneness which should be felt under a federal system. If we desire to make the Federation a success we ought to look at all these matters, not from a parochial stand-point, not from the stand-point of the various States, but from an Australian stand-point. I have heard speeches in the Senate, and read the reports of speeches in the other House, the authors of which have undoubtedly shown a parochial feeling, not on this question only, but on many other questions, and I as a federalist have regretted it exceedingly. When a measure has been under discussion I could tell before certain members rose what their views were; because it did not suit the State which they represented. There is too much of that feeling exhibited in the Senate and also in the other House, and if it is to be continued then the Federation will not be the success which we hope and desire it shall be. Now, we have the selection of the federal capital site to consider. The federal capital will be of no benefit to Western Australia. The selection of a site will have to be made, I hope, this session. The Constitution says that the capital shall ultimately be in New South Wales, but it also says that for the present it shall be in Melbourne. The intention and the spirit of the Constitution is that we should use reasonable haste in selecting the site in New South Wales, but the Act does not insist upon our going there for the next one hundred years. Many honorable senators who have spoken have said—for instance, Senator Styles, who preceded me, said—“There is no hurry for us to go there. The Act does not force us to go. Let us stay in Melbourne for the present.” The spirit of the Act, and the spirit of the federal contract, is that we should go to New South Wales with all reasonable haste—at any rate within a few years from the present time. That was the intention of the Constitution which many honorable senators have endeavoured to flout. Although it would suit me better to stay in Melbourne, I intend to vote for the selection of the site, and I hope that it will be made this session. Again, take the question of the bounty on sugar grown with white labour. The question is asked by the Ministry—Are the people of Australia willing to contribute per capita in order to pay the rebate on sugar grown with white labour? Senator Symon said that if this is done, this bounty of a few thousand pounds will injure the federal feeling in South Australia. It will be an expense to Western Australia as well as to South Australia to substitute the bounty system for the present system, but I am prepared to say, on behalf of the people of Western Australia, that we are quite willing to bear our share of the burden imposed upon us as the result of obtaining a “White Australia” policy. We have said to the people of Queensland—“You shall not have coloured labour.” We have increased their cost of sugar production; and as a compensation we have voted for a duty on sugar, and we have allowed them a rebate of £2 if their sugar is grown with white labour. We do not want a “white” Australia only so long as it does not cost us anything, but we are quite willing to bear our share of any burden which is imposed upon us in order to attain that great end. There is, too, the question of communication with Tasmania. If the representatives of that State can show us that it is necessary in the federal interests, at a reasonable price, to improve that communication, I shall be perfectly willing to vote with them, because I recognise that we must look at these matters from an Australian point of view. Many honorable senators, not consciously, but unconsciously, are adopting a very parochial spirit in discussing these great questions which concern the interests of the Federation, and which should serve to draw people together in a true federal spirit. Let us look at the question of the transcontinental railway from another aspect. We are going to discuss at great length this session, our military and naval defences. This line is one of the most important factors in the defence of Australia. It forms a portion of the defence scheme which was the origin and basis, I believe, of the federal compact. Reporting in 1889 on the military forces and defences of Australia, Major-General Edwards said :—

No general defence of Australia can be undertaken unless distant parts are connected with the more populous colonies in the south and east of the continent. . . . If an enemy were established in Western Australia you would be powerless to act against him. . . . The interests of the whole continent therefore demand that railways to connect Western Australia with other colonies should be made as soon as possible. . . . If an enemy were established in either Western Australia or Port Darwin you would be powerless to act against him. Their isolation is therefore a menace to the rest of Australia.

In his report on the defences of Australia Major-General Sir Bevan Edwards said—

It is hoped that the contemplated extension of the railway communication between South Australia and Western Australia may be accomplished at an early date, as without such extension Western Australia is always liable to isolation in time of war.

These are the opinions of competent military men who have been reporting on the defence of Australia, and they both state that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of defence that the States should be connected by railway communication. We are talking of spending £200,000 a year on the navy and about £600,000 a year on the military defences; and surely it is just as well to consider that point of view as one factor in the necessity for constructing the line. We have heard a great deal about the sterility of the country through which this line will pass from people who have never been over it, who know nothing about it, and who have not taken the trouble to read the reports of the experts. Honorable senators who have spoken against this scheme have been, I cannot say eloquent, but at any rate voluble, when they have come to the question of the sterility of the route. They speak of sandy wastes, of desert country, of the awful work of constructing the line through such a fearful, treeless, waterless waste as that part of Western Australia is. They seem to be especially voluble when speaking about something about which they do not know much. They are somewhat like Mark Twain, who once said that if he had to deliver a lecture, and was allowed to choose his own subject, he would choose astronomy, because he knew nothing about it, and there was more room for the exercise of his imagination. We have the report of a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, Mr. Muir, who has been through Western Australia; who has been over every inch of the country to be traversed by the line, and has reported fully upon it. He knows what the country is like between Kalgoorlie and Port Augusta which this proposed railway will cross. He says :—

For the first 100 miles from Kalgoorlie we passed through a salmon-gum forest. The timber is good and plentiful, and suitable for mining purposes. It would be impossible for me to approximate the width of this forest, but it certainly cannot be less than 50 miles wide, and, for all I know to the contrary, it may be considerably more.

Then he says—

To the north, near the 31st parallel of latitude, the country is more open. In fact, from the South Australian border for 250 miles in a westerly direction, it is one large open plain of limestone formation, fairly well grassed throughout.

So that from the South Australian border for 250 miles towards Kalgoorlie we have open rolling downs and well grassed country. Then Mr. Muir makes this statement :—

Taken as a whole, this stretch of country is one of the finest I have seen in Australia. With water—which doubtless could be obtained if properly prospected for—it is admirably adapted for grazing purposes, and will, without doubt, be taken up some day from end to end.

Here is a report from a man, who states, unless he is telling a deliberate untruth, that the country is splendid pastoral country, well grassed, and, in fact, some of the best country he has seen in Australia. He tells us that there are some 10,000,000 acres of well-grassed country. There is no surface water, and that has led some people astray. The rainfall is fair, but the ground is of such a loose and friable character that the water sinks right through it.

Senator BEST.—That is only 250 miles out of 1,200.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—But in that 250 miles you have practically gone half the distance, so far as concerns the Western Australian portion of the line. More than half of it is in South Australia. Mr. Muir goes on to say—

Apart from the facilities that would be afforded to railway construction, and the maintenance of the railway service when completed, by artesian water being struck on this waterless tract of country, it would be of incalculable profit to the State in another direction. At present there are millions of acres of splendid pastoral land lying idle in this portion of the State, solely because water has not been conserved. Once let it be known that artesian water has been discovered, and what is now nothing better than a waste would be transformed, in a very short space of time, into one of the most important stock-raising centres in our State.

Then he goes on, with regard to the cost of construction—

The construction works for the railway will be very light, and will be, practically, the laying down of a surface line for the whole length between Kalgoorlie and the border.

That is another very important point. With regard to the question of artesian water, Mr. Muir admits that what we require is an artesian supply. He points out that if we had artesian water this country would hold a very large population. Now Mr. Gibbs Maitland, who has been a Government geologist in various States of Australia, and who has the reputation of being a thoroughly sound man, has reported upon this matter, and states that the whole of the ground from the South Australian border to within 100 miles of Kalgoorlie is artesian or sub-artesian in character. I was speaking some time ago to Professor Gregory, of the Melbourne University, who is probably one of the best geologists who ever came to Australia. He has made a special study of the artesian water supplies of Australia, and he told me that there was no doubt in his mind that the whole of the country between the South Australia border and Kalgoorlie was artesian. These two reports are worthy of all the credence we can give to them. We have had boring operations carried on at Madura on the Great Australian Bight by a party who went 60 miles inland, and they struck stock water at a comparatively low depth, and plenty of it. Near the coast on the South Australian side, they have been boring and have found water along the stock route.

Senator GLASSEY.—Suppose you have artesian wells, but no grass—you could not feed the stock.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—But we have plenty of grass there, as I have already shown. We have a very fair rainfall, but the water sinks into the ground. There is no surface water. I have read from Mr. Muir's report that for 250 miles he saw some of the finest grass country he ever saw in Australia. We have also the report of the commission appointed by the Federal Government with regard to this scheme, and it is interesting as showing their view of the cost and of the probable revenue. The line via Tarcoola would be 1,100 miles long. The first cost of construction, to admit of highest speed, rails 70 lbs. to the yard, gauge 4ft. 8½in., would be £4,305,956. The Eucla branch and wharf—which I do not know are necessary—would cost £165,000. Contingencies at 10 per cent. would come to £447,095; interest during construction, £172,132; total, £5,090,183. We have had three estimates made—one by Mr. O'Connor, Engineer in Chief of Western Australian lines, one from Mr. Muir, and this one which I have just quoted, and which is the highest estimate given. Therefore we shall be right in saying that this sum is, at any rate, the maximum cost. But since then they have gone into the matter more fully, and have inspected various places. They have seen reason to reduce their estimated cost of construction. So that in any calculation which we make, or any consideration which we give to this matter, we can well say that the cost of the line will be under £5,000,000. Now, what about the revenue? They say that the annual revenue will be £205,860; working expenses, and interest at 3½ per cent. would be £292,556, showing a loss at a start of £86,696 a year. That is the cost which we are asking Australia to incur for this federal railway. It is worth it, not only from the federal and military point of view, but also from the commercial aspect. The experts appointed by the Federal Government tell us that the cost at the very inception would be £86,000 a year, a loss less than the amount we are paying as a subsidy to get our European mails a little earlier. But there is an important point which I wish honorable senators to notice. They give an estimate of the revenue in ten years time. They estimate that the revenue then will be £411,720; working expenses, £210,000; interest, £178,156; total, £388,156, showing a net profit at the end of ten years' time of £23,564 a year.

Senator HIGGS.—That is like Mark Twain's lecture on astronomy!

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—My honorable friend would take exception to the Decalogue if he takes exception to the reports of the leading engineers of the various States, who have gone very carefully into these matters.

Senator HIGGS.—Talk of the exercise of the imagination!

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—My honorable friend is the best exemplification we can have of that. There will also be a saving of two days in the mail service consequent upon the opening of this line. Then the telegraphic communication will be improved. The report states that the telegraph communication could be rendered more secure at small capital cost by making use of the railway telegraph line. The effect both in South Australia and Western Australia will be the opening up of new tracts of country for mining and pastoral development and the improvement of the revenue on existing lines in South Australia. That is the view of the leading experts of the whole of the States. Then, it is clear that there must be a considerable traffic on this line. When we consider that it will affect a population of a quarter of a million of people on one side of the continent by bringing them into communication with three and a half millions of people on the other side, it is evident that there must be a considerable amount of traffic. It has generally been stated that this line will affect Western Australia principally; but I contend that it will benefit South Australia and the other States far more than it will benefit Western Australia. At the present time the richest gold-field in Australia is Kalgoorlie.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No, Arltunga!

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is richest in imagination only! If the people of South Australia and the eastern States have direct communication with a place like Kalgoorlie, is not that of commercial advantage to them? What an advantage was it to South Australia to have railway communication to Broken Hill! Would it not also be a benefit to them to have communication with 60,000 people on the gold-fields of Western Australia?

Senator HIGGS.—Western Australia put up a Tariff against the other States.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That will be all over by the time this railway is constructed. If a gold-field like Kalgoorlie had broken out at Kimberley in the north-west of Western Australia, and situate 1,000 miles from Perth, the Government of that State would not have hesitated to build a line there because it would have been a payable commercial undertaking. And with these 60,000 people within a couple of days' journey from Adelaide, there would be an immense traffic on the trans-continental line. There would be a traffic in live stock and goods apart altogether from the carriage of mails and passengers.

Senator DOBSON.—I think the trading would be mutual, but the line would open up all the honorable senator's beautiful land.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I am glad that the honorable and learned senator admits that it is beautiful land. Light has gradually penetrated my honorable and learned friend's mind in regard to this subject. Mr. Muir reports that a great deal of auriferous country is passed through, and there is no reason why a very rich gold-field should not be found along the route.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator is altogether too hopeful.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—My honorable friend has had no experience of gold mining, and therefore he thinks that all the gold-fields in Australia have been discovered. He never made a greater mistake. There are probably more undiscovered gold-fields in Australia than have yet been found.

Senator HIGGS.—But we generally find them before we build a railway to them.

Senator PEARCE.—Kalgoorlie was not discovered when the line to Coolgardie was built.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—This is what Mr. O'Connor reports—

The railway from Kalgoorlie to Adelaide would be much cheaper than by the sea route, estimating the railway fare at 1d. per mile first class and six-tenths of a penny second class. The first class rail fare from Kalgoorlie to Adelaide would be £5 18s. 3d., and by any of the ocean liners £10 18s.; by rail second class £3 8s., by boat £8 0s. 10d.

That estimate, of course, includes the boat fare and the rail up to the gold-field. Mr. O'Connor's report continues—

As the immigration from the eastern States to Western Australia is mostly to the gold-fields, and as this amounts to thousands a month, that in itself is an enormous revenue. The consumption of meat on the eastern gold-field at present averages 200 bullocks and about 2,000 sheep a week, and it is estimated that a large proportion of this would go by the overland railway. The railway freight on a bullock from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, in full truck loads at existing railway rates, would be £3 4s. 6d., while from Adelaide to Kalgoorlie by sea the cost would be £5 3s. 6d.

It is thus laid down that at the existing railway rates it would be cheaper to send stock from the eastern States to the gold-fields by rail than by sea. As we obtain a large quantity of stock from the eastern States, it must be seen that the line would earn a very large revenue in respect of freightage. I unhesitatingly assert that the Government should immediately have a survey of the line made and bring in a Bill for its construction as soon as possible. They are adopting a hesitating attitude in regard to the matter. They insert a paragraph relating to it in the Governor-General's speech at the beginning of each session, and they go to Western Australia and give glowing accounts of what they propose to do, but unless they do something definite before the next election there will not be much chance of a single representative from Western Australia supporting them. The Government, without committing themselves even in regard to the construction of the line, should at any rate have a survey made, and thus secure an accurate idea of the cost. They should also obtain the fullest particulars as to what the freightage would be. The matter should not be considered purely from a commercial point of view. The Commission, consisting of the leading engineers of each State appointed by the Government, have said that there would be a loss of £80,000 a year at the start, but that that would be followed at the end of ten years by a profit of £23,000 per annum. Are the people of Australia willing to make a sacrifice to that extent in order to carry out defence recommendations made by the leading generals who have visited Australia and reported on the subject, and in order to bring the people of the east and west of Australia more closely together in their commercial relations. I repeat that the members of the Commonwealth Parliament should regard this matter from an Australian point of view. They should ask themselves—"Is it in the interest of Australia that this line should be built?" I ask them only to do that, but I am afraid that unconsciously they regard matters of this kind merely from the point of view of their own State. They ask themselves the question—"Will it benefit Victoria or New South Wales," or some other State which they represent, and if it will not they vote against it, just as some of them say they will vote against the sugar bonus because it does not benefit their individual State. There are other matters which I proposed to touch upon, but I have already taken up more time than I intended to occupy, and I shall defer my remarks on those subjects until the measures in question come up for discussion.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I did not intend to say anything this evening, but the constant reiteration of the word "Customs" this afternoon brought up a number of old memories, and made me feel inclined to say a word or two in defence of the Minister for Trade and Customs, if, indeed, that defence is necessary. Before I pass on to the matter of the Customs administration, I wish to say that I think that the arrangements made for the opening of Parliament were inadequate. I consider it a disgrace that the members of the Federal Ministry should have been compelled to stand in the passage leading to the chamber while the Governor-General's speech was being read. As we number only 36, there should be ample room for us on the front benches, and the members of the House of Representatives might very well be invited on such occasions to take up the unoccupied seats in this chamber. I do not see anything in such a course which would lower our dignity. On the contrary, I think it might add to our influence, and certainly it would bring about a much better feeling between the two Houses. To make honorable members of another place stand outside the chamber itself on such an occasion—as if this were a ground sacred to the members of the Senate—is to make them appear like a lot of poor relations. They certainly cannot be regarded in that way. Like ourselves, they are representative men, and although, perhaps, on account of our larger constituencies we may consider ourselves slightly more responsible to the people than they are, I venture to think that in their opinion they are equal to us in every respect. Although the matter is only a small one, it has certainly created some friction which might very well be remedied. As one has great scope in dealing with the address in reply, I wish also to refer to Howard. I hope that during this session the proceedings of the Senate will be reported verbatim. I know that owing to the length of the last session, which extended over some seventeen months, there was certainly reason for curtailing the reports in view of the 16,000 pages or more over which they extended. But the present session will not last more than four or five months, and the Commonwealth can well afford to pay for the expense of a verbatim report. As for myself, I do not think that I receive fair treatment at the hands of the press, and therefore I look to Hansard to protect me. Some of my speeches have been described in the most opprobrious terms. It was said on one occasion that I inflicted on the Senate "two hours of drivel." Thus it will be seen that Hansard is my only protection against libels of the kind. I hope that the staff will be able to give us verbatim reports of our proceedings during the present session. With regard to the Governor-General's speech and the items therein, I take exception to Senator Dobson's attitude on the question of conciliation and arbitration. The honorable and learned senator's speech was a very eloquent one. If one were permitted to make extracts from it he would certainly find in it sentences expressing great sympathy with the working classes; but if we take the honorable and learned senator's conclusions on the question of arbitration it would hardly be possible to find a stronger opponent of those very working classes than he is.

Senator DOBSON.—All I urged was that we should wait and see how the New South Wales and New Zealand Acts work.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable and learned senator referred to the operation of the Conciliation and Arbitration Act in New Zealand, and quoted one or two instances in which great dissatisfaction had been expressed by employers and by members of trade unions. Some one interjected at the time that it was possible to find defects in every Act of Parliament. Cases of hardship can be found in connexion with the administration of every Act, and if ever the honorable and learned senator's Divorce Bill becomes law he will prove to be something more than human if it can be administered without being challenged. I have here the report of an interview published in the Melbourne Herald, with Sir Joseph Ward, a prominent member of the New Zealand Government.

In referring to New Zealand and its perilous state, Mr. Ward had some reason to make in connexion with conciliation and arbitration. The following is an extract from the report—

How have you found the conciliation and arbitration courts work?

"Very little indeed. Occasionally of course there is a little friction, but this is not any great deal. It is to be found in reference to the decisions of the ordinary courts of law."

Has there been any alteration whatever in reference to the constitution or methods of the conciliation and arbitration courts since the members of the Victorian Factories Commission visited New Zealand about twelve months ago?

"No alteration of any kind has been made in the law. It has worked very satisfactorily throughout the whole colony."

Mention is then made of the fact that Mr. Seddon had been reported as having spoken unfavorably in reference to a New Zealand Court Judge presiding, and on that point Mr. Ward said—

"Yes. The way that arose was this: comment had been made by those who were affected by an award made by the court. Mr. Seddon then made the statement that it was desirable that the judgment of a Supreme Court Judge should be criticised in a way that was complimentary to the dignity of the Supreme Court Bench. But the Premier has made a statement since, that it is not contemplated to make any change."

He proceeds—

"All I can say is that not only the workers but some of the big industrial concerns in New Zealand express themselves strongly in favour of the existing system. Personally, I have no objection whatever that no change will be made as regards the Supreme Court Judge presiding. That is one of the strong points. The question is whether it is the likeliest machine that will help to keep peace between employer and worker? I think we have the machine now, and I will be very interested to see how you get along in Victoria with the recommendations of the commission that have been adopted. You can take it for granted that in New Zealand both sides went into the scheme very deeply before any scheme was considered to be workable, and it is also certain that it was not a very weak spot in the system of arbitration and conciliation courts it would have been covered long ere this, and the courts would get the support that they undoubtedly receive."

There is the opinion of a prominent member of the New Zealand Government in regard to these arbitration courts, and we except the one or two instances on which dissatisfaction has been expressed, and consider the overwhelming balance in favour of the system of arbitration and conciliation in force in New Zealand, we come to the conclusion that it would very good thing for us in Australia to have something of the kind. While I am speaking about New Zealand, I should like to say that that country is one which has more labour legislation than any other Australian State.

Senator PEARCE.—If not any other part of the world.

Senator HIGGS.—“If not any other part of the world,” as my honorable friend says. Ever since the time of the late John Ballance, labour legislation has been introduced and passed and added to in that State, and so far from having the result, which some good people in Victoria anticipate, of driving capital out of the country, the capital invested in the country has been increased, the wages of the workers have been increased, and their hours of labour have been shortened. Touching the question of the naval defence of Australia, I shall briefly say that while I am very grateful to the Barton Administration for carrying out the wishes of the people as expressed in the return of members of both Houses, I think that if they go on as they have been doing during the last few months, they will get into serious trouble. I regard the agreement signed by Sir Edmund Barton as a great mistake.

Senator PEARCE.—It was not signed.

Senator HIGGS.—It was signed subject to ratification by Parliament; but if I remember rightly, Sir Edmund Barton gave the Parliament to understand that it would not be signed until Parliament was consulted.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman was told to commit himself to nothing.

Senator HIGGS.—However, I think a very great mistake was made. The Prime Minister of Australia should have taken the same stand as the Premier of Canada. Honorable senators may talk about the advantages we derive from the defence of these coasts by the mother country, but let us remember what was said by the late Chief Justice Higinbotham of Victoria—that any danger to Australia in time of war will arise from our connexion with the old country. We are in a position of splendid isolation, and though some honorable senators may say that it is a good bargain for us to agree to pay £200,000 increased subsidy, I personally think that it will be money thrown away. There is such a vast sum at present invested by English capitalists in Australia, and they derive such magnificent incomes from their investments, that they are not going in any way to neglect to defend that property.

Senator DOBSON.—That is a patriotic argument.

Senator HIGGS.—We are quite willing to defend ourselves; but I take it that the public of the Commonwealth, if they understand the matter, are not willing to pay £200,000 as a tax to assist the War department of the old country. If we are to spend the money, let us spend it on a force of our own, and let us keep control of it. But to pay £200,000 as a subsidy for vessels which may be sent away from here at the very time when they may be wanted seems to me to be a foolish proceeding. At a later stage, when the matter comes up for discussion, I shall do my best to oppose the ratification of the proposed agreement. I should like honorable senators who are in favour of this subsidy to say from whom they expect attack? Is there any particular nation on the face of the earth at the present time that they expect is going to attack Australia?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We cannot say these things in public, but we can imagine that if England said she would not protect us, we might have Australia taken possession of by some other power.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford fears attack if the other nations of the world get the impression that we are no longer under the ægis of the old country. The honorable senator must not forget that there are other people besides British people settling in this country. What about the Canadians, the Americans, the French, and the 100,000 Germans who have found homes in this country?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They would co-operate with the Fatherland.

Senator HIGGS.—Certainly they would co-operate with the Fatherland, supposing Italy came here to attack us, an unheard-of thing—something which I think can only be imagined by somebody who has militarism on the brain. I feel satisfied, and the opinion is held by military experts whose names I shall give to the Senate later on, that our very isolation would prevent us from being attacked by any nation.

Senator CHARLESTON.—We are not so very far distant from the eastern countries.

Senator HIGGS.—Another matter in connexion with which the Federal Government has made a mistake is that of the agreement with the Eastern Extension Cable Company. It is all very well for the Postmaster-General to tell us that certain agreements were entered into, by individual States, that they were practically perpetual, and that this particular agreement has been forced upon the Commonwealth by a member of the New South Wales Government, who signed some agreement with the Eastern Extension Company, without consulting the Parliament of New South Wales. To enter into an agreement such as is proposed by the Federal Government seems to me to be most unbusiness-like. Does the Postmaster-General think for a moment that he and his department will be able successfully to compete with the enterprising business men of the Eastern Extension Company for the business to be done with cablegrams in Australia?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That means that the Government cannot carry on a business as well as a private company?

Senator HIGGS.—It means that they cannot carry it on in the manner in which the Eastern Extension Company carry it on.

Senator KEATING.—Not when they give that company all the concessions which have been given them.

Senator HIGGS.—They agreed with the company to charge a certain price per word, but do they think that the Eastern Extension Company, whose representative some time ago said that they had £800,000 profits in a reserve fund put away to fight the Pacific cable—do they think that those gentlemen are going to act in a high-minded and honorable way?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They have also repaired fleets and laid down cable lines out of profits.

Senator HIGGS.—Is there anything in the agreement to prevent the Eastern Extension Company making rebates to their customers on the stipulated price of 3s. per word?

Senator DRAKE.—Yes; because they have to charge those rates.

Senator HIGGS.—How does the honorable and learned senator know that they will not make reductions to their customers?

Senator DRAKE.—That would not be charging the rate.

Senator HIGGS.—How does the honorable and learned senator propose to find out whether or not they are doing that kind of thing?

Senator KEATING.—And what of the number of individuals who have a life right to send free messages over their lines?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We cannot get to the East or to South Africa with our Pacific cable, and we are therefore bound to deal with this company.

Senator HIGGS.—This company fought the Pacific cable successfully for twenty years. And how did they fight it, but with the large profits they were able to make from the prices they charged for cables?

Senator KEATING.—And from the big subsidies they were getting.

Senator HIGGS.—The Eastern Extension Company was most unscrupulous in its methods. It is a company whose methods of dealing with visitors from Australia to the old country is, I am told, palatial. It receives the Australian, and treats him right royally. It even goes so far as to grant him, for life, the right to send cables free, in order that the interests of the Eastern Extension Company may be fostered in Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I never heard of it when I was in London, and I was as much in touch with the Eastern Extension Company as anybody.

Senator HIGGS.—The very fact that the representative of the company said in London—"We have £800,000 with which to fight the Pacific cable" should apprise honorable senators of their methods.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not believe that was ever said, and the honorable senator cannot produce evidence of it.

Senator HIGGS.—I shall tell honorable senators why I cannot do so at the present time. When these States succeeded, in spite of the Eastern Extension Company, in getting the Pacific cable, I thought the battle was over, and I destroyed the material I had connected with the affairs of the Eastern Extension Company. When I went to Queensland recently I tried to get some more, and I was informed that the documents were in a place in which they were not available to me. Now we find that the Barton Government has gone so far as to enter into an agreement in which it has surrendered itself and the Commonwealth to the company.

Senator DRAKE.—No, that is not so.

Senator HIGGS.—They have agreed to a charge of a certain sum per word when they ought to have known the unscrupulous character of the men who manage this company. They have proved themselves to be unscrupulous in the past, and if they had not been unscrupulous they would never have fought the State owned Pacific cable for so many years. They could not have fought it so successfully for twenty years if they had not been unscrupulous.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Considering that Mr. Sandford Fleming broached the matter in 1894 I cannot see where the twenty years comes in.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford does not know everything.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He knows that.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator has been Premier of South Australia, and has had the administration of Customs there, he has also been to the old country, where he taught the people a good deal that they never knew before, but I can appeal to the Postmaster-General to say whether the Pacific cable has not been on the board for twenty years. This agreement is one of the things which are leading the Barton Administration to destruction. When we place our policy before the people, and are given a mandate, we are all right, and that is evidenced by the passing of the Adult Suffrage Act, the Pacific Island Labourers Act, the Immigration Restriction Act, and other measures of that kind. But when we get away from the public, and without a mandate transact business which is not in keeping with their wishes, as shown by the support given to the Pacific cable, we are going on the wrong tack. I regret that I have to make these remarks, because so far as I know no other Government has had the privilege, and I believe the pleasure, to introduce so many measures of great benefit to the people of the nation in such a short period. Now with regard to the success of the white Australia policy as carried out by the Government, I am very glad to be able to say that in Queensland that success has exceeded our most sanguine anticipations. Thousands of cane-growers have registered to produce cane by white labour, and, contrary to the dismal forebodings of Senators Pulsford and Fraser that the people of the Commonwealth would have to pay about £1,000,000 for this sentimental aim of ours, they are now getting sugar cheaper than they did before federation. I have received several letters which bear out that statement. A large firm in this city named Moran and Cato, with 40 or 50 branch stores, write in these terms :—

Herein we beg to submit information as to price sugar required in yours of 13th inst.

In 1890—2½d. per lb., 12 lbs. 2s. 6d., 13s. 9d. per 70 lb. bag, 22s. per cwt.

In 1893—2½d. per lb., 12 lbs. 2s. 3d., 12s. 10d. per 70 lb. bag, 20s. 6d. per cwt.

I then asked what class of sugar was being sold at those prices, and to that question I received this answer—

In reply to yours of 20th inst., we beg to inform you that the sugar referred to in ours of the 19th inst. is of the quality known as 1A, and is the best sugar ordinarily used by householders.

From Messrs. Anthony Hordern and Sons, of Sydney, I received a letter, in which they regretted that they could not supply me with the price of sugar during those two years, because it was then, as it is now, a fluctuating quantity. But from the secretary of the Balmain Co-operative Society I received a letter stating that sugar was sold in Sydney at 2d. per lb., and with tea at 1½d. per lb. His letter is as follows :—

Our retail price for all these sugars is 2½d. per lb., and is the same as is charged in all the principal shops in Sydney, but local shopkeepers have always made a cutting line of sugar, and have been selling at 2d. per lb., or with tea at 1½d. per lb.

I wish to ask Senator Pulsford, and those who believe with him that the price of sugar was going to be higher, how it is that the grocers in Sydney are charging 2½d. per lb. while the grocers in Melbourne are charging 2½d. per lb. I suppose the excuse made in Sydney, that it is owing to the Tariff, is more likely to appeal to the general householder. Senator Pulsford had a great deal to say about the administration of the Customs department. He complained of the Minister prosecuting a number of good people when he might have acted in another way. The Customs Act has been described by the Board of Customs in the old country as a model Act, and I think that the Minister is only endeavouring to administer the Act as it should be administered. Let us understand what are his powers. He may institute prosecutions against importers who are guilty of wrong-doing, or he may hold an inquiry. The first section dealing with prosecutions reads as follows:—

Customs prosecutions may be instituted in the name of the Minister by action, information, or other appropriate proceeding—

(a) In the High Court of Australia; or

(b) In the Supreme Court of any State; and when the prosecution is for a pecuniary penalty not exceeding £300, or the excess is abandoned, the Customs prosecution may be instituted in the name of the collector in

(c) Any County Court, District Court, Local Court, or Court of summary jurisdiction.

With regard to the inquiry, section 265 says—

If any dispute shall arise between any officer and any person with reference to any contravention of this Act, the Minister may, in manner prescribed, with the written consent of such person, inquire into and determine the dispute, and shall have power by order, which shall forthwith be published in the Gazette, to impose, enforce, mitigate, or remit any penalty or forfeiture, which he shall determine shall have been incurred.

Section 267 says—

The Minister in holding an inquiry under this part of this Act shall hold such inquiry in public, and may—

(a) Summon the parties and any witnesses before him.

(b) Take evidence on oath.

Those who are objecting to the administration of the law ask, why does not the Minister hold inquiries? They have charged him with going beyond his duty—with being a despot or an autocrat, simply because he declines to take upon his own shoulders the hearing of these cases, and simply says to the parties—"Go before a Judge of the Supreme Court, or before a magistrate, and have your case tried in a court of law. Do not ask me to try it in my office. I refuse to try it." He, however, sends these people to the police court, and the case is tried there. I ask those honorable senators who are complaining of his administration if they can cite a prosecution instituted by the Minister which has been dismissed. My opinion is that the general public of Queensland are extremely well pleased with his action. Senator Pulsford to-day cited the case of a man with a Bible and the case of a man with a barrel of fat; but I should like to know whether he has not heard of cases where all kinds of artifice have been used to smuggle in goods. I venture to say that if Senator Playford would take the trouble to speak he could tell us some of the tricks adopted by smugglers in bringing contraband articles. I believe that in the New South Wales Treasury there is a quantity of gold which nobody has been game to claim, and which was discovered in a cask of tallow at the Lucknow mines. The Customs officers had every reason, I think, to inquire into the case of the cask of fat. The Minister is a very much maligned man, and it is not right that the side of the objectors to his administration should get into Hansard without something being said on his behalf.

Senator CHARLESTON.—He has said a lot on behalf of himself to-day.

Senator HIGGS.—I am very glad to hear that he has. He may not have referred to an incident in connexion with Queensland. On the 10th August, 1901, there appeared in the Brisbane Courier an article with this heading in large black type—Customs leakages. The warehousemen complain. Unfair influence of official laxity.

Remember that, please.

Senator CHARLESTON.—It was mentioned by Mr. Kingston.

Senator HIGGS.—There are certain honorable senators who have a higher appreciation of their duty than others have. Some roam all over the building; others sit here and do their duty. If I had been roaming around, perhaps I might have heard this quoted. I shall not go into the matter as fully as I understand it has been gone into elsewhere, but I wish to point out that there was a deputation which waited on the Treasurer of Queensland. The following firms were represented:—Messrs. Stewart and Hemmant, D. and W. Murray, R. Fraser and Co., R. Reid and Co., R. Armour and Co., Mr. A. M. Kirkland, and Mr. Robertson. It was pointed out to the Treasurer that there were great leakages in connexion with the Customs. The Customs department was at this time being administered by Mr. Kingston, and this deputation pointed out that there were great leakages on the part of officers, and that they hoped that the Treasurer of Queensland would take some action to induce the Minister to cause a closer scrutiny to be made. I will briefly quote the opinion of one member of the deputation—Mr. Stewart—as given in the Brisbane Courier of 3rd August, 1901. Mr. Stewart, we are told, asserted—

That for some years past heavy leakages have occurred which might have been averted with the exercise of ordinary care, and which have led to a very material diminution in the revenue. In fact, Mr. Stewart avers that the amount thus allowed to slip through the fingers of the Customs authorities would have been more than sufficient to make good the financial difficulty which now exists. By means of false invoices, Mr. Stewart states, there have been systematic frauds worked upon the Customs department in the past, and they are still being carried on. His firm has more than once submitted, not only to the Collector of Customs, but to the Treasury, proofs of the dishonesty which is being practised, though, strange to say, the warnings have been unheeded.

Mr. Stewart went on to say that he believed that the loss of Customs revenue during three years in the softgoods trade alone amounted to not less than £250,000. As a result of the visit of the deputation, Mr. Cribb, the Treasurer, wrote down to the Minister for Trade and Customs that there was no doubt good cause for complaint, and urged the Minister to instruct his officers to be more careful. The Minister at once sent up an inspector—Mr. Mason—who conducted his inquiries in a most impartial way, and as the Minister himself would have conducted them had he been doing the work. Mr. Mason discovered certain things, and some of the members of this deputation was very much surprised at what followed. Indeed, their action reminds me very much of a story I once heard about my honorable friend, Senator McGregor. Many years ago, when in Victoria, Senator McGregor was in the habit of travelling on the railway lines. In order that he might not be bothered about finding a second-class carriage, he bought a first-class ticket, and got into the first carriage he came across. On one occasion, when he was in his working attire, he got into a first-class carriage where there were two well-dressed young men. As soon as he put in an appearance these two young men called the guard and asked that he might be removed. The guard, jumping at conclusions—as many of us do—said to Senator McGregor—“Come out of that; you are in the wrong car.” Senator McGregor said—“No, I won't come out; I am all right here.” “Well,” said the guard, “show me your ticket.” Senator McGregor said—“You say to me, according to the regulations, ‘Tickets, please,’ and I will show it to you.” He showed his ticket to the guard, and of course the guard saw that it was all right, and was going away, when Senator McGregor called him back and said—“Having looked at my ticket, would you be kind enough to look at the tickets of these two gentlemen?” The guard did so, and it was then discovered that these two well-dressed young men in the first-class carriage had second-class tickets. This deputation in Brisbane, or some of the members of it, who went to the Treasurer of Queensland, wanted the Minister for Trade and Customs to inspect the other fellow's invoices, but not to inspect any of theirs. When the Customs officer inspected the invoices of some of these firms, he discovered, as I dare say many of us already know, many irregularities. The firm of Robert Reid and Co., for one, was found to have indulged in a number of what might be called, morally speaking, “second-class” invoices. The case occupied some twenty days in hearing in Brisbane, and the firm was found guilty on all points, fined £50, and had to pay the costs, which, it is generally understood, amounted to some £8,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And were found guilty of fraud.

Senator HIGGS.—Yes; and if they had been prosecuted as some other people have been prosecuted for conspiracy, the evidence would have put all the members of the firm in gaol. Senator Pulsford, it appears to me, wants some distinction to be made. I admire the Minister for Trade and Customs for bringing every offender up before the bar and letting him stand his trial, irrespective of his position. I saw in Victoria the other day where a dairyman was fined because there was about a tablespoonful of water in half-a-pint of milk. The dairyman said—“I did not put the water there; it was put in by one of my assistants.” But the man was fined all the same, and he had to appear at the police court with the common order of delinquents—the person who steals, the person who gets drunk, and so forth. I have not seen any account of a deputation of milkmen waiting upon the authorities, and asking that a special court should be appointed for them, so that they should not be asked to mix up with smugglers and others who have to be tried. Some people want the Minister to bring before the court the person who has very little influence in the community, and to allow the influential persons—the richer ones—to be dealt with in some back parlour. I think I cannot do better than give an extract from a leading article in the Ballarat Courier of the 26th May. The case is very well put there from our stand-point—

A certain class of superior persons would have this sort of differentiation between persons accused of defrauding the Customs. The Minister—"Who is this reported? Thomas Snooks. Is he anybody?" Officer—"No, sir; only in a small way of business. He has no friends in power!" The Minister—"Send him to the courts;" and Thomas Snooks is sent and duly exposed to public gaze as a man who tried to defraud the Customs, and was bowled out by the astute Customs officers. Minister—"Who is this? Robert Reid? Not the Minister of Education for Victoria, surely; not a former Minister of Customs for that State?" The clerk—"Yes, sir, the same; but it is only a mistake, sir; sent a young lad to pass the entries; meant a few thousands on their side, sir; but evidently only a mistake." Minister—"Ah, we must be careful. Take a cab at once; go to the honorable gentleman's office, ask to see him alone, and then invite him to come and see me at once. It will never do to exhibit a man of his influence and standing in the court. Quite a mistake, of course." Clerk departs and returns with the gentleman. Minister—"Oh Mr. Reid, so sorry to trouble you but—" Mr. Reid—"I am very busy, and could wish you had not wasted my time. The thing is a mistake of course." The Minister—"Yes, I just wanted to hear that from yourself. Quite an unavoidable error. Have a glass of wine and a cigar—I've a very good cigar; never pay duty, you know. Ha! ha!" A little later.—The Minister—"Yes; so sorry to trouble you. Good morning." The visitor—"Good morning;" and the veracious journals of the day would relate how an error had been made by some officious Custom-house clerk who stupidly wanted to regard a small inaccuracy in a highly-respected merchant's entries as a fault deserving the attention of the Minister, and would end their paragraphs with—"We understand the officious clerk is to be reduced a grade."

Now, sir, some honorable senators have said that they hope there will be some alteration in the administration of the Customs. I hope there will not be; and if ever it happens that any Minister for Customs departs from the policy laid down by Mr. Kingston he will certainly find me an opponent. Another proposal was made by an honorable senator in this chamber to alter that procedure, and that was to revert to the old order of things that existed in Victoria when the Minister, in his private office, used to settle disputes. We have heard of a case of a merchant being fined £1,000 when, in the opinion of those who knew most about the case, he ought to have been fined £5,000; and the man who was fined afterwards invited the Minister to his house, and the Minister dined there, after fining the merchant—clearly showing that the man considered himself very lucky getting off at so low a price. I hope there will be no reversion to that order of things. Senator Pulsford and those who incline with him have their own opinion; but I incline to the view that the very increase shown over the estimated revenue within the Commonwealth as derived from the Tariff is due, very largely in consequence of the fact that the importers of smuggled goods in the past now pay duty. I do not think that many of these importers felt very guilty in smuggling goods. Some of them considered that it was a fair thing to do in the ordinary course of trade. They knew very well that their neighbour was doing on business in the same line on the opposite side of the street was possibly importing goods at a low figure and under-cutting them, and they tried to follow the example. Now I believe they are all paying on the one footing. If they make false entries, or try in any way to avoid payment of the proper duty, the Customs authorities are likely to prosecute them, and very few of them will endeavour to do so. The whole general public of the Commonwealth will thus be benefited in every respect. From what I know of it, I believe that the Postal administration is being carried on very well by our honorable and learned friend, the Postmaster-General. The case of the boy Martin, which was referred to some evenings ago by Senator Neild, is one of a trivial one. I have seen the papers, and I am satisfied that the boy whose services were dispensed with could have expected no other treatment. To my mind, there is sufficient evidence to prove that he was a boy who was not a credit to the service.

Senator BARRETT.—Rather precocious. Senator HIGGS.—He was evidently precocious for his age, very inquisitive, very neglectful of his duty. Perhaps the lesson he has received will be a very good thing for him in after life. I do not think that any injustice was done; on the contrary, I consider that the department acted quite within its rights. Sometimes a severe punishment to discharge an employé; I think that suspension is very much the better method. But in the present instance the boy seems to have been repeatedly guilty of wrong-doing, and, in regard to the discipline of the department, there seems to have been no other course open to the authorities than to get rid of him.

Senator DRAKE.—That was the recommendation of the board of inquiry appointed under the Statute.

Senator HIGGS.—With regard to what the honorable senator said about trying an offender twice, I would point out that the second trial was evidently necessary and justifiable when asked for by an official of the department. It was due to the department that that inquiry was held, and I do not see that any injustice whatever was done to the boy by further inquiry into his case. There is only one other item to which I desire to refer.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What about the six hatters?
